PREFATORY NOTE

IN the original paging of 2 Bligh, after page 466, the numbers of pages 463 to 466 were erroneously repeated. After page 478, the mistake was rectified by the omission of the numbers of pages 479 to 482 inclusive. In 3 Bligh, N.S., the numbers of pages 159 and 160 do not appear, and those of pages 175 and 176 are repeated after page 176. The original pagination has been left unaltered.

A. by a testament made on death-bed, bequeaths all his real and personal estates in trust to be sold. The interest of the residue he directed to be paid to B. and C. his heirs-at-law and next of kin, during their lives, etc. The principal of the residue he gave to D. etc. B. and C. reduce the death-bed disposition. The Court held that they could not claim the life-interest given to them, either under the testamentary instrument or as next of kin, for default of disposition. But that the deed not being ab-[2]solutely void, according to the law of Scotland, was properly admitted in evidence against them to shew the testator's intention, and that D. etc. the residuary legatees, must be compensated out of the life-interest, given to B. and C. for the disappointment occasioned by their act.

John, the late Duke of Roxburgh, by a testamentary disposition, dated the 4th of October, 1790, conveyed his whole unentailed real estate, and his personal estate, to himself, and his heirs whomsoever of his body, whom failing, to the Appellants equally between them and the heirs of their bodies; and failing either of them, to the survivor and the heirs of her body; whom failing, to his heirs of tailzie succeeding to the Earldom and estate of Roxburgh, under burthen of the payment of his debts and funeral expenses, and of all legacies which he might bequeath. On the 5th of November, 1803, the Duke executed another deed, whereby, without revoking the former for the better settlement of his affairs, in the event of his death, agreeably to the instructions given, or to be given by him, in relation thereto, he granted and disposed to the Respondent, John Wauchope, and to James Dundas, Clerks to the Signet, his whole unentailed real estate, (describing particularly all the lands and heritages he held in fee simple,) together with his personal estate, in trust, for the uses, ends, and purposes specified in the following words:—"To the end that my lands, houses, and other heritages, before conveyed, now belonging, or which shall belong to me at my death, may be sold, either in whole or in part, at the discretion of [3] my trustees; and that the produce and prices thereof may be applied to the purposes after-mentioned:—In the first place, for the payment of my death-bed and funeral expenses, and of the expenses of management and executing this trust: Secondly, for and in payment of all the just and lawful debts, which shall be owing by me at my death: Thirdly, for payment and satisfaction of all obligations, legacies, annuities, donations, or other bequests granted, or to be granted, by me to any person or persons whatsoever, by any bond, deed, missive, memorandum, codicil, or other writing whatsoever, expressive of my will and intention, executed at any time of my life, and even upon death-bed: And lastly, the whole residue, remainder, and surplus, of my said estate and effects, shall be conveyed and made over or applied and employed by my said trustees or trustee acting for the time, to and in favour of such person or persons, or for such uses and purposes, as I have directed, or shall direct, by any deed, missive, memorandum, or other writing, executed, or to be executed, by me to that effect." The trust disposition also, in the events of the trustees not accepting or declining to execute the trust, makes the following provision:—"Then, and in either of these cases, the lands and other heritages and debts, and sums of money, and other subjects and effects, hereby disposed, shall fall and belong to such person or persons, and be applied to such uses and purposes as I have directed, or shall by any deed, [4] missive, memorandum, codicil, or other writing of the date hereof, or of any other date or dates, direct and appoint: and failing such appointment, then to the person or persons whom I shall appoint to be my residuary legatee or legatees." By a subsequent clause, the trust-deed nominates the trustees, and failing them, the residuary legatees, to be the Duke's executors and administrators of his estate and effects, excluding all others his nearest of kin and executors from these offices. By a writing executed at the same time with the last-mentioned trust-deed, the Duke declared, "That in the event of his sudden death, or in the event that he should be prevented from executing a deed of instructions, it was his will, that the deed which he formerly made in favour of the Appellants, should be carried into effect so far as regarded them."

In the beginning of March, 1804, the Duke fell sick with the complaint of which he died. On the 19th of the same month, he executed an instrument, by which he directed the Respondent, John Wauchope, and James Dundas, as trustees named in the settlement of the 5th of November, 1803, to sell and dispose of his whole (un-entailed) real estate in Scotland, and his house in St. James's-square, London, and from the produce thereof, and of his personal estate, after payment of certain annuities and legacies in the deed specified, and of his debts, funeral charges, and expenses of management, he authorized them to invest the whole residue and remainder of the property thereby bequeathed, [5] in the public funds, or upon real security, in Scotland, and he thereby "directed his trustees to pay annually the dividends and interest, equally between the Appellants; and failing either of them, to the survivor, during their lives, or that of the survivor; and upon the death of the survivor, to pay over the residue to Sir John Scott, (father of the Respondent, Sir William Scott,) and the Respondents Charles Baillie Hamilton, and Sir Henry Hay McDougall, and their executors and assignees, in the proportions therein specified." The Duke died without issue upon the day on which this last mentioned instrument was executed, leaving the Appellants his heirs-at-law and sole next of kin. Immediately after his death, the Appellants brought an action in the Court of Session, to reduce this deed; and obtained a judgment, by which it was found, that being executed on death-bed, it was inept, so far as it conveyed lands; in consequence of which, the deed was set aside, and the Appellants' right to the lands, as heirs-at-law, established upon appeal to the House of Lords. [5 Pat. 547.]

After a lapse of some years, the Respondent Wauchope, who alone had accepted and acted in the trust, brought an action of multiple-poinning, for the purpose of ascertaining, judicially, the respective rights of the parties claiming adverse interests in the trust-fund remaining in his hands. When the cause was brought before the Lord Ordinary, he ordered the parties to state their respective claims in writing. The Appellants claimed a life-interest in the residuary personal estate in the precise terms of the trust-deed: or [6] if the Court should be of opinion, that, having rejected and annulled that deed in one respect, they could not avail themselves of any of its provisions, then, in the character of the Duke's next of kin, they claimed the profits of the residue of his property during their lives, and the life of the survivor, as a subject not disposed of by his will. On the other hand, the Respondents, Hamilton and McDougall and Sir J. Scott, insisted, that they were not only entitled to the capital of the funds after the death of the Appellants, and the survivor of them, but that they were entitled to the profits during the lives of the Appellants: upon the ground that the Appellants having reprobated the deed so far as it contemplated the disposal of land in Scotland, could take no benefit under that deed.

Upon these respective statements of claims, the Lord Ordinary, having heard Counsel, pronounced an interlocutor, by which, after reciting, to the effect before stated, the substance of the deeds dated the 14th of October, 1790, the 5th of November, 1803, with the writing or signed declaration of the same date, and the principal deed in question of the 19th of March, 1804; and after finding as facts the signature and execution of these several instruments, the action brought by the Appellants, and the consequent reduction of the deed made on death-bed, in so far as it related to the whole of the heritable subjects, expressed to be conveyed by it, which were descendible to the Appellants as heirs alioqui successuræ, under the titles thereof, which stood in the person of John, Duke of Roxburgh; the in-[7]-terlocutor proceeds to find, "that the Appellants having thus challenged and reduced the death-bed deed, in so far as it affected the heritage, cannot avail themselves of that deed, by claiming the life-rent of the moveables under it;" and finally, it is found and declared, "That although by the terms of the settlement, the residuary legatees are entitled to claim the residue of the effects vested in the trustees, after the death of Ladies Essex and Mary Ker, (the Appellants,) and the survivor of them; yet, that the life-rent of these subjects does not belong to the Ladies Ker as the Duke's executors, he having appointed the trustees his executors, and having appointed the whole residue of his fortune to be paid at a certain period to the residuary legatees, and therefore, the Ladies Ker can have no legal claim to the life-rent of these effects, except by this settlement, (the trust-deed of the 19th of March, 1804,) which they cannot approbate and reprobate; therefore, repels the claim of Ladies Essex and Mary Ker, to the life-rent of the subjects in medio, and decerns; but before further answer as to the claim of the residuary legatees, appoints them to be heard on the question, Whether by the terms of the Duke's settlement, as the residue is declared not to be payable until after the death of his sisters, they are entitled to demand payment thereof immediately?"

Against this interlocutor the Appellants gave in a representation, by which, in addition to their former arguments, they contended, that John, Duke of Roxburgh, was domiciled in England; and that [8] his moveable succession must, therefore, be regulated by the law of England; which, as they represented, acknowledged no such principle as that applied to the case by the Lord Ordinary. Upon considering this representation, with answers, his Lordship pronounced the following interlocutor.

"The Lord Ordinary having considered the representation, and the answers thereto, together with the whole process, in respect that the plea now maintained, as drawn from the English law, which it is said does not admit of the doctrine of approbate and reprobate, does not apply to this case, supposing the fact as to the law of England to be as there stated; seeing that John, Duke of Roxburgh, being a Scottish nobleman, and his whole landed property being in Scotland, and that being the place of his residence for the greater part of the year, his domicile must be held to have been in Scotland, notwithstanding his having, during the sitting of Parliament, an occasional residence in London, where he died; and in respect the pursuers only claim the life-rent in question of the residue of the Duke's fortune, by virtue of the deed of 1801, which they have actually challenged, and set aside in part, refuses the representation, and adheres to the interlocutor complained of."

The Appellants submitted these interlocutors to the review of the first division of the Court. But the Court adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. By another petition to the same division, the Appellants reclaimed against the in-[9]-terlocutor of the Court; but the prayer was refused, and the Court adhered to their former interlocutor. Against these several interlocutors, the present appeal was presented.

For the Appellants—Mr. Wetherell and Mr. Abercrombie. The doctrine of approbate and reprobate is not clear in application or principle. It has been treated as a result of homologation: as where a party has adopted an instrument and taken some benefit under it, he cannot afterwards question its validity; he must co-operate, if necessary, to effectuate all the provisions of that instrument. In Gainer v. Cunningham (Fac. Coll. Jan. 17, 1758) the decision turned upon very special circumstances. The case in question is different. According to the doctrine as it appears in the text writers on the law of Scotland—a party, an heir-at-law, as in this case, may avail himself of a deed in his favour, and at the same time challenge another deed of the same grantor, which, if duly executed, would deprive him of some legal right. The objection is admitted to be legal, when the instruments are on separate papers. If they happen to be united, then it is said, the party cannot approve and reprobate. Such distinctions in a system of law are singular. A case of this nature occurred in the year 1784. (Not reported.) One Gordon made a will of his personal estate in favour of his heir-at-law: a few days after, he made an entail of his landed property in favour of the same person, but laying him under restrictions. The will and the entail referred to each other; and were indisputably meant as one settlement of the whole property of the testator [10] and entailor. The heir-at-law took the personal estate under the will, and having afterwards challenged the deed of entail as executed on death-bed, it was contended, that he could not approve and reprobate the same instrument, and that the two being executed unico contentu, were to be considered in that light. The judgment of the court was, that the heir, notwithstanding his having taken the personal estate under the will, might set aside the separate deed of entail. It was accordingly set aside, and he enjoyed both real and personal estate; the one as heir-at-law, without restriction, the other according to the terms of the will. This decision, if it proceeded upon a rational principle, would not have been different, although the deed of entail had been attached or annexed to the will, or formed part of it. The propensity of the courts below to extend this doctrine of approve and reprobate, has been checked by this House, in the decisions upon Wilson v. Henderson (Mar. 29, 1802), and Crawford v. Coutts (Mar. 14, 1806). A deed made upon death-bed is not absolutely void, because the heir may waive his right, or his right may not be affected, in which case he is barred. But this deed, so far as it conveyed the inheritance, was challenged and reduced before the question of election was raised. Is the right of heirs at law to give way to presumed intention? if so, where is the ground of presumption? The testator, when he framed or approved of the instrument, was capable of understanding the effect of his own acts; and if he intended to make his bequest conditional, he would have inserted an express condition. Suppose the deed to have [11] been so reprobated by the Appellants, that they can take nothing under it, then the life interest in the residue is not disposed of. It cannot fall into the residue for the benefit of the Respondents. They are not residuary legatees, but legatees in remainder of a residue. The executors cannot take it, they are mere trustees. To whom then can it go, but to the Appellants as next of kin? The deed is reduced, and cannot be read against them. Hearle v. Greenbank (2 Atk. 714), Sheddon v. Goodrich (8 Ves. 497).

For the Respondents—the Solicitor-General Sir R. Gifford, and Mr. C. Warren. The principle of law which forbids a person to take a benefit from one part while he denies effect to another part of the same deed, is founded in natural equity, and confirmed by authority and practice. Every provision of a testamentary settlement operates as a condition (Ersk. Inst. b. 3. t. 9. s. 10). To defeat the provision, or to refuse the performance of the condition, excludes the recusant from the benefit of the will. The law will not admit of opposite and incompatible pretensions. The courts both of England and Scotland have adopted the maxim of the Roman law: "Absurdum videtur licere eidem partim comprobare judicium defuncti, partim evertere." Decisions grounded upon this principle have frequently occurred in the tribunals of Scotland: Anderson v. Bruce, Morr. Dict. p. 607, 21 Dec. 1680—Paterson v. Spreuil, Kame's Remarkable Decisions, vol. ii. p. 114—Cunningham v. Gainer, Jan. 15, 1758. Morr. Dict. p. 617—Gibson v. McBean, Id. 620—Martin v. Martin. The case of Loudon [12] lately decided in the Court of Session, illustrates and enforces the doctrine. The decision took place* under the following circumstances:—"George Loudon, who had been for some time resident, and died in Jamaica, had sent home £2000 sterling, of which £1000 was lent out upon heritable security. He executed a will in the English form, by which, inter alia, he directed his executors, so soon as Robert Loudon, his nephew, should attain the age of 21, to invest the sum of £5000 sterling in security upon property in Great Britain, for his use during the term of his natural life; and after his death, to the use of the heirs of his body; and he directed that the sum of £2000 which he had remitted to Great Britain, as above mentioned, might be applied in part payment of the said sum of £5000 sterling. He further directed his executors to invest the sum of £1500 sterling in good security, the interest or profits of which were to be paid to his brother William Loudon, during his life-time, and after his death, the principal was given to his children. The testator also appointed his nephew Robert Loudon his residuary legatee. William Loudon was the testator's heir-at-law. For several years he continued to draw the interest of the £1500 given to him in life-rent, but having obtained information of the heritable bond for £1000 he contended that it was not carried by his brother's testament, but [13] fell to him as his heir-at-law. This claim was met on the part of Robert Loudon the nephew, by the doctrine of approbate and reprobate; and he further maintained, that William Loudon had homologated the settlement by taking benefit under it, having drawn for several years the interest of the £1500.—Lord Newton, Ordinary, found that the heir-at-law had not done any thing sufficient to infer homologation, unless it could have been established that he had full knowledge of the contents of the settlement at the time when the alleged acts of homologation were done. He sustained, however, the plea of approbate and reprobate to its full extent: For he found in the same interlocutor, 'that he (William Loudon), is not entitled both to approbate the will by accepting the bequest of the interest of £1500 and to reprobate it by challenging the conveyance of the above £1000 according to the purpose of the will; therefore ordains him to declare his option within ten days, whether he will take the interest of the £1500 provided to him and his family by the will, or claim the £1000 lent out on heritable security, but destined by the testator for answering the purposes of his will.'" This judgment was confirmed by two successive interlocutors of the court. The Appellants having challenged and reduced the death-bed disposition, so far as the heritage is bequeathed by it, those acts amount to an abandonment of the life-interest in the personalty created in their favour by the deed. That interest consequently, and of ne-[14]cessity, falls to the enjoyment of the Respondents. If it can be supposed that these acts do not amount to an election, then it remains to be determined by the Appellants, whether they will take the life-interest in the mixed fund given by the testamentary instrument, and give up the unentailed real estate, or insist upon their legal right to the inheritance, and abandon the life-interest in the personalty. The Appellants must elect: They cannot approbate and reprobate. This is not a case like those cited for the Respondents. The bequests are contained in one, not in two instruments. The law is different where the instruments are distinct; and this is a question of positive law, not of expedience or morality. It is argued upon the authority of Bearle v. Greenbank (3 Atk. 711), and Sheddon v. Goodrich (8 Ves. 497), that the testamentary instrument as to land not having been legally executed, cannot be read to shew any intention upon the subject. Those cases may be distinguished from the present. In Boughton v. Boughton (2 Ves. Sen. p. 12), it was decided by Lord Hardwicke, that a will not executed according to the statute (29 Car. 2), though void as to real estate, might be read to raise a case of election against the heir; because the condition was annexed to the gift of the personalty. In the case of copyhold, where no surrender has been made, although it cannot pass by a will, and no condition is expressed, yet, where the testator has given a legacy to the heir, and the copyhold to a stranger, the Court compels an election: Pettward v. Prescott (7 Ves. 541). The distinctions made in these conflicting cases are not satisfactory, and do not seem [15] to rest upon intelligible principles. The question was much discussed in the case of Thelluson v. Woodford,* where the doctrine of election prevailed.

The law of England may be doubtful on the point, but the law of Scotland, is clear and decisive. The case of Cunningham v. Gainer is an express decision upon the subject. In that case the testament was executed upon death-bed; yet the Court suffered it to be read, and in their judgment proceeded upon the principle of approve and reprobate. There was no appeal against that judgment. It has established the law upon the question. It has guided the courts ever since.

In the case of Brodie v. Barry (2 V. and B. 127. There was no condition expressed), Sir William Grant, the late Master of the Rolls, expressing his doubts of the soundness of the distinction between express and implied conditions, decided that a will duly executed in the English form, by which estates in Scotland were devised to trustees, together with estates in England and personal property, might be read to raise a case of election against the heir, to whom a legacy was given by the will. In Crawford v. Coutts, there were two instruments, the latter executed on death-bed, containing a revocation of the former. No benefit was given to the heir by the invalid instrument, and he stood upon his independent right. The doctrine of approve and reprobate did not come in question, and the case [16] is altogether inapplicable. In Wilson v. Henderson, the will contained no provision as to lands, and the death-bed disposition was a separate instrument.

The other cases, cited for the Appellants in the court below, contain no principle which can bear upon the present question. In some of those cases, such as Weir v. the Laird of Lee (Morr. Dict. p. 605), and Sir P. Home v. E. of Home (ibid. 612), it was decided that a party might produce in evidence an admission or statement of fact made in one part of a deed, without being bound to admit the truth of every other part of the same deed. In other cases adduced, of a different class, as those of Gray and Somerville v. Abernethy (Morr. Dict. p. 609), and Fee v. Traill (ibid. 616), where reservations had been unwarrantably made in conveyances by persons bound to execute them simply, it was found that parties intitled might avail themselves of the full benefit of the conveyances, refusing to acknowledge or effectuate the reservations. How do these decisions affect the doctrine of election?

But the Appellants if they cannot avoid election, resort to a new device; they would take the real estate as heirs, and the life interest in the residue of the personality as next of kin. They argue that if they cannot have that interest under the will, there is no disposition of the life interest. They cannot claim it as next of kin. In fact, there is no intestacy. By a clause in the trust disposition of 1803, all the subjects thereby disposed are given, in default of appointment, to the person or persons whom the disponent should appoint to be [17] his residuary legatee or legatees. If he has not disposed of the life-interest in the personality, it falls, by virtue of that clause, into the residue, upon the refusal of the Appellants to perform the implied condition of the will: as it would in case of their death, and the Respondents take it under appointment. Lastly, if the life-interest does not fall into the residue, it is a fund out of which the Respondents must be compensated for the disappointment occasioned by the acts of the Appellants. Welby v. Welby (2 Ves. and Bea. p. 90).*

Mr. Wetherell in reply. In this case the question of election is not raised against the heirs; because the death-bed disposition being an invalid instrument cannot be read to shew any intention [18] as to the land. The principle of the decisions in Hearle v. Greenbank, and Sheddon v. Goodrich, is founded in universal law,—it must extend to cases in Scotland.

The Judgment of the Court below is at all events defective in one respect. There has been no decision upon the question reserved, as to the life-interest in the personality. The Judges of the Court of Session have pronounced that the Appellants are not to have it. But they have not said who is to have that interest which yet remains to be disposed of. The consideration of that difficulty might have altered or affected their judgment.

* The report of the judgment pronounced in that case, by Sir W. Grant, contains the following passage:—"That an heir, to whom an estate is devised in fee, may be put to an election, although, by the rule of law, a devise in fee to an heir is inoperative, I should have thought perfectly clear, independently of Lord Cowper's decision in the case in Gilbert (Anon. Gilb. Eq. Rep. 15); for, if the will is in other respects so framed as to raise a case of election, then, not only is the estate given to the heir under an implied condition, that he shall confirm the whole of the will, but in contemplation of equity the testator means, in case the condition shall not be complied with, to give the disappointed devisees out of the estate, over which he had a power, a benefit correspondent to that of which they are deprived by such non-compliance. So, that the devise is read, as if it were to the heir absolutely, if he confirm the will: if not, then in trust for the disappointed devisees as to so much of the estate given to him, as shall be equal in value to the estates intended for them."

The Lord Chancellor,—after stating the principal facts of the case as the foundation of the Judgment, which he recommended for the adoption of the House, proceeded to this effect:

In this Case, according to the pleadings in the Court below, the Respondents, Hamilton, Scott, and McDougall, claim an immediate interest in the proceeds of the residuary fund of the personal estate. The Appellants make an adverse claim to the same subject, either under the deed of trust, or as next of kin, for default of disposition. From the language of the interlocutor, "that the life rents do not belong to the Appellants, as the Duke had made the trustees his executors, and had appointed the whole residue of his fortune to be paid to the residuary legatees," it does not clearly appear, whether the Lord Ordinary meant to negative the claim of the Appellants as [19] next of kin. It is very true, that the Duke had appointed the trustees his executors, and had appointed the residue of his fortune to be paid to the residuary legatees; but that was not to take place until the death of the survivor of the Appellants. The conclusion, "that, therefore, the Ladies Ker can have no legal claim to the life-rent of these effects, except by this settlement which they cannot approbate and reprobate, therefore repels this claim of Ladies Esser and Mary Ker to the life-rent of the subjects in medio," does not seem to be a complete judicial decision, nor a necessary conclusion from the premises.* Having repelled their claims, and having stated that the trustees were executors, the Lord Ordinary goes on to make a reservation upon certain questions which have not yet received the decision of the Court below. The question was, Whether the residuary legatees were, or were not, to have immediate payment of the residue? If the Appellants could not claim the life interest [20] under the settlement, it must follow of course either that they had a right to claim it as next of kin, or if they were not at liberty to bring forward that claim, the profits of the residue must either belong to the trustees and executors, during the lives of the Appellants and the survivor, or it must accumulate during that period, and be paid over to the parties who, at the death of the survivor, were appointed to take the capital. If we are to understand the decision of the Court below according to the last of these suppositions, as the interest and all accumulation of interest, must go to the Respondents, or their representatives, there would be no reason why they should not take the interest immediately, as well as the capital, at the death of the survivor of the Appellants. There is, however, no express declaration to this effect in this Judgment of the Lord Ordinary; unless, (as it is probable) he meant to decide, that there being a testamentary disposition under which the Appellants could not claim as legatees, they could not claim in any other right; and then reserving the question how this interest was to be disposed of, and when it was to be paid. In the second interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, it is said, "The pursuers only claim the life-rent in question of the residue of the Duke's fortune, by virtue of the deed of 1801;" whereas, the claim made in the pleadings is not only by virtue of the deed of 1801, but also as the next of kin of the Duke. The interlocutor in this respect, therefore, is not quite correct, unless it can be said, that as the life-interest in the residue was given [21] to them

* The passage of the interlocutor to which these observations apply runs thus:—"Finds, etc., that the life-rent of the subjects does not belong to the Ladies Ker as the Duke's executors, he having appointed, etc. Therefore, etc." These words, if considered without reference to the words of the subsequent interlocutor, might be considered as a finding that the Appellants were not entitled as next of kin. For "the appellation of executors is sometimes applied designative to those who are barely entitled to the moveable succession of the deceased ab intestato, and have a right to claim the office of executors if they think fit." Erskine's Inst. B. 3. Tit. 9. sect. 1. So in the same author, B. 2. Tit. 2. sect. 3.—"Next of kin, or executors," are coupled as synonymous denominations. In like manner the subject of moveable succession is called executory. Id. B. 3. Tit. 9. sect. 1.

by the Deed of 1804, and all other persons were excluded by the effect of the provisions of that deed, the result of that exclusion, and the intestacy which ensued upon their incapacity to take as legatees, devolved the life-interest upon them, as a consequence of the bequest in the deed, and the circumstances attending it. In such a sense only can the claim of the Appellants be said to be made by virtue of the deed of 1804 only. In the petition to the first division of the Court of Session, reclaiming against these interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary, the claim as next of kin is distinctly brought forward again. The result of the discussions before the Lord Ordinary, and before the Court of Session, seems to me upon the whole to be a decision, that the Appellants had no title to the life-interest in the residue, either under the deed of 1804, or in the character of next of kin to the testator; but I do not perceive, that the Court of Session has disposed of the reservation which is contained in the interlocutor of the 17th of January, 1815, which appoints the question to be heard, whether the residuary legatees could take any thing till after the death of the survivor of Ladies Essex and Mary Ker, upon the general question raised in the pleadings.

I do not undertake a minute discussion of the arguments urged in this case; it will be sufficient to state the fundamental principle which ought to guide our decision. The deed in question, upon this appeal, is in the nature of a testament. It is equally settled in the law of Scotland, as of England, that no person can accept and reject the same instrument. If a testator gives his estate to A., and gives A.'s [22] estate to B.; Courts of Equity hold it to be against conscience, that A. should take the estate bequeathed to him, and at the same time refuse to effectuate the implied condition contained in the will of the testator. The Court will not permit him to take that which cannot be his, but by virtue of the disposition of the will; and at the same time to keep what by the same will is given, or intended to be given, to another person. It is contrary to the established principles of equity that he should enjoy the benefit while he rejects the condition of the gift. I have not overlooked the distinction which has been pressed on the consideration of the House. It is said, if a will be made which is attested by three witnesses, and which, therefore, according to the statute is a good will, to pass land; and, in the same will, a case of election is proposed, there the will being duly executed according to the statute, if the devisee will take the land of the devisor, according to the disposition, he shall not refuse to comply with the implied condition of making good the will in certain respects, where it cannot have effect under the will, without his assent and co-operation: that is the simplest case of election. But in a case like the present, where the will has made the land personal estate; and, in one part of that will, the land, is disposed of, and in another part, the personal estate: if the will is not executed according to the statute, it is no will of land: but, as a bequest of personalty does not require attestation, the will is good to that extent. What then is to be done as to the case of election? It is said, that because, as a will of land, it is abso-[23]-lutely void, it is exactly the same as if it contained nothing as to land; that it cannot be read to shew an intention; and, therefore, cannot be viewed as an instrument proposing election. The distinctions upon this head of law appear to be rather unsubstantial. It has been held, that although a will containing dispositions of land be not duly executed according to the statute; yet, if in the same will, personalty is given upon condition that the legatee convey the land: in such case, in as much as the disposition of the personalty cannot be read, without reading at the same time the condition upon which it is given, the gift and the condition are inseparable; and the case of election is raised, because the testator in the disposition, not of land, but of personalty, expresses and directs what is to be done. These are undoubtedly thin distinctions; and a judge having to deal with them finds a difficulty in stating to his own mind, satisfactory principles on which they may be grounded. This was the opinion of a Judge (Sir W. Grant, late Master of the Rolls) who has lately, to the regret of the profession and the public, retired from his judicial labours. I doubt whether the Court in which he so long administered justice will ever see a judge of greater ability and integrity. The opinion to which I allude is expressed in a recent case (Brodie v. Barry), where the Judge, having disburthened his mind of his sentiments as an individual, observes in conclusion, that whatever might have been the foundation of the distinction, he found it established, and therefore, in his judicial character, he could not, with propriety, travel [24] beyond this question—Is the distinction applicable to the decision of the case before the Court! In such a conclusion, and upon similar grounds, I acquiesce: for long professional experience has convinced me that it is more beneficial to the community to adhere to imperfect or ineligible rules of law, which have been long established, than that each succeeding Judge should be at liberty, upon his own notions of expedience, to improve and unsettle the law. The distinction which I am now considering was promulgated by Lord Hardwicke, a Judge profound in legal knowledge. Since his time, men have enjoyed their property upon that established doctrine, and the traditional experience of the Courts does not furnish a wiser maxim than that which is contained in the short precept, stare decisis. I therefore shall only consider the question whether the doctrine of election is applicable to the case before the House. In Brodie v. Barry, the late Master of the Rolls applied the doctrine to the case of property in Scotland, as Lord Hardwicke had before done in the case of Gainer v. Cunningham.* I have looked at the decree and the proofs as recorded in that case, and it appears to me from the result, that Lord Hardwicke was of opinion, that a Scotch instrument, though not good to make an effectual title to Scotch land, might be read to raise a question of election. There is a ground which may be represented as a solid ground to take a Scotch case out of the [25] distinction, which I have admitted to exist in English cases. A deed made upon death-bed is not absolutely void by the law of Scotland. In many cases it will regulate the title, notwithstanding the objection which the heir may raise against it. Until reduced to a nullity, it is only voidable, and may be read for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the testator. I do not think it necessary to examine and discuss all the cases upon this subject. It may be sufficient to state my opinion that, according to the law of Scotland (perhaps more directly than in our law), the doctrine of election was properly applied to this case. According to this decision, if the Appellants set up their title as next of kin, an election would be made, but it would be made in a manner perfectly nugatory, if they are left at liberty to disappoint the intentions of the testator, as to the real estate; to abandon their rights under the deed, and to claim, in the character of next of kin, the life-interest in the personal estate which is not disposed of by the deed. But as the Appellants have in fact, to a certain extent, annulled the deed by judicial process, their election is thereby made to take nothing under that repudiated instrument. A question then arises, what is to become of the life-interest, which the Appellants cannot take, either as legatees, or as next of kin? In our courts we have engrafted upon this primary doctrine of election, the equity as it may be termed of compensation. Suppose a testator gives his estate to A. and directs that the estate of A., or any part of it, should be given to B. If the devisee will not comply with the provision of the will, the Courts [26] of Equity hold that another condition is to be implied, as arising out of the will, and the conduct of the devisee; that inasmuch as the testator meant that his heir-at-law should not take his estate which he gives A., in consideration of his giving his estate to B.; if A. refuses to comply with the will, B. shall be compensated by taking the property, or the value of the property, which the testator meant for him, out of the estate devised, though he cannot have it out of the estate intended for him. Under these circumstances it does not appear to me that there is any ground for advising your Lordships, either to affect this interlocutor, as far as regards the question of approbation and reprobation of the deed, or as far as in construction it negatives the title of the Appellants as next of kin. It may be necessary to correct the language contained in this interlocutor, so as to show unequivocally what points are determined. The latter point the Court has not yet determined, namely, whether the Respondents are, or are not, entitled to take their compensation, until the death of the survivor of the Appellants: the Court below having given no opinion, it is impossible that we should give any opinion upon that point. It is for their determination, in the first instance. The cause must, in point of form, be remitted, with a view to have that question decided. It appears to me very easy of solution. There are certain persons who, according to the expression and principles of our law, have a vested remainder in the capital. They have also, by way of compensation, a title to the life-interest, preceding that remainder in the fund. Having, therefore, the [27] whole interest, I do not understand upon what ground it can be argued, that there ought to be an accumulation of the profits, until the decease of the survivor of the Appellants. If the Appellants have no right, and the Respondents have all the right, in the subject of litigation, why is it not to be applied immediately by way of compensation, upon the ground, that, the condition of the gift being rejected, the life estate did not form a part of the disposition?

The Case cited in the foregoing arguments and judgment under the name of Gainer v. Cunyngham, appears in the Register's Book, under the following date and title.

Tuesday, the 31st day of July, 1750, between Mary Cunyngham, widow of Robert Cunyngham, Esq. deceased, and Susannah Cunyngham, an infant by the said Mary, her mother and next friend—Plaintiffs. Daniel Cunyngham, Esq., William Coleman the elder, Esq., William McDowall, and Drewry Ottley the elder, Esqrs., and Elizabeth Cunyngham—Defendants.

The Cause was originally heard on the 13th of April, 1749. The pleadings are shortly abridged from the abstract in the Register's Book. The bill states: That Robert Cunyngham, the Plaintiff Mary's late husband, being resident at Edinburgh, in Scotland, did, by a deed of disposition or gift of his own hand writing, dated the 17th day of July, 1741, in consideration of the friendship he had for the Plaintiff Mary, assign and make over unto her, by the name of Mary Gainer, all his lands of Craig, in Scotland, and his whole moveable estate therein particularly described, upon condition that the said Mary should be a tender nurse to him during his life, and take care of his family affairs; and also that she should not [28] at any time then after cohabit with Captain James Dalrymple, or be in his company, unless by accident; with a power for the said testator to revoke the said deed: and under these provisions the said Mary was to enjoy the said premises after the said testator's death, for her own life, and afterwards he gave the said premises unto the Plaintiff Susannah, by the name of Susannah Cunyngham, his god-daughter, an infant, under the care of the Plaintiff Mary, and the heirs of her body for ever; remainder to his sons Daniel and Charles Cunyngham, Esqrs. and their heirs for ever, and in the disposition and assignment, he obliges himself, his heirs, and successors, who should inherit his estate at Cayon, in the island of Saint Christopher's, to clear the lands above mentioned of all debts, and to warrant and defend his said assignation, to be good, valid, and sufficient to the Plaintiff Mary, during her natural life, and after her decease to the Plaintiff Susannah, and the heirs of her body for ever, and thereby directed the said deed to be registered in the Books of Session, and appointed a proctor for that purpose. That the said deed was in every particular duly executed and completed according to the law of Scotland, and the said Robert Cunyngham did on the 27th day of October, 1748, duly make and publish his last will and testament, written in his own hand; and thereby directed, that his lands and houses in Basseterre Town should be affixed to his plantation at Cayon, in the said island, and never to be separated therefrom, and he gave his said plantation and lands in Basseterre Town, and all the stock thereon, let to his son Daniel Cunyngham, the Defendant, at £2500 a year, unto William McDowall, of Castle Semple, in the Shire of Renfrew, Esq., Drewry Ottley, of Saint Christopher's, Esq., and the Defendant Coleman, and their heirs, upon trust for the payment of his funeral expenses, debts, and legacies, therein particularly mentioned. And upon further trust for the said Defendant, Daniel Cunyngham, for life, with power for him to charge by his will the said premises with the double of such sums as he had or should receive as his wife's fortune, remainder after his said son Daniel's death [29] to his heirs male or female of his body, with divers limitations over upon conditions therein specified. And then amongst many legacies particularly set forth in the will, given to his children, grandchildren, and relations, the said testator gave to the Plaintiff Mary, by the description of his dear wife, Mary Gainer, which he had theretofore concealed, all his lands, plate, household furniture, linen, and whatsoever he then had, or should have in Scotland, at his death, for her life, for her maintenance; and for the maintenance and education of his daughter Susannah Cunyngham, and the heirs of her body; remainder to his said son Daniel Cunyngham, and his heirs for ever; and further bequeathed to his said wife £200 a year for her life, to be paid quarterly, and all such money as Major James

Dalrymple owed the said Testator, and thereby declared that the said provision was to be in full of her dower. And further directed, that all the produce of his plantation at Cayon, the necessary charges excepted, should be from time to time shipped on such ships as the Defendant William Coleman, his heirs and assigns, should direct; and consigned unto him and them, until the said Testator's funeral charges, debts, and legacies should be paid; and gave him and them power out of the said produce, as the same should be remitted to him and them, to pay the said debts and legacies in Great Britain, with interest, agreeable to his said will, without any order from his said executor, or any other person or persons who should then after come to inherit the said plantation; and the better to secure such consignments to the said Coleman, his heirs and assigns, until such debts and legacies were paid, the said Testator directed, that his said son, Daniel Cunyngham, and all others who should inherit the said plantation, should every year send an account to the said Testator's trustees, of the whole produce thereof, and how applied, and if his son, or others, should misapply the same, and not consign it to the said Coleman, his heirs and assigns, then it should be in their or one of their power, with the consent of one or more of the said Testator's Trustees, to put an overseer upon the said plantation, to manage the same, and [30] to send the produce thereof to the said Coleman, his heirs and assigns, and declared his said son, Daniel, executor of his said will. That the said Testator in his life-time owed several sums of money to divers persons, particularly to Elizabeth Kennedy, £1100 carrying interest at five pounds per cent., which was secured as a mortgage upon his said lands at Craig, in Scotland, and to the said trustee, William McDowall, £ , and to the said trustee, William Coleman, £ . And the Plaintiff hoped she should have had quiet possession of the said lands and effects in Scotland conveyed to her by the said disposition, and that the said trustees would have cleared the same of all debts affecting the same out of the said Testator's estate at Saint Christopher's, and would have paid the annuity of £200 during the Plaintiff's life, according to the directions in the said will. But Elizabeth Cunyngham, at the instigation of the Defendants, or some of them, immediately upon the death of the said Testator, entered into, and seized upon all the said lands and personal estate in Scotland, and put the Plaintiff to great expense in commencing and prosecuting several suits in that kingdom, which were determined in the Plaintiff's favour, and her right to the possession of the said lands and personal estate established; from which determination of the Lords of Council and Session, in order further to distress the Plaintiff, the said Elizabeth Cunyngham appealed to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament. But the said Elizabeth Cunyngham, the day before the said appeal was to have come on, withdrew her petition of appeal, by which means the Plaintiff was put to a very great expense in preparing for her defence. That the said Daniel Cunyngham, as executor to the said will, had been cited into the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, to accept or refuse the probate of the said will; but in order to give the Plaintiffs all the vexation, and put them to all the expense he was able, had not to that time declared whether he would accept or renounce the same. And the Plaintiff Mary had frequently applied to the said trustees and executors, to pay to her the annuity of £200, as the same became due, [31] according to the direction of the said will, from the rents and profits of the said estates in Saint Christopher's, remitted to them; and from that fund to pay off and discharge the funeral expenses and incumbrances on the said Scotch estate; which they refused to do; and did spirit up and procure the said Kennedy, and several other creditors of the said Testator, to commence suits in Scotland against the Plaintiff, on purpose to load the said Scotch estate. And the said trustees McDowall and Coleman, had commenced suits in Scotland for very large debts, which they pretended to be due to them from the said Testator, in order to load the said Scotch estate, so given to the Plaintiffs; notwithstanding the whole plantation estate, amounting to £2500 a year sterling, is paid into their hands; and although they were directed by the said will to disencumber the said Scotch estate,* by the produce of the Saint Christopher's estate. That the said trustees and executors had procured and spirited up one John Gibbs, who performed the Testator's funeral, to bring actions in Scotland, for the expenses of such funeral; and by keeping her from the possession of the Scotch estate and moveables; and by procuring and stirring up suits against that estate and moveables; and by neglecting to pay her any part of the said annuities, had brought her and her infant daughter, the Plaintiff Susannah, into the utmost distress; and when the Plaintiff was by the means aforesaid, destitute of all money and assistance, the said Daniel Cunyngham had the conscience to apply to the Plaintiff, by his agent, and proposed that if she would quit all her right and title for herself and child to the said lands and moveables in Scotland, which the Plaintiff charged were well worth £10,000, and to the annuity of £200, he would in lieu thereof secure to her for her life £100 a year, and £600 in money: otherwise he would take care (be the expense ever so great to him) that Plaintiff should never [32] receive the least benefit from the said deed of gift and will. The Bill then prayed, that the Defendants might be compelled to accept or refuse the said trust: and to set forth an account of the trust estate, and the produce thereof which had come to their or either of their hands, and how they had applied the same: and that they might be compelled by the rents and produce, or if necessary, by mortgage or sale of the said plantation estate, to disencumber and clear the Scotch lands and moveables, and pay the Plaintiff Mary all the arrears of her £200 a year, and the growing payments thereof, as they should become due: and that in the mean time, if necessary, an overseer, or receiver, might be appointed on the said plantation estate: and that the said disposition, conveyance, and deed of gift, made in favour of the Plaintiffs, might be confirmed; and the said Testator's will established against the said Daniel Cunyngham, the heir-at-law, or that the Plaintiff Mary might have her dower.

The Defendants not having appeared at the hearing, a decree nisi was pronounced, and afterwards made absolute.

But upon the petition of the Defendants Cunyngham, Ottley, and Coleman, the cause was re-heard.

The Defendant Cunyngham, by his answer, set forth that Robert Cunyngham, his father, signed the deed, dated the 17th day of July, 1741; but he insisted that the same was not only void and insufficient in point of form, by reason of several defects in the execution thereof, but was also not completed in point of substance, so as to render the same binding and effectual, according to the laws of Scotland; and the said Robert Cunyngham continued, as the Defendant believed, seized of the premises till his death. And insisted, that Plaintiffs ought not to avail themselves of the said deed, as an effectual conveyance of the said lands and premises to them, in the manner therein expressed, either against the Defendant or against the creditors of the said Robert Cunyngham, who have notwithstanding the same, a good right to resort to the said lands for the satisfaction of their demands. And in regard the said deed purported [33] to affect the said lands lying wholly in Scotland, and no part thereof in this kingdom, hoped the Court would leave the validity or insufficiency thereof, to be determined by the laws of Scotland, where the same was made, and where the said Robert Cunyngham, and the Plaintiffs, both resided at the time when the same was made. That the Plaintiff Mary, about the time when the said Deed of gift bears date, and for some time before, was by the Testator considered as the lawful wife of Captain Dalrymple, and was never acknowledged by the Testator in his lifetime as his wife, save by the said pretended will: but that he always called her by the name of Dalrymple, by which name, both the children and all the servants in the family always called her. That Robert Cunyngham, the Testator, was long before the marriage pretended between him and the Plaintiff, married to another woman (as the Defendant believed) who was still living. That the Plaintiff Mary, on being summoned before the clergy and ministers of the Church of Scotland, declared that the Plaintiff Susannah was the child of, and begot by, the said Captain James Dalrymple, her husband. That the Testator, notwithstanding his marriage, some time before his death, lived and conversed with the Plaintiff Mary in a criminal way; but was looked upon and esteemed not to have been married to her. That his father, the Testator, was about the 7th day of January, 1742, being about nine months before his death, seized with a lethargick disorder, which totally deprived him of his senses for several days; and though he afterwards grew better, and was able to get about again, yet he never recovered the perfect use of his understanding, but continued from that time in a state of dotage and unsound mind to his death, and was not capable of making a will. That from his first seizure to his death, he was not of sound mind or understanding, so as to be capable of making a will; and that he was so totally under the power of the Plaintiff, that she could prevail on him to do any thing. That it appeared by the said will, that the legacies thereby left, amounted to the sum of £8950, and the annuities thereby bequeathed, computing the same at [34] ten years' purchase, amount to the sum of £3000. And the said Testator being indebted at his death in arrear, the sum of £10,000, legacies, annuities, and debts, amounting together to near the sum of £20,000 will, if the said pretended will be established, more than exhaust all the funds and estates, real or personal, which he left at his decease; so that the Defendant, the executor therein named, and the only surviving son of the said father, and who never disoblighd him, and had then a wife and three children, to all of whom his said father in his life-time expressed the greatest affection, and who (on the face of the said will was intended to take a very beneficial interest under the same) would be entirely deprived of any provision from his said father, though the greatest part of the said estate in the West Indies came to him in right of his wife, the Defendant's late mother. And the said Defendant insisted, that, by the laws of Scotland, no lands or real estate whatsoever, are deviseable by will, but must be conveyed in the life-time of the party conveying by deed of gift. And therefore, in case the said pretended will had been duly executed by his said father, and he had the full enjoyment of his senses at the time of the execution thereof, yet the bequest therein to the Plaintiff, of all his lands and other things he had in Scotland at his decease, was a void devise; and he submitted that the Court should leave the Plaintiff to resort to such remedy in relation to the said estate in Scotland, as well under the said Deed of gift, as under the said will to which they should be entitled by the laws of Scotland, and which they should be able to obtain in that kingdom, without the interruption of this Court. That the Plaintiffs brought two several actions in the Courts of Scotland, one for the recovery of the goods, and the other for the recovery of the possession of the house and premises in Scotland. That the Lords of Session in the first of the said actions refused the Plaintiff access to the said moveable estate, till such time as the Defendant should return to Great Britain; and in the mean time ordered the same to be sold, and the money arising thereby, to be paid into the hands of the [35] Sheriff for such person as should appear to have the best right thereto; but in the other of the said actions pronounced sentence in favour of the Plaintiffs, from which last-mentioned sentence, the Defendant, Elizabeth Cunyngham, in his absence, appealed to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament. And the said Defendant saith, he having arrived in this kingdom from the West Indies before the said appeal came on, the said Defendant, Elizabeth Cunyngham had no further concern therein; and the Defendant having discovered that his father was greatly indebted at his death, and that several of his creditors had brought actions in Scotland, for the recovery of their demands out of the said estate; and that such demands would exhaust his estate and effects, the Defendant suffered the said appeal to drop. He admitted that he had been cited into the Prerogative Court, to accept or refuse the probate of the will; but being advised the same was not valid, on account of the incapacity of his father at the time when he made his will, he had declined to prove the same. That the Plaintiff Mary had applied to the Defendants McDowall and Coleman, to pay her said Annuity of £200, given to her by the said will, from the produce of the said estate in Saint Christopher's, and from that fund to pay off and discharge the funeral expenses and incumbrances on the Scotch estate, which they had refused to do on account of the invalidity of the said will. But he denied that he had spirited up or procured the said Elizabeth Kennedy to commence any suit against the Plaintiff, on purpose to load the said Scotch estate. He further answered, that he had ever since his father's death in his own right, and not as executor under the said will, been in possession of all his said father's plantation and effects in the West Indies; and that the consignments of the produce thereof, had since his death, from time to time been made to the Defendant Coleman, and that he had usually employed him as his factor, to dispose of such consignments for his use. And he insisted, that for the reasons in his answer assigned, the Plaintiffs were not entitled to have any account from him, or any other of the Defendants, of the Plantations of his said father: but in case [36] the Court should be of opinion that the Plaintiffs were entitled to such account, he submitted to be examined upon interrogatories touching the same. The said Defendant William Coleman the elder, by his answer stated, that the produce of the said estates in the West Indies, described in the will as let to the Defendant Daniel Cunyngham for the sum of £2500, was for several years before the Testator's death, consigned to the Defendant, to be disposed of here according to the general usage between planter and merchant. That for many years before, and to the time of the said Testator's death, there was a great intercourse of dealing between him and the Defendant on the account of the produce of his estate in the West Indies; and during that time, the Defendant disbursed several considerable sums of money for the said Testator. That by an account stated between the said Robert Cunyngham and the Defendant, on the 18th of August, 1731, and signed by them, there was owing from the said Robert Cunyngham to the Defendant, the sum of £4050; for securing which, together with such further sum as the Defendant should advance to or for the said Testator, a mortgage in fee of the plantation at Cayon was executed to the Defendant, and also a bond to the same effect. That the debt so due to the Defendant was increased by subsequent advances, and being very large, he had given directions to have the proper action brought in Scotland for the recovery of the same out of the said estate there; and he believed that such action had been accordingly brought, not to load the said Scotch estate, which he denied, but that all proper measures for securing so very large a debt might not be neglected; and the rather for that, by reason of the open and declared war with France and Spain, the Defendant's security on the said estates in Saint Christopher's, was become of less value than when originally made. That the produce of the said estates in Saint Christopher's had been consigned to the Defendant Cunyngham, in his own right as heir-at-law; and no part of the produce had come to his hands as trustee under the will. He desired to be at liberty to suspend his election, whether he would accept or refuse the trust till the will should be established; and insisted that [37] he was not compellable to set forth any account of the said plantation, or of the rents and profits thereof received by him, or how the same had been disposed of. But if the Court should be of opinion, that he ought to set forth such account, he submitted to be examined upon interrogatories in relation thereto.

Whereupon, and upon debate of the matter, and hearing the will of the said Testator, Robert Cunyngham, dated the 27th of October, 1743, the prayer of the Plaintiffs' bill; the answer of the said Defendant, William Coleman the elder; the answer of the said Defendant, Daniel Cunyngham; a letter from the said Defendant, William Coleman the elder, to the said Testator, Robert Cunyngham, dated the 5th of November, 1743; a letter from the said Testator, Robert Cunyngham, to the said Defendant, William Coleman the elder, and Company, dated the 20th of October, 1743; a letter from the said Defendant, Daniel Cunyngham, to Robert Wallis, dated the 7th of February, 1744; another letter from the said Defendant, Daniel Cunyngham, to the said Robert Wallis, dated the 6th of May, 1745, the decree dated the 13th of April, 1749, and the proofs taken in the cause, read.

His Lordship ordered, that the said decree be varied, and be as follows:—Declare that the said Testator Robert Cunyngham's will ought to be established, and the Trusts thereof performed; (and the court ordered and decreed the same accordingly;) and that it be referred to the said Master to take an account of what is due to the Plaintiff, Mary Cunyngham, for the arrears of the annuity of £200 a year, given her by the said Testator's will; and the said Master is also to take an account of the said Testator's debts and incumbrances, affecting his moveables and real estate in Scotland, and of all other his debts, funeral expences, and legacies, and compute interest, on such of them as carry interest; and the said Plaintiff, Mary, is to stand in the place of such creditors, who have received, or shall hereafter receive, satisfaction for their debts, out of the said moveables, and real estate in Scotland, for such sums of money as the said creditors have received, or shall receive therefrom. And it is [38] further ordered, that the said Defendants, Daniel Cunyngham, and William Coleman the elder, do come to an account before the said Master, for the rents, profits, and produce of the said Testator's plantation in St. Christopher's, called Cayon Plantation; and of the lands, and houses, in Basseterre Town, affixed, or annexed thereto by the will, with the appurtenances received by the said Defendants, Cunyngham and Coleman, or either of them, or by any other person or persons, by their, or either of their order, or for their, or either of their use. In the taking of which account, all parties are to have all just allowances; and the said Master is to make an allowance of interest, accrued on the said mortgage made by the said Testator in his life-time, of the said Cayon Plantation, to the said Defendant Coleman, and out of what shall be coming on such account, of the rents, profits, and produce, of the said Testator's said plantation, called Cayon Plantation, and lands, and houses, in Bassetterre Town, affixed, or annexed thereto as aforesaid, with the appurtenances, the several debts and incumbrances of the said testator, affecting his moveables and real estate in Scotland, are to be paid and satisfied. And it is further ordered, that the said Plaintiff, Mary Cunyngham, be paid thereout such of the said debts and incumbrances, as have been or shall be paid out of the said testator's said moveables and real estate in Scotland; and also such costs and damages as the said Plaintiff, Mary Cunyngham, has been put unto or sustained by reason of any action or suits brought by the said creditor's relating thereto, to be settled by the said Master, and also what shall be found due to her for the arrears of her said annuity of £200 a year. And it is further ordered, that the said Defendants do pay and apply what shall be found due from them respectively on the said account accordingly; and also out of the rents and profits and produce of the said plantation, called Cayon Plantation, and the said lands and houses in Bassetterre Town to be received, the said Plaintiff, Mary Cunyngham, is to be paid her said annuity of £200 a year, as the same shall become due according to the directions of the said Testator's will; and after satisfaction of the said testator's debts, etc. it is ordered that the said Defendant Cole-[39]-man do make his election before the said Master, whether he will continue to act in the trust under the will, and postpone the payment of his own incumbrance on the estate before-mentioned pursuant to the said testator's will: and if he shall elect so to do, it is further ordered, that the said Defendant, Daniel Cunyngham, do from time to time consign and send over the profits and produce of, etc. to the said Defendant Coleman, to be applied by him according to the said testator's will, and this decree. But if the said Defendant Coleman shall elect, not to continue to act in the said trust, and to postpone the satisfaction of his said incumbrances on the said estate, pursuant to the said will, it is further ordered, that in that case, it be referred to the said Master, to appoint a proper person in London, to whom the said Defendant, Daniel Cunyngham, shall consign and send over the profits and produce of the plantation, lands, and houses, before-mentioned, to be disposed of and applied, according to the directions of the said testator's will, and this decree. And the said Defendant Cunyngham, is accordingly, from time to time, to consign and send over the said profits and produce to such person so to be appointed.*

The principal question between the material parties to the suit in the Court of Chancery appears again, in 1758, to have become the subject of litigation in the Court of Session in Scotland. An abstract of the facts, and the judgment in the case, is given by Lord Kaims, in his Decisions, vol. iii. p. 25, in the following terms:—

[40] A person possessed of one estate in the island of St. Christopher's, and another in Scotland, executed a testament upon his death-bed in Scotland; by which he bequeathed to his son the estate in St. Christopher's, with the burthen of his debts; and by another clause, he bequeathed the estate in Scotland to his wife, and her heirs. A creditor of the defunct's having adjudged the estate in Scotland, the relief brought a suit in Chancery, against the son, and other trustees, for having the Scotch estate relieved of the debts out of the produce of that in St. Christopher's. The will was established by the Chancellor's decree, and the Scotch estate ordained to be relieved of the debts. The relief having claimed the lands conform to the testament, it was pleaded for the son, in a multiplepoinding, brought by the tenants, that the legacy was void, as the lands could not, by our law, be conveyed by a testamentary deed. Answered for the relict, that as the testament had been found valid by the law of England to convey the estate in St. Christopher's in favour of the son, who was residuary legatee of that estate, and had a lucrative succession, he was thereby barred from challenging the settlement made in the same deed of the Scotch estate. The Lords found, that the son could not quarrel the conveyance by legacy of the Scotch estate; and preferred the relict.*

On the 5th of May, 1819, the judgments of the Court below were varied by a declaration that the Appellants could have no claim to a life-interest [41] in the personalty, either as next of kin or in any other way; subject to that variation they were affirmed. And the cause was remitted for judgment upon the question whether, as by the terms of the Duke's settlement the residue is declared not to be payable till after the death of his sisters, the residuary legatees are intitled to demand payment thereof immediately.†

SCOTLAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

PATON,—Appellant; BREBNER and another.—Respondents [April 7, 1819].

A lessee becoming purchaser takes upon himself the covenants or warranties of the lessor.

A. and B. having a lease for years of lands "with the privilege of taking water from an adjoining river, for the purpose of driving machinery, etc." which

* The question of election has occurred most frequently upon the wills of persons who had been domiciled in privileged places, where the old customary laws of distribution prevail, as London, York, etc. Upon the general doctrine of Election and Compensation, in addition to the cases cited in the argument, see Noys v. Mordaunt, 2 Vern. Rep. 581, and the cases collected in Mr. Raithby's Note. See also Cary v. Askew, 2 Cox's C. C. 241; Forrester v. Cotton, 2 Eden's C. C. 532; Vnett v. Wilkes, Id. 187; Arnold v. Kempsford, Id. 256; E. of Northumberland v. M. of Granby, Id. 189; and Green v. Green, 2 Meriv. 86.

† In the law which regulates Election and Compensation, and the doctrine of Approbate and Reprobate, the distinction between the cases where the bequests, gifts, or limitations are contained in one instrument, and where they are several, has been the subject of strong observation in the arguments of the principal case. Upon this question it is to be remarked that a similar principle is acknowledged, in applying what is called the Rule in Shelley's Case. If there be in a will or deed a limitation to A. for life, directly or resulting by implication, and in the same instrument a limitation to the heirs of A. the two limitations, by the operation of the rule above-mentioned, give an immediate executed estate of inheritance to the ancestor; but it is otherwise where the two limitations are in different instruments, although the one refer to the other, as where lands were given by deed to A. for life, and by a will a remainder in the said lands was given to the heirs of the body of A., although the estate for life given by the deed was recited in the will, it was held that they did not unite so as to give an estate tail to A. but that the heirs of his body took by purchase. Fonnereau v. Fonnereau, Doug. Rep. 470. Yet there is one case, Hayes v. Foorde, 2 Black. Rep. 698, in which the two limitations being on separate and distinct papers, viz. a will referring to a schedule which was annexed, both instruments having been published at the same time, with the same solemnities and attestation, and the jury by their special verdict (upon which the case was argued) having found as a fact that the schedule was part of the will, the Court considered them as several parts of the same instrument, and held the rule in Shelley's Case to be applicable. The grounds upon which these similar rules in different branches of law have been adopted, would be found, upon investigation, to differ perhaps materially. But the limits of a note do not admit of such an inquiry.

lease and privilege were warranted to the lessees, they enter into a contract with the lessor, in which it is expressed, "that the lessor agrees to grant a feu-charter of the lands under lease, with all the right members, privileges, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or which ever have been competent to the heritor of the said lands to claim and enjoy. It being the intention of the parties thereto, that all rights and privileges of or belonging to the said lands formerly leased, should be feudally conveyed by the lessor to the lessees, etc." It was insisted by the lessees, that under this contract they were intitled to have a feu-charter executed according to the words of the lease. But the House of Lords reversing the judgment of the Court of Sessions, decided, that the feu-charter must follow the words of the contract; and Eldon, Chancellor, in moving from the judgment, intimated his opinion that the privilege of taking water from the river, was not included in the words, or legal import of the contract.

The Appellant in this case was proprietor of an estate called Grandhome, on the northern bank of the river Don, near the city of Aberdeen. The Respondents were at first lessees, and afterwards pending the leases, purchasers under feu-contracts of lands forming part of the estate of Grandhome, with certain rights and privileges [43] which in the feu-contracts were expressed in words differing from those inserted in the leases.

The question between the parties to the appeal was, whether the feu-contracts (or agreements for sale and purchase) were to be carried into execution by inserting in the feu-charter (or deed of conveyance) the words respecting privileges, as expressed in the leases, or those which appeared in the feu-contracts.

On the 20th of February,* 1792, articles of lease, between John Paton, (the Appellant) on the one part, and Messrs. Brebner, and Hadden, (the Respondents) and Thomas Leys, (a partner of the Respondents, since deceased,) on the other part, were drawn up and signed by the parties.

By the first article, "the said John Paton sets and lets in tack to the saids Alexander Brebner, James Hadden, and Thomas Leys, and to their heirs and assignees, for the space of 99 years, from and after the term of Whitsunday in the year 1793, for payment of the yearly rent, and upon the other conditions underwritten, all and whole the haugh of Mains of Grandhome, consisting of, etc."

By the second article it is agreed, "that the said tacksmen and their foresaids shall have the privilege and liberty of taking in water from the river Don for the purpose of driving machinery and other uses, and of cutting canals through [44] the said grounds, as they shall judge necessary; with the privilege of all roads to the bridge of Don and Aberdeen, and such right to a passage-boat across the said river Don, opposite to their grounds, as the said John Paton may have to give; together with the privilege of quarrying stones, to be used for any purposes which the said tacksmen shall think proper upon the grounds hereby set, on such parts of the hill of Grandhome as shall not happen to be planted or improved, also in any other quarries on said estate already opened or to be opened by the heritor, or by others having his authority; and that the said John Paton, either as proprietor of the lands hereby set, or as an heritor of the cruives, shall allow, as far as he can, the said tacksmen to discharge their water on any part of the said haugh they may see proper; and whatever trees the said tacksmen shall plant, that they shall have liberty to cut or dispose of the same during the lease."

By the third article, it is agreed between the parties, "that the said tacksmen shall have liberty at any time betwixt the date hereof and the said term of Whitsunday 1793 years, to cut a canal through the said grounds for the purpose of introducing water, upon allowing to the present tenant the amount of whatever damage he shall be found to have sustained thereby, as the same shall be ascertained by two arbiters, to be mutually chosen, with liberty to them, if they should happen to differ, to choose an oversman for finally determining the same; and farther, if [45] the said tacksmen shall think proper, in the mean time, to erect any houses upon any part of the grounds above described hereby set, that they shall have liberty to do so, upon their indemnifying the present tenant of the damage which he may also thereby sustain, as the same shall be ascertained in like manner by proper judges, to be mutually chosen by the parties."

By the fourth article, "the saids Alexander Brebner, James Hadden, and Thomas Leys, agreed, etc. to pay to the said John Paton, etc. for the lands set to them as above, at the rate of £3 sterling for each acre thereof, but with a deduction therefrom yearly of £7 17s. 6d. sterling, on account of the barren ground comprehended therein; and also with a deduction from said rent of £1 11s. 6d. sterling yearly, for each acre of the foresaid pieces of ground called the Devil's Hillock and the Lowing-ill Hillock, the said sum of £3 per acre, to be in full for rent, multure, and every thing else exigible by the heritor, and to be payable at Martinmas and Whitsunday, after shearing each crop, by equal portions, with interest thereafter till paid, and a fifth part more of liquidate penalty in case of faillie; and also, they became bound to build, upon their own expence, a sufficient march-dike of stones, as far as the head or west end of Downie's Hillock, and to uphold the same during this lease."

By the fifth article, it is agreed, "that the said tacksmen shall be obliged to erect and make out [46] a bleachfield or manufactory upon the said haugh; but, on account of the expensive buildings which they must thereby erect, the heritor to be obliged to pay or allow for such buildings as may be standing on the grounds so set at the issue of this lease, the value thereof to the extent of £500 sterling, including mason, smith, slater, glazier, and wright work, according as the same shall be ascertained by skilful persons to be mutually chosen by the heritor and tacksmen; but that the said tacksmen shall have right to remove whatever machinery they may see proper."

By the sixth article, it is agreed, "that the said tacksmen shall be obliged to carry all the grindable grain which may grow on the lands so set to them, and which they may have occasion to grind, to the mill of Grandhome, and to pay the miller for his trouble in grinding the same the one-and-fortieth peck; and if the mill is frequented by the said tenants, they are to join in supporting the same and the dam-dike, as the other tenants, in proportion to their ground."

By the seventh article, it is agreed, "that the tenants of Mains of Grandhome and Denstown, and the heritor for his own use, shall have the use of the road through the haugh of Rappahanna for all purposes whatsoever; but that the other tenants shall only have right to use it as a foot-road; but if the present road shall interfere with their operations, the said tacksmen shall have full liberty to turn the said road to the lower part of the haugh."

[47] By the eighth article, it is provided that, "if, in using any of the aforesaid quarries, the said tacksmen shall happen to go into inclosures or improved grounds, that they shall be obliged to make good to those concerned any damage which may be occasioned thereby."

By the ninth article, "the said John Paton reserves to himself and his foresaids a right to allow stones to be carried to the cruives along the haugh of Rappahanna as formerly; and if the heritors of the cruives shall have occasion to build more houses for the accommodation of their fishings, the said John Paton thereby reserves for that purpose, from the lands thereby set, a space of ground equal to what they at present occupy, adjoining thereto, and that without any diminution from the rent above-mentioned; and the heritors of the cruives are to have liberty of laying down stones as formerly along the river, on their making an acknowledgment therefore to the said tacksmen, as they now do to the present tenant."

Under a provision contained in the preceding articles, and in pursuance of the contract, a lease was executed, bearing date the 31st of March, 1797, by which "it is contracted, finally ended, and mutually covenanted and agreed upon, between John Paton, Esq. of Grandhome, heritable proprietor of the lands after-mentioned, on the one part, and Alexander Brebner, James Hadden, and Thomas Leys, all merchants in Aberdeen, on the other part, in manner and to the effect following: That is to say, Whereas [48] by articles and conditions of lease entered into and executed between the said parties, of date the 20th day of February, 1792, the said John Paton, etc. And whereas, in consequence, and upon the faith of the foresaid articles and conditions of lease, the saids Alexander Brebner, James Hadden, and Thomas Leys, have, at a very great expence, cut a canal through the grounds set to them, as above, and that they have thereby introduced water from the river Don, for the purposes of the manufactory and machinery already erected, or that may hereafter be erected, upon the premises, and that they have also erected various buildings, and made sundry other considerable improvements upon the foresaid lands: And whereas both the said parties are now desirous, in further implement of the foresaid articles and conditions of lease, to enter into the tack under-written by way of amplification and extension of the foresaid articles and conditions of lease, and for ascertaining the precise rent or tack-duty to be payable by the tacksmen above-named, and their foresaids, to the said John Paton and his above-written; but always without hurt or prejudice of the before-mentioned articles and conditions of lease, and only in further corroboration thereof by the said parties respectively: Therefore the said John Paton, for him, his heirs and successors whomsoever, on the one part, hereby not only ratifies, homologates, and approves of the articles and conditions of lease above deduced, in the hail heads, articles [49] clauses, and conditions thereof, prestable or binding upon him as proprietor of the said land, with all that has followed thereon, excepting only in as far as is now precisely fixed and determinately ascertained by these presents; but also, by these presents, in further implement and extension of the same, on his part, of new sets, and in tack and assedation lets to the saids Alexander Brebner, James Hadden, and Thomas Leys, and to their heirs and assignees, for the space of ninety-six years, etc. all and whole the foresaid haugh of Mains of Grandhome, consisting of, etc. together with the whole liberties and privileges of favour of the said tacksmen, particularly specified in the articles and conditions of lease above-mentioned, to which reference is hereby had for that purpose, and which shall remain as effectual and binding upon the said John Paton and his foresaids as if the same had been again herein particularly enumerated and expressed, etc. But excepting always from this lease that piece of ground feued off by the said John Paton to the heritors or proprietors of the cruive fishings upon the Don, as the same has been lately inclosed. Which tack, with and under the reservations and declarations above written, the said John Paton binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors, to warrant to the saids Alexander Brebner, James Hadden, and Thomas Leys, and their foresaids, at all hands, and against all deadly, as law will. And, on the other part, the saids Alexander Brebner, James Hadden, [50] and Thomas Leys, not only hereby ratify, homologate, and approve of the articles and conditions of lease above-mentioned, in the hail heads, articles, clauses, and conditions thereof binding and prestable upon them, with all that has followed thereon, excepting only in as far as are now precisely fixed and determinately ascertained by these presents; but also, in consideration of said lease, and privileges thereby granted to them, bind and oblige themselves, etc. to make payment to the said John Paton, etc. of the sum of £202 8s. 3d. sterling, and that in full of rent, multures, or services, for the subjects and privileges so let to them, etc. yearly, in the name of tack-duty."

By an agreement entered into between the Appellant and Respondents, dated 3d and 9th February, 1810, reciting the effect of the leases theretofore made, and still subsisting, it is agreed, "That the said John Paton shall forthwith establish, and make out a good and satisfactory title in his own person, as heritable proprietor of the lands therein-before specified; and, moreover, upon the request of the said Alexander Brebner and James Hadden, (Thomas Leys being dead), in consideration of the purchase-money, and subject to the annual feu-duty therein after to be mentioned, by sufficient and proper conveyances in the law, but at the cost and charge of the said Alexander Brebner and James Hadden, he, the said John Paton, shall and will grant one or more feu-charters to and in favour of the said Alexander Brebner [51] and James Hadden, their heirs, executors, and assigns, or as they shall direct, over and upon all the lands therein before-mentioned and referred to, comprising Old Grandhome, Grandhome Haugh, Downie's Hillock, Chapel Park of Mains of Grandhome, and others, by whatsoever names or descriptions known, which are comprised in the leases theretofore granted to the said Thomas Leys, Alexander Brebner, and James Hadden, jointly, and in the lease granted to the said James Hadden individually, with the small addition since made thereto, and for which lands they now pay a rent of £315 5s. 10½d. in the whole, with all the rights, members, privileges, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or which ever have been competent to the heritor of the said lands to claim and enjoy; it being the intention of the parties thereto, that all rights and privileges of, or belonging to, the said lands formerly leased to the said Thomas Leys, Alexander Brebner, and James Hadden, jointly, and to the said James Hadden individually, for a limited period, (including also the aforesaid three additional acres) shall now be feudally and for ever conveyed by the said John Paton to the said Alexander Brebner and James Hadden, their heirs, executors, and assigns, or as they shall direct; in consideration whereof, the said Alexander Brebner and James Hadden hereby agree to pay to the said John Paton, his heirs, executors, or assigns, the sum of £5000 sterling money, at the term of Whitsunday next ensuing the date thereof; and more-[52]-over, to pay to the said John Paton, his heirs, executors, or assigns, the sum of £345 5s. 10½d. yearly, as a feu-duty for ever of and upon the several premises herein before described. And it is hereby further agreed, by and between the said parties, that if, on or before the 1st day of April, 1810, the said Alexander Brebner and James Hadden, or their heirs, executors, or assigns shall be inclined to purchase up and redeem the said annual feu-duty, it shall be competent to them, and they shall have an option so to do, upon paying a consideration therefor, equal to 25 years amount of the said annual feu-duty."

By a tack, dated the 26th of October, 1797, it is contracted, ended, and agreed betwixt John Paton of Grandhome, heritable proprietor of the lands, and others under-written, on the one part, and Alexander Brebner, Thomas Leys, and James Hadden, merchants in Aberdeen, on the other part, in manner following, that is to say, whereas the said Alexander Brebner, Thomas Leys, and James Hadden, have fixed on the grounds hereinafter described, as affording an eligible situation for the erection of machinery fitted for manufacturing purposes, and have in that view agreed with the said John Paton for the lease under-written, and for the liberty and privilege of taking water from the river Don by a canal or cut for serving such machinery, and for other purposes connected with any manufactory or manufactories to be [53] erected by them on the grounds after-mentioned. Therefore, and for completing the said agreement, the said John Paton hath set, and by these presents for him, his heirs and successors, whomsoever, but with and under the conditions, declarations, limitations, and reservations under-written, and for payment of the rents and others after specified, sets and in tack and assedation lets to the saids Alexander Brebner, Thomas Leys, and James Hadden, equally among them, and to their heirs, assignees, or subtenants, for the space of one hundred and twenty-nine years, from, etc. all and whole the crofts of land called the Crofts of Craighaar of Grandhome, etc. together with that patch of planted ground lying betwixt the said crofts and the river Don; and also, etc. Moreover, the said John Paton hath given and granted, and by these presents for him and his foresaids, gives, grants, and lets to the saids Alexander Brebner, Thomas Leys, and James Hadden, equally among them and their above-written, for the space and term of one hundred and twenty-nine years above-mentioned, from and after the said term of the commencement hereof, the full right, privilege, and liberty of taking off water from the river Don, and of digging, making, embanking, and maintaining a canal, cut, or water-draught, communicating with and conveying water from the said river at or near, etc. together also with the sole and exclusive use, benefit, right, and privilege to the tacksmen above-named and their foresaids, of the said canal or water-draught, and of all and [54] every fall or falls of water which they shall think proper to make and be able to establish along the course of the same, within the limits of the lands set to them as above for the purpose of any manufactory or manufactories they may think proper to erect and carry on upon the premises at any time or times during the term of years above-written; and with full power, etc. as also, in regard it will be necessary for the tacksmen above-named to build, at a considerable expence, various houses for the purpose of their intended manufactories, on the grounds above set to them, of which expence it is reasonable that they should be indemnified at the issue of this lease to a certain extent, the said John Paton therefore binds and obliges himself and his above-written at that period, to pay to the said tacksmen and their foresaids the value of such houses as they may then have or leave standing thereon, according to the appreciation of persons of skill, to be mutually named by the parties at the time, in which valuation is to be included stones, brick, timber, slate, tyle, iron, glass, plaister, and lead work: but the proprietor shall not be obliged to pay for such buildings or materials to a higher amount than £1500 sterling: and the tacksmen shall be at liberty to remove their machinery and implements of manufacture of all kinds, wherewith it is hereby declared the proprietor is to have no concern, the same being understood to be the absolute property of the tacksmen, etc. for which causes, and on the other part, Alexander Brebner, etc. [55] bind themselves, etc. to make payment and satisfaction to the said John Paton, etc. of the yearly rents, duties, and consideration money under-written, that is to say, of the sum of £13 sterling in full of rent, miltures, and services, for the crofts of Craighaar and whole, etc.—Item, of the sum of £100 money foresaid in the name of rent or consideration money for the grant or privilege of taking water from the river Don, and of making, using, and maintaining the foresaid intended canal or water-draught, with the benefit and use of the fall or falls of water to be obtained thereby for the purposes before expressed, and other privileges before enumerated connected therewith, etc.”

By an instrument, dated the 19th and 23d of May, 1810,* “it is contracted between John Paton, etc. and A. Brebner, etc. that John Paton, in consideration of the feu-duties, sums of money, and other prestations after specified, hath sold, and in feu-farm and heritage disposed to the said Alexander Brebner and James Hadden, equally between them, and their heirs and assignees whomsoever, all and whole those parts of the lands and estate of Grandhome called Persleys, with the whole other possessions, waterfalls, quarries, privileges, and pertinents of the same, as at present enjoyed by and under lease or [56] leases to the partner or partners of the company trade carried on at Aberdeen and Persley, under the firm of Milne, Cruden, and Company, etc. Moreover, the said John Paton sells and disposes to the said Alexander Brebner and James Hadden, and their foresaids, (subject to the feu-duty after-mentioned) all and whole these crofts of land called the Crofts of Craighaar of Grandhome, with the whole other grounds, waterfalls, privileges, and pertinents specified and described in a lease thereof, bearing date the 26th day of October, 1797, etc. But reserving always to the said John Paton, his heirs and successors, the right of fishing in the river Don, opposite to and along the whole of the lands above mentioned, etc.”

After the signing of the agreements, the Respondents paid £5500 to the Appellant, on account of the purchase money, for which the agent of the Appellant gave a receipt in the following terms: “For a feu-right to be granted in their favor by Mr. Paton, on the lands of, etc. in the terms of two agreements, entered into between them dated, etc.” The Respondents, from the respective dates of the leases until the signing of the contracts of sale, had been in possession of the premises as lessees. They had erected machinery at a great cost, and had exercised the right of drawing water from the river, with the other rights granted under the leases. Shortly after the signature of the contracts, the Respondents called upon the Appellant to fulfil the contracts by executing a feu-charter. Thereupon [57] differences arose between the parties, as to the terms in which those contracts ought to be carried into execution. The Appellant proposed to grant a charter in the terms of the agreement which he had signed. The Respondents insisted that the charter should comprehend the clauses contained in the leases to them, and to Milne, Cruden, respectively, and Co. with absolute warrandice of all the rights granted by the leases to use the water of the Don, as rights and privileges warranted to belong to the lands. The clauses by the Respondents proposed to be inserted were as follows:—“That John Paton, etc. in consideration, etc. in feu-farm disposes, etc. to A. Brebner, etc. all the lands of Grandhome, (the lands in the first agreement) etc. together with the privilege and liberty of taking in water from the river Don, for the purpose of driving machinery and other uses, and of cutting canals, etc. As also that piece of ground, etc. (under lease to Milne, Cruden, and Co. being the lands in the second agreement) together with the privilege, etc. of taking off water from the river Don, and digging, etc. a canal, etc. and conveying water from the said river, etc. for serving machinery,” etc.

After a long negotiation carried on to adjust these differences, a feu-charter was drawn up by the Appellant's agent, containing the clauses contended for by the Respondents. The only matter in difference then remaining to be settled, as the Respondents represented, was, whether a clause of irritancy ob non solutum canonem, should be inserted in the charter, the Appellant claiming [58] and the Respondents resisting the introduction of such a clause. The differences being brought to this point, the matter was referred, upon a case drawn up and signed by the parties, to Mr. Cathcart, now one of the Lords of Session, who gave his award against the Appellant.*

The Appellant having finally refused to execute a feu-charter, containing the clauses proposed by the Respondents, an action for implement of the agreements was commenced in the Court of Session. The summons (after setting forth the agreements, the draft of a feu-charter, the negotiations, the single point to which the differences were reduced, the case reciting that fact, signed by the Appellant, and the award) concludes by praying, that "the said John Paton should be decerned and ordained, by decree of the Lords [59] of Council and Session, to execute and deliver a feu-charter in favour of the pursuers, in terms of the foresaid draft thereof, and relative description of marches, both herewith produced and referred to, salvo justo calculo, as to the feu duties specified in the clause of reddendo thereof. That he should produce a legal and sufficient feudal title in his person, to the said lands and others foresaid, for establishing his right to grant the said feu-charter in favour of the pursuers, and that he should be decerned to purge all real incumbrances affecting the said lands and others, and to convey the same unincumbered to the pursuers."

The defences to the action consisted of three points:

1st. It is admitted by the defender that he entered into the obligations contained in the two agreements; but that these agreements contain no obligation whatever upon the defender to admit or introduce into the feu-charter the clauses contained in the draft of the feu-charter produced, whereby it is proposed to bind the defender specially to grant to the pursuers power and liberty to take water from the river Don, for the purpose of serving the machineries and manufactories already established and to be established by them, and also to grant absolute warrandice of these privileges and liberties of taking the water, because he might expose himself to future actions of damages at their instance, to a far greater extent than the whole price he was to receive for the feus in question. That [60] the pursuers having made a cut of great extent, for the purpose of taking a great quantity of water from the river Don, to serve their machinery and manufactures, they have been opposed and judicially interdicted from proceeding farther, by the proprietors of the salmon-fishings in the river Don, and the question is still in dependence.

2dly. The special conclusion of the summons being, that the defender "should be decerned to grant feu-charters, not in terms of the feu-agreements previously entered into, but in terms of a scroll or draft of a feu-charter produced and founded on by the pursuers," this conclusion of the action is utterly untenable. His intention in the feu-agreements having been to put the pursuers precisely in his own place, as proprietor of the lands to be feued, with all the privileges belonging to such right of property; but more than this he never agreed, nor can be bound in law to grant.

3dly. The defender never, at any time, agreed to dispoise or convey to the pursuers, the liberty and privilege of taking water at pleasure from the Don, which, as an individual heritor on the banks of that river, he had perhaps no right to grant and which it would be most imprudent and dangerous in him to warrant to the pursuers. The defender never attested, or meant to attest, that part of the case laid before Mr. Cathcart, which stated that all parties were agreed upon the whole clauses contained in the proposed scroll, or draft, of a feu-charter, except the clause of conventional irritancy ob non solutum canonem; on the contrary, [61] at the very time when the defender returned to Dr. Daunev the case to be laid before Mr. Cathcart, he accompanied it by a holograph writing in these terms: "As Mr. Cathcart will have the agreement and copy of the feu-charter all before him, he will see exactly my situation, might I not have his opinion by itself on that head, as to my being obliged to warrant all these powers of taking in water from the river. It was what I had no idea of at the time I entered into these agreements; as, by selling the property, I thought I placed the purchaser exactly in the place I was in before."

* By the pleadings in the court below, and in the printed case presented to the House of Lords, it was alleged by the Respondent, that the Appellant had finally settled and approved the feu-charter, with the exception stated in the text, and had given up his objection to execute the charter with a clause, giving the right to take water from the Don. This allegation was contradicted by the Appellant, who averred that he had annexed to the case submitted to Mr. Cathcart, a writing, or letter, in which he desired that the question as to the privilege of taking water from the Don, might be considered and decided by the arbitrator. But this collateral question as to the case submitted to arbitration, and the effect of the award, does not seem to have been much discussed in the court below, nor to have been considered as a material ingredient in the formation of the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, or the Court of Session. It was necessary to state in the text the facts as they appear upon the pleading in the court below, because the Lord Chancellor, in moving the judgment in the House of Lords, adverts to this branch of the matters in dispute between the parties.

The action was brought to hearing before Lord Alloway, as Ordinary, on the 9th of February, 1811, when his Lordship pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lord Ordinary, having heard parties' procurators on the libel, and grounds of defence, appoints the defender, within fourteen days, to prepare and lodge in the process the draught of a feu-charter, containing all the clauses and obligations which he considers himself bound and is willing to grant to the pursuers, in reference to the whole subjects in question."

After this, Mr. Paton put into process two separate draughts of feu-charters, or contracts, the one applicable to the subjects contained in the first feu-agreement, and the other relative to the subjects in the second agreement. The Respondents were allowed to be heard in objection to these proposed deeds, and the Lord Ordinary afterwards pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lord Ordinary, having considered the original [62] agreements betwixt the parties, and the draft of the feu-contracts produced in implement of these agreements, the minute given in by the pursuers, as containing objections to the feu-contracts produced by the defender, and answers thereto, together with the whole process,—finds, that two specific agreements, etc. finds, that the first feu-contract should proceed narrativè, by reciting verbatim the whole of the agreement entered into betwixt the pursuers and defender upon the 3d and 9th February, 1810, and state, that in implement of that agreement, the present feu-contract has been entered into betwixt the parties: finds, that the feu-contract should then contain an exact description of the subjects contained in the leases specially referred to in the agreement; and if the parties are agreed that a more minute and particular description of any part of the subjects should be inserted, it may, with their mutual consent, be inserted in this part of the deed; but if they do not agree, then the very words used in the description of the subjects in the leases should be adopted, and the feu-contract shall dispoise and confer all the rights and privileges contained in the leases as to those subjects contained in the leases; and with regard to the additional space of land contained in the agreement, but not included in the former leases therein referred to, finds, that this land must be conveyed, with all the rights, members, privileges, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or which ever have been competent to the heritors of the said lands to claim and enjoy: [63] finds, that the second feu-contract* shall also recite the precise terms of the second agreement entered into by the parties upon the 19th and 23d May, 1810, and that it shall in like manner narrate the whole of that agreement; and also, that the description of the subjects feued shall contain the whole subjects under lease to Milne, Cruden, and Company; and that with regard to the additional subjects thereby feued, they shall be conveyed in terms of the agreement, together with all the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereto belonging, or which ever have been competent to the heritors of the said lands to claim and enjoy: finds, that the defender is not entitled to insert any reservation with regard to the lands feued, as to his right of cutting and quarrying stones: finds, that the clause introduced by the pursuers as to the roads ought to be adopted: finds, that with regard to the crofts of Craighaar, there is no difference betwixt the parties, as the defender consents that the clause proposed shall apply to them in terms of the lease thereof: finds, that the great anxiety of the parties seems to arise from the different views which they entertain of the effect of the clauses contained in the leases, and whether the proprietor under the leases had warranted any other than a legal use of the water, or those rights and privileges which the proprietor upon the bank of a river is entitled to exercise: finds, that, however beneficial it might be to both parties to be acquainted with their precise rights, and the guarantee undertaken under the [64] existing leases referred to, yet as there is no declaratory action to that effect, the Lord Ordinary has not the means of determining that question: appoints each of the parties to prepare a feu-contract upon each of the agreements, in terms of this interlocutor, as the Lord Ordinary, in case of their differing with regard to the arrangement of the clauses, will remit to some conveyancer of eminence, to report upon the proposed deeds."

Against this interlocutor Mr. Paton complained by representation to the Lord Ordinary, and twice reclaimed by petition to the whole Court. But the Courts respectively refused the prayers of the petitioner, and adhered without variation to the interlocutor pronounced. Whereupon Mr. Paton, the defender in the Court below, presented his appeal to parliament.

For the Appellants—Mr. Wetherell and Mr. Heald. For the Respondents—the Solicitor General and Mr. Lumsden.*

The Lord Chancellor. The question arising out of this case may be presented accurately, by stating, that it was, whether the Lord Ordinary in an interlocutor of the 2d of June, 1814, had rightly construed the feu-contract in question, when in his interlocutor he directed that it should be carried into execution in these words: "And the feu-contract shall dispoise and confer all the rights and privileges contained in the leases as [65] to those subjects contained in the leases." The subsequent interlocutors of the Court of Session appear to me simply to affirm what the Lord Ordinary had so directed to be done, and therefore it is only necessary to consider the effect of his interlocutor to arrive at a decision of the present question.

The summons, according to the literal effect of it, is a summons calling upon the Appellant to execute a draft which had been drawn, pursuant to the award of Mr. Cathcart; and it called upon him also to produce a legal and sufficient feudal title in his person, to the "said lands and others foresaid." The meaning of this must be, that he was to produce a legal and sufficient feudal title in his person, to the lands and others foresaid privileges which are now claimed. It was impossible he should ever produce a feudal title to appurtenances and privileges which do not belong to the lands. In such case, his obligation would rest only in covenant or agreement.

It struck me that it would have been very important to consider whether the Respondents could succeed at all, unless they succeeded in obtaining a decree from the Court of Session, calling upon the Appellant to execute that draft. To answer the difficulty, it was urged, that the party against whom this summons was levied, had waived the right of raising such a question: because he finally rested his defence upon the ground that he was required by the Respondents to grant certain privileges which were not within the terms or the intent of his contract. And it was farther argued, that if this Court should be [66] of opinion, that, according to the true intent of the contract, the Appellant could not be required to execute such a feu, the case ought to be remitted to the Court of Session, upon the question arising out of the reference to Mr. Cathcart and his award: Because he, as an arbitrator, chosen by the parties, and upon a case settled and signed, had directed that the Appellant should execute a feu-charter according to the draft produced in process. Upon that question I am of opinion, that if the Respondents, knowing the circumstances, present their appeal here, insisting that the Appellant has waived his objection to the form of the interlocutor, as being inconsistent with the conclusion of the summons, they cannot revert to the question upon the award; and then assuming, that the Appellant has in fact waived the technical objection, the parties by their own acts have narrowed the matter of controversy, and the judgment of the House is confined to this point, what is the feu, which, according to the previous contract, the one was bound to execute, and the other to accept without reference to the award?

* The most material of the arguments at the bar are noticed in the judgment. The reasons for and against the appeal are to be found in the printed cases.

This suit is in substance or effect, (allowing for dissimilarities between English and Scotch proceedings), in the nature of a suit in a court of equity in England, for the specific performance of a contract. In such a suit, if it turns out that the Defendant cannot make a title to that which he has agreed to convey, the Court will not compel him to convey something less, with indemnity against the risk of eviction. The purchaser [67] is left to seek his remedy at law, in damages for the breach of the agreement.* In the case now under consideration, the summons prays that the Appellant may make a feudal title to the lands [68] and others. Supposing the word others to mean liberties: if he could make a feudal title to all the liberties in question in this cause, it would be exactly like a case in the English Courts, where the Defendant can make a title, and where he would be ordered specifically to perform his agreement.

In a case like the present, where no title can be made, it is the practice, I presume, of the Court of Session to direct, (as they seem to have done in this case), that the vendor shall make a title as far as he can: and for all that is defective: for all such parts of the contract as he cannot specifically perform, they compel him to enter into warrandice, and render himself liable in damages. The question has been argued at the bar, and is discussed in the printed papers before the House, whether that is the course which the Court of Session ought to have taken. In the view which I take of the case, it is not necessary to decide that question.

Before I advert to the several instruments upon which this question occurs, I will state what I conceive to be the settled doctrine of English law upon the subject now in discussion. If a lease be made of a house or an estate, the lessor having no title,—and the instrument by which the lease is made contain nothing more than words of demise, with a general covenant that the lessee shall enjoy the premises, that is as long as the relation of lessor and lessee continues.—In such a case, the lessee does not usually look into the lessor's title, but he takes a covenant which binds the lessor, that he shall have the enjoyment of the thing [69] demised. But if that lessee afterwards becomes the purchaser of the inheritance of the estate, the consequence is, that having assumed the character of vendee, it becomes his duty to call upon the vendor to show that he can make a title to the inheritance: and, as vendee, he subjects himself to the necessity of using diligence to investigate that title which he takes or refuses, as he may be advised. With respect to covenants, he can have nothing more from that very person who, as lessor, had entered into an absolute covenant, if I may so express it, for his enjoying the premises in the relation of lessee. He can have no covenants, except such as belong to the title and interest vested in the individual who, ceasing to be lessor, takes upon himself the new character of vendor. If he claims his estate under a will, the vendor covenants only against the acts of his deviser and himself. If he claims by descent, his covenant is adapted to that species of title; but in as much as he, and those under whom he claims, had taken the title at the hazard of limited covenants, he transmits the estate and title with such limited covenants from himself; and the relation of vendor and vendee, when acquired by conveyance of the inheritance, puts an end to the covenants, though ever so large and general, which existed between lessor and lessee.

* In the English Courts of Equity, the general rule is, that a vendor shall not be compelled to give an indemnity. Balmanno v. Lumley, 1 Ves. and Bea. 221. The purchaser has no remedy for defect of title, but by action at law for the damage he has suffered by the non-performance of the contract. But in a case where the subject was a church lease, and the contract in effect, as construed by the Chancellor, was, that C. and his representatives should use their utmost endeavours to obtain renewals before expiration, so as to give an interest for 63 years to the vendee; and the right and interest, by such means of renewal, was to be secured to the vendee according to the contract by a covenant, binding all the real and personal assets which C. should leave at his death: and it proved, that the bulk of C.'s property was bound up by an entail, and therefore the covenant which the vendee obtained could only bind such unentailed property as C. should leave to his heir. Eldon, C. directed, that if the difference between the interest described in the particulars of sale, and that which the vendor had to give, which was in fact the difference in value between the covenants before-mentioned, could be ascertained, the purchaser should have a compensation to that amount, by abatement from the purchase money; or if the difference could not be valued, that he should have an indemnity. An inquiry was directed before a Master in Chancery, to ascertain such difference in value; and if he should be unable to do so, then he was directed to settle such security by way of indemnity, as, under all the circumstances of the title, it should appear just and reasonable that the defendant should execute, to indemnify the purchaser and those claiming under him, in case he or they should be evicted, molested, disturbed, or prevented, by reason that a title cannot be made according to the representation of the title in the particular, for the same enjoyment as if the vendor could have made good the representation, and the contract had been carried into execution accordingly. See Milligan v. Cooke, 16 Ves. p. 1.

I do not presume to say, that there may not be special agreements, which might entitle the vendee to call for much larger covenants than those to which he is entitled under ordinary contracts: but, according to the established principles of the [70] law, unless there be such explicit terms in the contract, giving more than ordinary covenants, he is not entitled, in his relation of vendee, to covenants so express as those which he had in his relation of lessee. Here, the relation originally was that of lessor and lessee; it was afterwards to be changed into the new relation of vendor and vendee, in consideration of a certain sum, and also a feu-duty; but in the contract, there is an express liberty given to the vendee, within a certain time to extinguish that feu-duty, by becoming the purchaser, at the additional gross sum of 25 years' purchase; and therefore the feu contract is to be considered, not merely as a contract, in which the vendor was to receive the gross sum of £5500, and likewise to be paid a feu-duty; but as a contract in which the person who was to take that feu might, within a limited time, elect not to pay the feu-duty thenceforward, but by the payment of an additional sum, calculated upon the feu-duty, to become the purchaser. The question is, whether, supposing that option not to be acted upon, it is to be taken as settled, that he granted this most extensive warranty which is contended for by these Respondents. Because, if there was to be that warranty, after the purchase was made out and out, it is impossible, in my opinion, to contend that there was not to be that warranty while the feu-duty was payable.—It must be in both cases, or not at all.

With respect to the first instrument, the articles bearing date the 20th of February, 1792, it is to be observed, that they were reduced into a formal [71] tack in March, 1797; and that the notion of the purchase of the feu-duty did not take place till February, in the year 1810. In the mean time, according to the allegations of the printed papers, there had been an expenditure upon the premises, in matters of machinery for carrying on the business of the Respondents, of about £100,000; and the water had, with little or no interruption, except in a particular case, been enjoyed as far as the necessity of that machinery required, from the time that they first took the water out of the river Don, till the time when the feu-contract was entered into, in February 1810; a circumstance which shews, that they had had the use of the water to the extent of the supply that was necessary for machinery, which had cost, as they allege, no less than £100,000, with no other interruption than the slight interruption to which I have alluded. The fact of that use, so little interrupted, is not immaterial, in considering the probability how far a purchaser in 1810 of that which he had possessed under lease ever since 1792, would or would not be inclined to give up a large and extensive warranty, if it be the real effect of the agreement of 1792 that he was to have that extensive warranty.

Upon inspection of the agreement of 1792, it is to be observed, that the whole of the first article is confined in its terms to the agreement to set and let in tack the lands; there is not in this first article a single word about privileges or appurtenances, or others; the words which are usually engrossed in the formal conveyance; yet [72] no lawyer can doubt, that, if this first article was to be specifically performed, and a tack set of those lands accordingly, the scroll of tacks, if regularly drawn out in implement of that article, would have conveyed with those lands for the term all the privileges, and so forth, which, (to use a term we frequently employ on these occasions) belonged to the lands. Although no mention whatever is made of the privileges which belong to the land, upon an agreement to make a tack, the privileges belonging to the land are included by operation of law, and ought to be expressed in the tack.

The second article applies to privileges which cannot belong to lands, lying very near the river Don. That the owner of these lands might be intitled to certain uses of the river, as privileges belonging to the situation, is not difficult to believe; but that he should have as privileges belonging to the lands, such a privilege as the second article professes to confer, appears to me incredible. The words used in that article are so large, that, upon repeated questions addressed to the Bar, no person has been able to state the precise meaning of them.

In the printed papers, (which I have read very carefully) as well as at the Bar, it has been contended, that this article has not the extensive sense in which the Respondents construe it; but more extensive words I think cannot be used. Where the Appellant means to restrict his grant within the limits of his power, he does so in words, for in granting a right to a passage boat [73] to cross the river opposite to the grounds, he expresses his intention to give that only, as far as he has it to give. Such a restrictive precaution he does not apply to "the privilege and liberty of taking in water from the river Don;" but he says, expressly, "that they shall have the liberty of taking in water from the river Don, for the purpose of driving machinery and other uses, and of cutting canals through the said grounds, as they shall judge necessary."

"Again, as to the privilege of quarrying stones, to be used on such parts of the hill of Grandhome as shall not happen to be planted or improved;" that is a privilege which cannot possibly belong to the land. The privilege of quarrying on my estate could not belong to land, part of my estate demised by lease: it could not be a privilege inherent or belonging to the lands so demised. The right of cutting a canal through the grounds, which is given by a subsequent article, is another liberty which could not possibly be inherent in the lands demised.

Upon that part of the articles by which it is agreed, that the lands demised shall be paid for at a certain rate per acre, much observation is made in the papers; and it has been suggested also at the Bar, with respect to the instrument relating to the lands first demised, that a money payment is to be made for the land of so much for each acre, and that therefore it is distinguishable from that other instrument (the tack dated 26th Oct. 1797, by which other lands, etc. were demised) which has been made the subject of comment, in which a sum is expressly given for the liberty of taking the water. But [74] those observations and arguments are founded in too much nicety of distinction. Can it be supposed, that because this £3 per acre is to be given for the land only, the parties did not mean that as a compensation for all that the one was to grant, and the other to enjoy under the agreement and the lease, which was to follow. Although there is no separation between the different parts of this £3 sterling for the land, and the liberties to be granted, it would be extravagant to say that the lessee did not contemplate the advantage he was to receive from the whole he had stipulated to enjoy under that lease. At the same time, it does not appear to me ultimately to make any difference in the construction of the instruments, or the decision of this case.

There is much argument in the papers on both sides, with respect to the effect of the clause in the articles, which provides for the building of the bleach field, and the price to be given for it at the end of the term. On the one hand it is contended, that, as the Appellant is to pay only £500 at the end of this term for all he was to take, he had a valuable consideration to look to, if he continued to be the lessor to the end of the term, which he would not have, if he was to be considered as feuing in perpetuity. On the other hand it is answered, that the lessees might strip or denude these buildings of all the machinery in them, and leave only the naked walls. Undoubtedly the difference of consideration is very great between the walls with the machinery, and the walls only, without the machinery.

[75] In more than one of these articles allusion is made to certain cruives; and rights are reserved by the Appellant, with a view to their maintenance. The cruives, I suppose, were fishing cruives in this river, of which it is contended these articles are so improvident as to entitle the lessees utterly to destroy the value. Under these circumstances, a question would arise, whether the agreement, even according to the articles, must not be construed as giving so much of the water of the Don as to leave the cruives for the fisheries uninjured.

According to my construction of this agreement, the Appellant had exceeded his powers: he had agreed somehow or other to secure, whether by covenant or warranty, or otherwise, "the privilege and liberty of taking in water from the river Don, for the purpose of driving machinery, and other uses, and of cutting canals through the grounds, as the Respondents should judge necessary;" a most improvident agreement to warrant a privilege which perhaps he could not secure, and for the failure of which he must be answerable in damages, if the Respondents were disturbed in their enjoyment. If, under these circumstances, the inheritance had been purchased by the lessee, no doubt such a purchase might have been so managed, as to prevent a merger of the lease: but, in the absence of special provision, there would have been a merger of the lease, and the lessee having become the purchaser, would in law have taken upon himself all the obligations by which the former owner of the [76] inheritance had bound himself to his lessee; in other words the quondam lessee, in his new character of purchaser, would be the person to warrant to himself the liberties and privileges which the former lessor had agreed to assure to him, as long as the old relation of lessor and lessee continued. Undoubtedly the vendor might have conceded the advantage which by law he derived from the new relation of vendor and vendee; and, as the purchase was a matter of option, the vendor might have warranted, at the risk of any damages which could be recovered against him, those liberties and privileges which he as lessor had agreed to give the Respondents as lessees. But, according to our law, and in all laws which rest on principle, such a contract between vendor and vendee must be expressed in terms which are free from all doubt or ambiguity. The terms of a contract so special must indicate, unequivocally, what was the intention of the parties.

In the case before us, it must be remembered, that the contract provided an option for the Respondents, either to pay a feu-duty in perpetuity, or that they might redeem the duties at so many years' purchase, within a given time after the feu-contract was executed, and yet the special contract is supposed to be this, that after vesting the inheritance in the vendee for ever, the vendor was for ever to continue liable for all the damages which might be incurred by the vendee, in the exercise of the privileges and liberties in question. That a man may make such a covenant I do not [77] deny: but when the question is, whether he has made it; the terms of the contract should leave no room for doubt.

In the tack made in the year 1797 (31st March, relating to the lands first leased), the demise is of the lands, "with the privilege and liberty to the said tacksmen and their foresaids, of taking in water from the river Don, for the purpose of driving machinery and other uses, and of cutting canals through the said grounds, as they shall judge necessary." Upon this lease there can be no doubt, and improvident as it was for the Appellant as lessor to enter into such a warranty as he did in this lease, yet if that is clear upon the terms of the instrument, he must abide by his contract. Now in this lease, to remove all doubt as to the privileges and liberties intended to be granted, they insert these special words, "together with the whole liberties and privileges in favour of the said tacksmen," (not belonging to the lands, but) "particularly specified in the articles and conditions of lease above-mentioned, to which reference is hereby had for that purpose, and which shall remain as effectual and as binding upon the said John Paton and his foresaids, as if the same had been again herein particularly enumerated and expressed." In this instance, there is a contract specifically executed, according to terms which leave no doubt, and it is a contract between the same parties, who had, or might have had, that transaction in their memory. If, upon framing the feu-contract, it had been expressly stipulated, that the Appellant was to warrant or feu the privileges and [78] liberties, (not merely belonging to the land, but the liberties and privileges) particularly specified in the articles or conditions of lease, as though they had been there particularly enumerated, or all the privileges and liberties mentioned in the tack itself, as if they had been in the feu-contract particularly enumerated, no doubt could have risen. In the opinion of my Lord Alloway, (an opinion which deserves our respect,) as well as that of the Court of Session, the words, privileges belonging to the lands, have not so extensive a meaning as the Respondents suppose and argue. Can the words, "privileges and liberties belonging to the lands," appearing in a feu-contract, be applied not only to what was in the instrument, but to what was not in the instrument? In a case where it is of necessity that the claimant should shew the plainest and most unambiguous terms, can he have more than privileges which belong to the lands, where he stipulates in terms which are admitted to describe primâ facie, nothing but privileges which do belong to the lands?

It is not immaterial to observe, that in another part of the instrument now under consideration, the Respondents are bound "to implement, perform, and fulfil the whole other obligations, prestations, and conditions, incumbent upon them as tacksmen, contained in the foresaid articles and conditions of tack." I refer to that part of the case, because these are articles of tack, which grant not only privileges beyond those which belong to the lands, but they are articles of tack which contain a great many reservations to [79] the owner, with respect to his enjoyment of the lands leased, and other estates belonging to him. If he has entered into a feu-contract, which puts an end to those reservations, he must abide by the consequences of a feu-contract so drawn up. I do not say that he has done so, but the words of the instrument are to be weighed, and the parties must abide by what they have expressed, although it be contrary to what they meant.

By the feu-contract (3d and 9th Feb. 1810), after the recital of the leases, grants, and agreements, and a description of the premises, it is agreed, that the Appellant shall establish and make out a good and satisfactory title in his own person, as heritable proprietor of the lands aforesaid, which would bring an obligation upon him to make out a good title to those lands, as heritable proprietor of them, and such title would carry with it a good title to all the privileges belonging to the lands. But how he is to make a good title to privileges not belonging to the lands, I do not comprehend. He may warrant the privileges, and agree to make a title to them, but if they do not belong to him, how is he to fulfil such an obligation specifically?

The parties to this contract had before them the tack and the articles of agreement; which articles of agreement enumerated all those privileges which are now the subject of litigation; and in a separate article from that which would have carried the privileges incident or belonging to the land. In the contract which followed (the lease dated 31st March, 1797), the Respondents had expressly, in one part of it, (in order to remove all doubt), provided that [80] they were to have all the privileges, liberties, etc. etc. which were mentioned in the articles specified in that contract, and that as largely and specifically as if they were therein particularly enumerated. Is it consistent with this conduct, that when they were making a feu-contract upon the lands comprised in the leases, now in question, and when they used only the words "privileges belonging to the lands," that they could have intended to affect the relation of proprietor and vendee with the same obligations which by contract attached upon the relation of lessor and lessee. If such had been the intention, they had only to repeat, totidem verbis, the words to be found in the tack which followed upon the articles; and such a special contract, when carried into execution, would have comprised reservations with respect to the estate, the subject of the tack, which were beneficial to the Appellant, as owner of the land.

I do not forget the words which are added, "with all the rights, members, privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or which ever have been competent to the heritor of the lands to claim and enjoy." If it has been competent to the heritor of the lands to claim and enjoy the privilege of drawing water from the Don, it is a privilege thereto belonging; and if the Respondent takes the feu-charter in the very terms in which this feu-contract is expressed, he will have that privilege. On the other hand, if the privilege of drawing the water is not a privilege belonging to the lands, or not a privilege which it was ever competent to the heritor of the lands qua heritor of the lands to [81] claim and enjoy, you have not that privilege, unless those words enable you to claim a privilege not competent to the heritor of the land to claim and enjoy. As to the additional words expressing that it is "the intention of the parties, that all rights and privileges of or belonging to the lands formerly leased to Leys, Brebner, and Hadden, etc. shall now be finally and for ever conveyed by Paton to Brebner and Hadden, their heirs, and executors, and assigns, or as they shall direct," it is said that they mean not the lands formerly leased, but the rights and privileges formerly leased; and in order to shew that this does not mean the lands formerly leased, but the rights and privileges formerly leased, we are referred to the words in former contracts between the parties, in order to gather from them the construction of these words in the feu-contract. Considering the words in question in this point of view, I observe, that in the year 1792, the parties agreed by articles that a tack should be made. In the year 1797 a tack was accordingly executed. In order to avoid all question, they included in that tack by special words all the liberties and privileges granted in those articles. It was quite unnecessary upon this transaction in the year 1797, to consider, whether these were rights and privileges belonging to the lands or not, for the parties had agreed, as lessor and lessee, that the lessee should have those privileges, whether he could have them by way of tack, by way of agreement, or only in compensation for damages. When they came to make this feu-contract, the inference I draw from the ab-[82]-sence of these special words, and of the reference to the lease and articles, is, that they had agreed not to insert those words, although they were lying before them. The natural import of the words is this.—If these are rights and privileges belonging to the lands, and which, as the heritor, I can grant, you will have them:—If they are rights and privileges which I cannot give to you as vendor of the estate, without entering into those special covenants, then you will not have them. We will not determine whether they are of the one nature or the other, if they are of such a nature that they can be said to belong to the lands leased, you have them:—If they are not of such a nature as to belong to the lands leased, but your rights are to depend upon a personal covenant, that is not what I mean to give: and therefore, instead of using those words which I find in the articles and in the tack, I will use more cautious and restrictive words.

Such appears to me to be the right construction of the instrument, and I think the words used do not include the privilege claimed. I am the more confirmed in that opinion when I consider that part of this instrument by which the Respondents have an option to redeem the annual feu-duty, and purchase the inheritance upon paying a consideration about equal to a sum of £12,300. Under these circumstances it is supposed that the Appellant entered into a contract to deliver over the inheritance of the lands to the Respondents, with a covenant, binding him to all eternity to secure to the new owners the use of [83] the water of the Don, not only for the purpose of machinery, upon which they state that they had laid out £100,000 prior to this feu-contract, but for other purposes, and to such unlimited extent as they might think proper to employ that water for machinery, and for other purposes which, to this moment, have neither been defined nor ascertained. According to the literal import of the articles and the tack, the Respondents are to exercise uncontrolled power over the river, under the guarantee of the Appellant, and at his risk.

To the objection that this is an extravagant warranty, which it is hardly credible a man parting with the inheritance of lands should agree to give, it is answered, that he did warrant the same privilege for 99 years. That is undoubtedly an improvident undertaking, but nothing like the improvidence of a guarantee of such a privilege in perpetuity. On the other hand, when the Respondents became the heritors of the lands, it is not unreasonable to suppose, that having purchased the inheritance, they took upon themselves the bargain and warranty of their lessor. He had by agreement bound himself by warranty for 99 years; and from the year 1792 to 1797, the Respondents, under that agreement and the lease which followed, had taken water for the supply of their extensive machinery, without disturbance, except in a trifling instance. But upon the new contract for purchase of the inheritance, the question is, Whether the Respondents by the specialties of their contract, have precluded the application of that rule which governs such transactions be-[84]-tween the vendor and vendee of an inheritance, that the vendee takes upon himself the relation of the vendor with respect to lessees, and as to claims which the vendor had created, unless the terms of the agreement expressly shut out the application of such a rule to his case.

As to the other feu-contract (May 19 and 23, 1810, ante, p. 55), if that by express terms binds the Appellant to perpetual warranty, upon which I give no opinion, are we to say that, because one agreement operates by express terms, the same construction is to be put upon the other agreement which has no such terms, and where the parties think proper to use precisely the same terms, with respect to the premises which never were in lease,* as with respect to those which were?

The case does not require any judgment to be given upon the construction of the feu-contract. The only question now at issue is, How it shall be carried into execution? That will be most properly done by transferring to the proposed feu-charter the very terms respecting rights and privileges which were used, and are to be found in the contract. The question, what are the rights and privileges which pass under the terms contained in the feu-charter, may then become the subject of actions of declaratur; and the Court of Session, sitting as a Court of Equity, must consider [85] whether they will be justified in the conclusion that the recital appears to be for the purpose of ascertaining what rights and privileges are to be conveyed, and that the rights and privileges in question are such as do not belong to the lands; or whether they can safely determine, from the words which are to be found in this feu-contract, that it was the intention of the parties to include in their agreement not only the rights and privileges which belong to the lands, but the rights and privileges which are claimed. If the parties do not come to some compromise upon that question, the conveyance must be submitted to the Court of Session, to consider and decide, whether the great privilege which is the subject of dispute does pass by it or not. In my opinion, it does not pass. But the opinion thus given is extra-judicial. It cannot interfere with the rights of the parties to agitate that question. If hereafter the Court shall say, this is a liberty and privilege belonging to the lands, the Appellant must abide by that decision, because he has agreed to grant the liberties and privileges belonging to the lands; and even supposing it not to be a right and privilege belonging to the lands, yet, if upon consideration of the special words of the recital, it can be inferred that the Appellant has bound himself by agreement, he must, in that case, also convey the rights and privileges, which come within the terms of his agreement, though not belonging to the lands.

Whenever the question shall arise as to the right construction of the conveyance so executed, it will be matter of consideration on the one hand, [86] how far it was the intention of the Appellant to part with an inheritance affected by the same terms and conditions, which affected that estate under the lease; or on the other hand to withhold what was granted by the lease.

With respect to the medium of proof assumed in the Court below, it may be remarked as singular, that although the two agreements were separated in the progress, yet one of them was admitted as evidence to assist in the construction of the other; and the judicial conclusion is, that because the one agreement has words which in the judgment of the Court conveyed, or meant to convey, certain rights, therefore the other agreement must be considered to have embodied in it the same intention, although different words are used.

It appears to me upon the whole, that if the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is altered by striking out the words in italics,† and by declaring that, instead of those words in italics being inserted, this conveyance ought to be made in the very terms of the feu-contract, that alteration will be sufficient, and that is an alteration which the rights of the parties require.

April 7, 1819.—The judgment of the House was given according to the suggestion of the Lord Chancellor, with the alterations proposed by him as above stated.

* This observation relates to a grant of three acres of land, not before in lease, which are included in the agreement of the 3d and 9th of February, 1810. In abstracting the deeds which form the ground-work of the case, this material passage was omitted, partly from inadvertence and partly from the desire of curtailment.

† The words are, "and the feu-contract shall dispose and confer all the rights and privileges contained in the leases, as to those subjects contained in the leases."

[87] SCOTLAND. APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION

TASKER.—Appellant; CUNNINGHAME, and others.—Respondents
[7th July 1819].

[Mews' Dig. xiii. 1212.]

A determination made by an agent duly authorised or acknowledged not to sail upon the voyage insured, but upon a different voyage, is an abandonment, and discharges the underwriters.

Correspondents at Cadiz, of ship-owners in England, having received directions to ballast and freight a ship for the Clyde, suggest a slight variance as to the port of destination, which the owners adopt by insuring the ship and cargo for a voyage, including the port named and fixed by their agents. Soon afterwards, the agents at Cadiz informed the owners that, owing to a change of circumstances, and with the advice and concurrence of the captain, they have determined not to send the ship according to their former suggestion (i.e. upon the voyage insured), but direct to Newfoundland. Eight days after this new determination, the ship is stranded in the bay of Cadiz, and burnt by the French army. The several letters containing intelligence of the new alteration of the voyage and of the loss of the ship, arrived in England, and were received by the owners upon the same day.

The House of Lords reversing the judgments of the Court below, decided, that the correspondents at Cadiz were the agents of the Respondents; that the voyage insured was abandoned by their determination to send the ship on a different voyage, and therefore that the underwriters were not liable for the loss. The consequence of this decision being that the owners were bound to refund to the underwriters, with interest, monies which had been paid by them before they were apprised of the facts.

The Respondents, who were engaged in the Newfoundland trade, expecting one of their vessels, called the Henrietta, to arrive with a cargo of fish, at Cadiz, in the beginning of the year [88] 1810, directed Messrs. Lynch and Co. their agents at that place, as soon as the cargo should be discharged, to ballast the vessel with salt, and to endeavour to procure freight for her to Clyde. The vessel arrived at Cadiz about the time expected, but the French army having taken possession of the salt-pans in that neighbourhood, it was not in the power of Lynch and Co. to comply with the Respondents' instructions. Under these circumstances, they resolved, with the approbation of the ship-master, to dispatch the vessel for Liverpool, in place of Clyde. Of this change in the destination of the vessel, Messrs. Lynch and Co. advised the Respondents, by a letter dated the 16th of January, 1810. By a letter dated the 10th of February, from the same persons to the Respondents, the cause of this variation is assigned in the following terms: "I have, at last, sold the Elizabeth's cargo, at 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ per quintal, etc. As to the Henrietta's, I could not get a purchaser for the whole, so that begun to retail it at five dollars, at which I hope to run the whole off shortly. As the French have got possession of all the salt-pans in the neighbourhood, I cannot ship any salt in these vessels, so that will set them up for Liverpool (where can get salt) with a prospect of getting full freight without much delay."

It was necessary that a cargo of salt should be sent out to Newfoundland early in the spring, for the supply of the fishery, and salt could only be procured at the port of Liverpool. Messrs. Lynch's letter, acquainting the Respondents with their in-[89]-tentions, was written while the fish cargo was yet on board. After the receipt of it, and upon the 12th of March, the Respondents effected a policy of insurance upon the voyage at and from Cadiz to her port of discharge in St. George's Channel, including Clyde, which was underwritten by the Appellant to the extent of £100.

Circumstances afterwards occurred which induced Messrs. Lynch and the ship-master again to alter the destination of the vessel. The sale and delivery of the cargo had been protracted so long, as to give reason to apprehend that, if the vessel proceeded to Liverpool to load salt, the supply of that article would not reach Newfoundland at the proper season in spring; and, in the mean time, the French had retired from the salt-pans at Cadiz, so that a cargo of salt could readily be obtained there.

Messrs. Lynch and Co. therefore, after consulting with the master of the Henrietta, and with the master of another vessel belonging to the Respondents, deemed it for the interest of the Respondents to dispatch the Henrietta direct to Newfoundland; and as it was necessary to give immediate information to the Respondents, of this change in the destination of the vessel, to the end that they might effect insurance on the new voyage, they, on the 28th February, 1810, wrote to the Respondents in the following terms: "In consequence of the unprecedented want of small craft, nay, the general confusion that has prevailed since the French appeared in this neighbourhood, the delivery of the Elizabeth's cargo has been [90] delayed until now; and as it is likely the Henrietta will be detained from the same causes, until the end of the month, Captain Collins has, after consulting with Captain Fields, determined to return direct to St. John's, with a cargo of salt, now to be had at double price, which let serve for your Government." Eight days after the date of this letter, while the vessel was lying at Cadiz, she was driven on shore in a storm, and burnt by the French. The letter of the 28th of February, and another letter conveying the intelligence of the loss, were received by the Respondents on the same day, viz. upon the 21st of April, 1810.

In these circumstances the Respondents did not communicate to the Appellant, or the other underwriters, the letter which they had received from Lynch and Co. respecting the projected alteration of the voyage, but obtained payment from them for a total loss. The fact having afterwards come to the knowledge of the underwriters, they applied, by letter, to the Respondents for repetition (repayment) of the money so paid to them, which being refused, the Appellant brought an action before the High Court of Admiralty, in which he concluded, that "the said Cunningham, Stevenson, and Co. and John Bell, merchant, in Glasgow, an individual partner of the said company, should be deemed and ordained, by decree and sentence of the Judge of our said High Court of Admiralty, to make payment, conjunctly and severally, to the complainer, of the sum of £91 10s. sterling, toge-[91]-ther with the due and lawful interest of the said sum, from and since the 11th day of October, 1810, and while payment, and also for expenses."

After various proceedings in the suit, the Judge Admiral pronounced the following interlocutor.—"May 13, 1813, The Judge Admiral having advised the libel, the defences, answers, and whole writings produced, finds, that the defenders were concerned in the ship Henrietta, commanded by Captain Collins, expected at Cadiz, with a cargo of fish, about January 1810; and that they gave orders in 1809, to Lynch and Co. their agents at Cadiz, to load the Henrietta with a cargo for Britain, as soon as her cargo of fish could be discharged: finds, that the defenders received letters from Lynch and Co. notifying that said vessel was to be loaded for Liverpool, in consequence of which the defenders insured her at and from Cadiz to Great Britain, and of course, the voyage then intended was bonâ fide insured: finds, that by the same post they received from Lynch and Co. a letter, dated the 28th of February, and another dated the 12th of March, both in the year 1810, the former announcing an intention in Captain Collins not to sail for Britain, but for Newfoundland, and the other intimating the total loss of the Henrietta, while still in the Bay of Cadiz, and when a small part of her loading only had been delivered, and, of course, before she was in a state to sail on any voyage: finds, that as the projected voyage to New-[92]foundland might have been countermanded by the defenders, or even as Captain Collins might again have altered his intentions, without any such orders, and the voyage insured might have been commenced, if the vessel had not been lost in the bay of Cadiz, there is no evidence of an actual abandonment by the defenders, nor even by their captain, of the voyage insured, nor of mala fides, in any respect, and, therefore, sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders, and finds them entitled to expenses."

The Appellant having brought this judgment under review of the Court of Session by process of suspension and reduction, and the cause having come before Lord Pitmilley, Ordinary, his Lordship, after various proceedings, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the memorial of the suspender, with the memorial of the defenders in the conjoined actions, and whole process; in respect the resolution taken by the defenders' shipmaster, Captain Collins, to return direct to St. John's, instead of proceeding on the voyage insured, as communicated to the defenders by their agent, Mr. Lynch, in his letter of 28th February, 1810, was not consented to, or judged of by the defenders, the owners, and insurers of the vessel; and no step whatever was taken between the date of the letter referred to, and the total loss of the cargo (eight days thereafter), to carry the captain's resolution into effect, very small [93] part only of the former cargo having been landed, and no preparations having been made for a new voyage in the intermediate period; finds, that the circumstances founded on by the pursuer, do not amount to an abandonment of the voyage insured. Finds, therefore, that it is unnecessary to allow a proof of the pursuer's allegation, that where a particular voyage has been insured, and afterwards abandoned, the underwriter is not entitled to the premium. In the reduction sustains the defences, and assolizies the defenders, and in the suspension finds the letters orderly proceeded, and decerns."

A representation was made by the Appellant; but the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor, dated the 28th of February, 1815, adhered to his former decision.

Against these interlocutors the Appellant reclaimed by two successive petitions to the second division of the court; but the court being of opinion, that there was no evidence that the voyage to Britain was abandoned, the Lords, by two successive interlocutors, dated respectively the 17th of January, and the 16th of February, 1816, adhered to the interlocutors complained of.

From these several interlocutors of the Judge Admiral, the Lord Ordinary, and the Second Division of the Court of Session, the Appellant presented his appeal to the House of Peers.

For the Appellants, the Solicitor General and Mr. Adam.—In this case there was a substitution [94] of one voyage for another, made by persons having authority as agents by law and usage, and recognized by the Respondents. By the determination of the agent the voyage was altered, and the liability of the underwriters ceased. This is totally different from a case of intended deviation, where a loss happens before the ship arrives at the point of intended deviation. There can be no such deviation from a voyage which never was intended. Here the voyage insured was abandoned, and another was substituted. The abandonment once made operates immediately to release the underwriters. Chitty v. Selwyn, 2 Atk.* [359] No step taken towards the voyage is necessary. Intention is sufficient to constitute a new voyage. The voyage insured rested [95] merely in intention. Suppose the letter announcing the alteration had arrived before the intelligence of the loss, and an insurance had been made on the intended new voyage, the liability upon the original insurance would not have continued. Way v. Modigliani, 2 T. R. 30.

After the determination to abandon the voyage insured, the underwriters could not have recovered the premium. Long v. Allen, B. R. Easter, 25 Geo. 3. That is the law and usage in Scotland, as well as England. The Respondents acknowledge the fact. It is alleged, and they have not denied it. But as the premium is the consideration for the insurance, if the right to the premium fails, the right to the indemnity must also fail.

* In Chitty v. Selwyn, the only matter decided was, that a commission should issue to examine witnesses abroad, and an injunction until, etc. But Lord Hardwicke C. obiter said, "When a ship is insured at and from a place, and it arrives at that place, as long as the ship is preparing for the voyage upon which it is insured, the insurer is liable. But if all thoughts of the voyage are laid aside, and the ship lies there five, six, or seven years, with the owner's privity, it shall never be said that the insurer is liable."

In Way v. Modigliani, the ship had actually proceeded on a different voyage. But there is a case, Woodbridge v. Boydell, Doug. Rep. 16, where, (according to the judgment of Buller, J. in the above case) "It was held, that if a ship insured for one voyage sail upon another, and the track in the outset of the voyage is the same, and she be taken before she arrive at the dividing point of the two voyages, the policy is discharged." There it was no more than intention. If she had arrived at the dividing point, the original voyage, according to the original intention, might have been resumed, yet the right under the policy would not have revived.

The Appellant having paid the loss, when ignorant of the facts, the money is by law recoverable.

For the Respondents—Mr. Scarlett and Mr. Wetherell. The policy in this case attached from the moment when the ship moored at Cadiz. Where a policy once attaches, no intention to deviate or alter the voyage can affect the policy, if a loss happens before any act is done towards effectuating the intention. Intention, unaccompanied by an act, is in its nature mutable. Suppose the agents had afterwards, and before the cargo was discharged, announced a further intention to revert to the voyage insured: the owners in the mean time having effected a policy on or before the 12th of March, would the momentary intention have destroyed the policy? Policies continue binding so long as no act is done to com-[96]mence a new risk. In Way v. Modigliani, the policy was to take effect from a given day, before which the ship had sailed on a different voyage, and the risk never commenced. The case of Long v. Allen,* rightly considered, is in favour of the Respondents. The policy in that case being upon a voyage at and from Jamaica, the risk commenced by virtue of the word "at." If the ship had been lost at Jamaica, the underwriters would have been liable; and therefore, on principle, they would on such a policy have been entitled to recover the whole premium. But the evidence of usage prevailed: an usage that, where the voyage is altered, $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the premium is to be retained. If the policy had not been at and from, etc. the underwriters would not have been entitled to any part of the premium. There is not a case to be found in the Reports, nor a principle in the text-writers to support the notion that a policy which has once attached can be dis-[97]charged, but by actual deviation, or some act done to alter the risk, some act as contradistinguished from intention. In Chitty v. Selwyn, the ship was detained longer than was necessary to accomplish the voyage first insured. That was equivalent to an act. The underwriters were discharged by unreasonable delay. In that case, if the loss had happened before the discharge of the cargo, or before the time of necessary detention had elapsed, the underwriters would have remained liable. In our case, the cargo had not been delivered. If the ship had discharged her cargo, and taken new freight, that would have been an act sufficient to alter the voyage; but mere intention is insufficient. Call it determination, it is the same thing, if not carried into effect. Suppose the intention had not been communicated, but had rested in the mind of the agent, could that alter the voyage? But if it is not altered by the mere uncommunicated determination, how does the communication aid the case? Intention, determination, and communication are of the same nature: they are not acts.

The two letters having been received on the same day, the owner could have made no insurance upon the new risk, which would have been a great hardship. If the mere intention of a captain or agent can alter the risk and the voyage insured, an owner could never know whether he had effected a valid insurance. Such an intention, if carried into effect without the approbation of the owners, would be barratry in the captain. Earle v. Rowcroft, 8 East, 126.

[38] The Solicitor-General in reply.—To constitute barratry, the act of the captain must be fraudulent. Here it was for the benefit of the owners. Determination by persons duly authorised is sufficient to alter the voyage—subsequent acts are only proof of the intention. If the owners had insured the new voyage, the new underwriters would have been liable, yet this would not have been an act in any other sense than as the determination of the authorized agent is an act.

The Lord Chancellor.—The want of consent on the part of the owners cannot be

* In Long v. Allen, the action was for a return of premium. The jury gave a special verdict, finding an usage, upon which the Court grounded their judgment when the case was argued. The finding of usage superseded the necessity of the question of apportionment. But Lord Mansfield observed, "The law is clear, that if the risk be commenced, there shall be no return of premium. Hence questions arise of distinct risks insured by one policy or instrument. My opinion has been to divide the risks. I am aware, that there are great difficulties in the way of apportionments, and therefore the Court has sometimes leaned against them." See Mayer v. Grayson, Park on Insurance, p. 588, 7th edit.

In the case now reported, the insurance was at and from Cadiz, etc.; but the destination was altered and the ship lost before the policy was underwritten.

suffered to stand as a reason for the interlocutor, pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, if the judgment itself could be affirmed. That no step was taken between the date of the letter, announcing the new voyage and the loss of the cargo; that a small part only of the former cargo was discharged, and no preparations made for the new voyage, are facts assumed in the Court below, as the ground of judgment. But there is no trace in the proceedings of any proof of these facts. It seems by the course of argument adopted in the cases, as if these facts were to be taken for granted. In the proceedings before the Judge Admiral, and in the letters of suspension, it is alleged that there was an arrangement as to the price of salt to be taken at Cadiz, and the means of taking it. But there is no proof to support those allegations.

Upon the question of barratry it is material to consider the instructions given, and how far, according to a literal construction, they sanction what was done by the parties acting under them. [99] By a passage in the letter of the 10th of February, it appears that the agents then had an opinion that the vessel would be very speedily unloaded. By the following passage of that letter, they intimate their intention of sending the vessel to Liverpool, and the owners adopt that determination by insuring accordingly for the Channel, comprehending Clyde. The Captain also apprises his owners of the same determination, and by an expression to be found in the letter of the 28th of February, it appears, that upon the new determination which the agents and captain had adopted again to alter the voyage, notice was communicated to their employers for the purpose of guiding them as to the insurance which it would be necessary to effect.

I do not at present enter upon the discussion of the difference between intention and determination. If the matter upon the evidence can be supposed to rest in mere intention, the interlocutor must be altered so far as it assumes actual consent of the owners to be necessary. For it appears throughout the correspondence, that the captain and the agents had taken upon themselves to direct or alter the destination of the ship, with the acquiescence at least of the owners. The risk here insured was not merely on the voyage, but at and from the port of Cadiz, etc. Upon such policies difficult questions arise as to the commencement of the risk, and the return of premium. But where the voyage has been abandoned before the commencement of the risk, it is impossible to contend that the premium could be claimed. What amounts to abandonment is a different question. [100] When a ship is insured at and from a given port, the probable continuance of the ship in that port is in the contemplation of the parties to the contract. If the owners, or persons having authority from them, change their intention, and the ship is delayed in that port for the purpose of altering the voyage and taking in a different cargo, the underwriters run an additional risk if such a change of intention is not to affect the contract. The substantial question in this case is, whether any declaration is to be found in the correspondence that the voyage insured was in fact abandoned. I will not, at present, advise the House to proceed to the decision of a question upon which very nice distinctions have been taken. The judgment may be for a few days deferred, and in the mean time I will confer with a judge, whose attention has been much occupied with these subjects.

Lord Chancellor.—The interlocutor in this case, is in substance, that the assured is entitled to recover against the underwriters for a loss of the ship. The question arises upon a policy of insurance effected by the Respondents, on the ship Henrietta, at and from Cadiz. The Respondents, on the 24th of November, 1809, wrote to their correspondents at Cadiz, Messrs. T. and H. Lynch and Co. a letter containing instructions respecting the Henrietta. Lynch and Co., by their answer, dated the 16th of January, for a cause explained in a subsequent letter, suggest that the destination of the vessel on its homeward voyage should be varied. By a letter dated the 10th of February, [101] they inform the Respondents that "as the French have got possession of all the salt-pans in the neighbourhood of Cadiz, they will set up the vessels (one of which is the Henrietta) for Liverpool," where salt may be procured. The captain also, by a letter of the 11th of February, informs his owners, the Respondents, that, for the reason before assigned, the agents mean to load the vessel for Liverpool. It appears, therefore, that the agents advise their principals that they do not intend to follow their instructions. These two letters * of the 10th and 11th of February reached Port Glasgow the 9th of March. On the 12th of March the Respondents effect a policy of insurance upon the vessel, adopting this variance in the destination. The insurance is effected on the vessel, "at and from Cadiz to her port of discharge in St. George's Channel, etc." comprehending Clyde. Without adverting to the cases of apportionment, it is clear, that though a ship is insured at and from a certain port, it is insured with a view to the probable continuance of the vessel at that port, and the voyage on which it is to be employed. For, according to the voyage, the continuance and delay in port may differ. Upon the 28th of February, these same agents dispatched another letter to the Respondents, whereby, after noticing the delay which, contrary to their expectations, had already taken place, and the further delay in the delivery of the cargo, [102] which was likely to ensue, they add this important passage:—"Captain C. has determined to return direct to St. John's with a cargo of salt, now to be had at double the usual price, which let serve for your government." By a letter dated the 12th of March, and which came to hand on the same day as the letter of the 28th of February, the Respondents received advice of the loss of the ship insured. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary contains a declaration which is now given up as untenable, viz. that the owners had not consented to the alteration of the voyage. As the letter announcing the change came to hand after the loss of the ship, they could not give actual consent. But the agents and captain had, on a former occasion, made alterations respecting the voyage, and the owners acquiesced in, and acted upon their advice and determination. The owners had therefore undoubtedly constituted their agents, with authority to alter the destination of the ship. It is alleged that a small part only of the cargo was delivered before the loss; and it is contended, that as there was nothing to alter the voyage, but intention which might have been again varied, and as there was no progress made in unloading the cargo, nor any other act done towards a change of voyage; this is to be considered as resting in mere intention, and that the loss must be considered as a loss under the policy. Undoubtedly a mere meditated change does not affect a policy. But circumstances are to be taken as evidence of a determination, and what better evidence can we have, than that those who were authorised had determined to change the [103] voyage. In my opinion the voyage was abandoned; and I have the highest authority in Westminster Hall to confirm that opinion. Suppose they had gone upon the second voyage, and the ship had been lost after insurance for that voyage, on which of the two policies could they have claimed and recovered? Certainly not on the first. Upon the letters of the agents and the captain, it must clearly be considered an abandonment.

* The Lord Chancellor read the letters in moving judgment; but as the letter of

The Lords found (7th July, 1819), that the voyage ought to be considered as having been abandoned before the loss of the vessel,—and the interlocutors were reversed.

 Upon the question, when a risk commences under the word "at," the case of Lambert v. Liddiard, 5 Taunt. 480, makes the nearest approach to the case reported. In Lambert v. Liddiard, it was held that the risk had commenced upon the ground that the ship had prepared for the voyage, by inquiring for a cargo. Where the contract is, that the beginning of the adventure shall be "immediately from and after the arrival of "the ship at," etc.; or "from the departure," the difficulty is removed. In the common case where it is "at and from," etc. without any special words to restrict the meaning of the word "at," the beginning to load the cargo, or preparing for the voyage, seem to be the principal circumstances to determine the commencement of the risk. In the case above reported, it may be material to note, that a very small proportion of the cargo brought into the port of Cadiz had been discharged when the ship was lost; and that the owners had received from the underwriters on that cargo the amount of their loss, upon the ground that the risk was not at an end when the loss happened. Upon the question of abandonment, the case of Driscoll v. Borill, 1 Bos. and Pul. 313, is the nearest to (but far short of) the case reported. For in that case the captain had written a letter, asking advice of the broker; but he had reserved his determination, and afterwards sailed upon a voyage which, in the opinion of the Court, was within the terms of the original policy.

the agents has already been given in the statement of the facts of the case, it is not here repeated. The letter of the captain was to the same effect.

ENGLAND.

APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY.

JACKSON,—Appellant; INNES and others.—Respondents [10th July, 1819.]

[Mews' Dig. x. 1399: Discussed and explained in Dawson v. Bank of Whitehaven 1877, 6 Ch.D. 218 and see S.C. 4 Ch.D. 639, at p. 648; Jones v. Davies 1878, 8 Ch.D. 205, at p. 214; Plomley v. Felton 1888, 14 App. Cas. 61, at p. 66; Ashburner on Mortgages, pp. 367-371.]

Where lands are in settlement, and the husband and wife join in a mortgage of them, if the deed creating the security is no more in effect than a simple charge upon the lands, and does not alter the limitations further than is necessary to create the charge, the right of redemption, although it be reserved by the deed to the husband and wife, or either of them, their or either of their heirs, etc. belongs only to those who are intitled under the settlement, and not to the heirs of the husband, if he survive the wife.

But where the lands of A. upon her marriage were settled to the use of husband and wife successively for life, remainder in strict settlement, remainder to the wife and her heirs, with a power of revocation and appointment of new uses; and she joined with her husband in a mortgage, and by the deed to lead the uses of a fine which the husband and wife afterwards levied, according to covenant, the lands after the determination of the term, created to secure the repayment of the money borrowed, were limited to the husband and wife, and survivor for life, remainder in tail special; remainder, for default of such issue, to the right heirs of the survivor of husband and wife: The wife having died without issue, leaving the husband survivor, it was held, that this was more than a mere mortgage transaction—that there was evidence of an intention to effect a change of the beneficial interest; and that there was upon the face of the deed a clear manifestation of such intention, equivalent to a declaration; and consequently that the husband and his heirs, and not the heirs of the wife, were intitled to the equity of redemption.

[105] Lord Redesdale.—The facts * material to be stated in this case are as follows:—By a marriage settlement, executed in the year 1743, certain lands were settled to the use of Richard Jackson, the husband, for life: the remainder to Anne, his intended wife, for life: remainder to the children, male and female, of the marriage, in strict settlement; remainder to the use of Anne, the intended wife, her heirs and assigns; and the deed contained a proviso, enabling R. Jackson, and Anne, his intended wife, by any deed, etc. to revoke the uses, and to limit or appoint any other uses to any persons, and for any estates. In the year 1745, the husband and wife borrowed the sum of £200; to secure the re-payment of which, by indenture, dated the 25th of November, 1745, they demised the said lands to John Child, (as mortgagee) for the term of one thousand years, with a proviso for redemption, by R. Jackson and Anne his wife, or either of them, their, or either of their heirs, etc. and in case of such redemption, that the term and estate thereby granted should determine. This latter instrument, it is to be observed, could only have effect under the power of revocation contained in the settlement, and it operated merely to create a mortgage term, subject to redemption. It is clearly no more than a simple charge upon the estate, redeemable by Jackson, his wife, and their heirs, etc. and it did not alter the limitations of the settlement farther than was necessary to create the charge; it was, therefore, not redeemable by the heirs of the survivor of Jackson and his wife, but only by those who were entitled under the settlement, in the year 1746.

* The facts, as they appeared upon the pleadings in the Court of Chancery, at the original hearing, are to be found stated at length in Mr. Vesey's Reports, vol. xvi. p. 35. Some omissions and some inaccuracies, owing probably to the state of the pleadings at the date of the decree, have been supplied and rectified in the following report. The observations made in moving judgment comprise a sufficient outline of the facts to make the case intelligible to the reader, and to supersede the necessity of giving a distinct and independent narrative of the case.

Jackson and his wife having afterwards borrowed of the mortgagee the further sum of £400, by indenture, dated the 1st of January, 1746, they continued to the mortgagee, etc. the lands demised for the remainder of the term, discharged from all former provisos, etc. but subject to a proviso for redemption, upon payment by Jackson and his wife, of the sum of £600 with interest, whereupon the term and the respective indentures, whereby it was granted and confirmed, were respectively to cease and be void: and Jackson and his wife thereby covenanted to levy a fine of the lands, etc. and it was declared that the fine so levied of the premises should enure to the use of the mortgagee, his, etc. for the remainder of the term, subject to the proviso for redemption; and "from and after the expiration, or other sooner determination of the said term, to the use of Richard Jackson and Anne his wife, for their lives, and the life of the survivor, and from the decease of the survivor to the use of the heirs of their two bodies, etc. and for default of such issue, to the use of the right heirs of the sur-[107]-vivor of R. Jackson, and Anne his wife, for ever," etc. A fine was afterwards levied according to the covenant, and it is upon the construction and operation of the latter words of this deed that the whole question in this appeal arises.

Of the same date with the deed by way of further mortgage and limitation, R. Jackson executed a bond and warrant of attorney to C. the mortgagee, to secure the repayment of all the money borrowed. In the year 1755, R. Jackson paid the principal and interest then due to the mortgagee; whereupon the chirograph of the fine, and the deed of 1746, to lead the uses, were given up to him, and satisfaction acknowledged upon the judgment which had been entered up by the mortgagee. But I do not find that any assignment was made to him of the term.*

It is to be observed, that the proviso for redemption, which was contained in the first deed of mortgage, stipulating, that "if R. Jackson and Anne his wife, or either of them, their or either of their heirs, etc. should pay, etc." was by the second deed of mortgage and new limitation discharged; and in this latter instrument the proviso was simply, "if R. Jackson and Anne his wife, should pay, etc. that the said [108] indenture and the former indenture of mortgage, and every article, clause, and thing therein contained, should cease, determine, and be void." The effect, therefore, of the second deed is to confirm a term of years, which should be redeemable and cease on re-payment of the money borrowed, etc. and after such determination of the term, the lands are settled to specified uses.

Mrs. Jackson died in the year 1772, without issue, having made a will, which has no operation upon any matter in question in this case; because her power of disposal by will did not extend to any part of the property in question.

The fine and the indenture of 1746, which had been delivered up to the husband, were oblaid, and supposed by him to have been lost, but they were found after the mortgage transaction between him and Charles Cooth, the heir of Mrs. Jackson.

In the argument of this case much stress was laid upon the expressions of the letter, written by Richard, (then Dr.) Jackson, to Cooth, dated the 8th of July, 1772, thirty-six years after the date of the deed creating the new limitations. In that letter, after mentioning a will, supposed to have been left by his wife, he adds, "It would not hurt me in the least to find it good for nothing. As you are HER HEIR AT LAW, Should I find the fee of her estate in me, I might," etc. When he wrote that letter, he seems to have had an impression of some deed by which the fee vested in him. From this it has been argued, that the relief has been rightly given by a Court of Equity, [109] upon the supposition that the deed of 1746 was a fraudulent transaction. But it appears clearly, from the frame of the decree † itself, that it was not made upon that ground; and from an investigation of the whole transaction, no facts can be collected to justify the imputation of fraud. To forget the particular

* In the report of this case, in 16 Vesey, 356, it is stated, that the term was assigned to Jackson, the husband. But that is a mistake. The provision of the deed is, that on payment, etc. the term shall cease; and there is no proviso for re-assignment. According to the substance and prayer of the cross bill, in the cause, it is supposed that the term is in the representative of Child, the mortgagee.

† Lord Redesdale, in moving judgment, read the whole decree. See p. 112, et seq.

terms of a marriage settlement, executed at a very distant period of time, is no uncommon failure of the memory; and from the letter, dated the 7th of August, 1772, in which Dr. Jackson inclosed a copy of his wife's will, and where he uses, respecting the freehold estate, the expression, "It is mine for life, as heir to my children;" it is clear that he had forgotten the terms of the settlement, and was writing under evident mistake.

At various times after the date of these letters, Dr. Jackson, upon the application of Charles Cooth, had lent him sums of money, which in the year 1783 amounted to £600; and Dr. Jackson by a letter sent to Cooth but a short time before, having informed him that the chirograph of the fine and the deed to lead the uses were missing, and that he (Charles Cooth), as heir-at-law to Mrs. Jackson, was intitled to the estate after his (Dr. Jackson's) death: it was agreed between them that the £600 advanced should be secured by a mortgage to be made by Cooth of his supposed reversionary interest. Upon this misapprehension of Dr. Jackson as to the [110] nature of his interest under the new settlement, it is to be observed (in addition to the length of time since the execution), that the ultimate limitation was not simply and absolutely to Dr. Jackson in fee. But after estates provided to him and his wife for their lives, and for their issue, upon the decease of the survivor: the fee in default of issue was limited to the survivor of the husband and wife. Under this misapprehension, however, a mortgage of the supposed reversion was prepared and executed in 1784, and by the decree upon the hearing in the Court below, it was declared that the Appellant, as representative of Dr. Jackson, was intitled to a charge upon the estate to that amount.

After all these transactions, Dr. Jackson having made farther advances to Cooth by way of loan, to the amount of £400, the parties agreed that a farther charge should be made upon the supposed reversion by way of indorsement upon the mortgage deed already executed, which was accordingly prepared. But before it was carried into effect, the chirograph of the fine and the deed to lead the uses of the fine, dated in 1746, had been discovered by Dr. Jackson, who thereupon sent to Charles Cooth the deed, purporting to create a mortgage upon his supposed reversion as an useless instrument.

Charles Cooth, before he received information of the discovery of the fine and deed, had, by a will dated in 1782, giving to one Hester Bower, his supposed reversionary interest in the Lye Farm, (part of the lands in question). The will adopting [111] the erroneous notion communicated to Cooth by Dr. Jackson himself, recites that "Dr. Jackson is intitled to the premises for life, as tenant by the curtesy of England."

After the death of Charles Cooth, Dr. Jackson sued for and obtained from Mrs. Bower, part of the money advanced to Cooth; and Mrs. Bower died in 1794, without having made any claim to the reversion under the will of Charles Cooth, and without requiring any receipt for the monies paid by her to be indorsed upon the mortgage of the supposed reversion.

In 1797 Dr. Jackson died. He had made a will in 1775, when Charles Cooth was living, by which he had given the lands and farms in question to Charles Cooth and the Appellant. Afterwards, by a will dated in 1797, he devised the same lands, etc. to the Appellant, subject to the charge of certain annuities.

The Bill was filed in 1804 by J. B. Innes, claiming as heir at law to Hester Bower. It was afterwards amended by making Edmund, the heir at law of Charles Cooth a co-plaintiff, and adding other parties. After stating the original settlement, the several deeds of mortgage, and new limitation, etc. and that the equity of redemption was by mistake reserved to the survivor of Dr. Jackson and his wife; the bill prayed an account of arrears of the mortgage, of rents and profits, since the death of Dr. Jackson, etc. and a reconveyance, etc. The cross bill filed by the Appellant seems to have had no reasonable object or purpose, and was properly dismissed. The [112] causes having been heard in 1809, before the Lord Chancellor, it was declared, in the original cause, that (the Appellant) was a trustee of the equity of redemption in the estates and premises called Lye Farm, for the said plaintiff J. B. Innes, as the heir at law of Hester Bower, who was the devisee of Charles Cooth, the eldest son and heir at law of John Cooth, deceased, who was the heir at law of Anne Jackson; and of the equity of redemption in the estate and premises called Burnt House Farm, for the said Edmund Cooth, as the heir at law of the said Charles Cooth. And it was ordered, that the Master should take an account of the rents and profits of the said premises received by (the Appellant), etc. since the death of the said R. Jackson. And in case (the Appellant) had been in possession of all or any part of the said premises, it was ordered, that the said Master should set an annual value, by way of rent, wherewith he ought to be charged. And it was ordered, that (the Appellant) should be charged with the same accordingly; and in taking the said account the said Master was to apportion such rents, issues, and profits between the said premises called Lye Farm, and the said premises called Burnt House Farm. And it was ordered, that the said Master should take an account of what was due for principal and interest, upon and by virtue of the indentures of lease and release, or mortgage, bearing date the 15th and 16th days of January, 1784, and also what was due in respect of the sum of £80 2s. and interest advanced by the said Richard Jackson to the said [113] Charles Cooth, since the date of the said indentures. And it was further ordered, "That in case what should be found due in respect of such principal, interest, and costs, should exceed what should be so found due for the said rents, issues, and profits, then upon the said John Blundell Innes and Edmund Cooth paying the amount of such excess into the Bank, to the credit of the said cause, within six months after the said Master should have made his report; or in case the said rents and profits should exceed what should be found due for principal, interest and costs, as aforesaid, it was ordered, that Gilbert Jackson (the Appellant,) and Jane Hamilton, should re-convey the said farm, called Lye Farm, with the appurtenances, to the said John Blundell Innes, and the said farm called Burnt House Farm, with the appurtenances, to the said Edmund Cooth, free from incumbrances; but in default of the said John Blundell Innes and Edmund Cooth paying the amount of the excess aforesaid by the time and in the manner therein mentioned, it was ordered, that the Plaintiff's bill in the original cause should stand dismissed; but his Lordship reserved the consideration of the question, who was beneficially entitled to what should be found due for principal, interest, and costs, until after the Master should have made his report." From this decree the appeal is presented upon the ground that the decision is not justified by the authority of the cases in which reservations of the equity of redemption to persons [114] having no previous interest, have been considered as resulting trusts for the previous owners of the estates.

This is a case of great importance as a precedent, and as affecting the titles of persons who take under conveyances, supposing it not to be liable to impeachment upon the ground stated. It is highly important in all cases, that the principles of decision should be known and uniform—that professional persons may be able to advise with safety. In a case of this kind, a purchaser acting under a misconception of his legal adviser, found that his title was deficient. That was the case of Ruscombe v. Hare (5 Dow, 1 (D. P. June 5, 1818), in which the doctrine of resulting trust was held applicable. In this case it is alleged, that there is a distinct ground, scil. of fraud, to annul the limitation to the husband being the survivor. But no such ground is recognised by the decree, or established in evidence. The only question, therefore, which is now presented for the consideration of the House, is, whether the decree is founded upon the principle which regulated former decisions, and was established by the judgment of this House upon the appeal in the case of Ruscombe v. Hare. The principle is this—That in a mortgage, the mere form of reservation of the equity of redemption is not of itself sufficient to alter the previous title. In such a case, (where fraud is out of the question), it is supposed to arise from inaccuracy or mistake, which is to be explained and corrected by the state of the title as it was before the mortgage. This is conformable to the principle upon [115] which other cases have been determined. If a lease be made by tenant for life, under a power created by a settlement, and a rent is reserved to the lessor and his heirs, (which is not an unusual blunder), those words are interpreted by the prior title, and applied to such person as, under the settlement, may be entitled to the estate in remainder, and not to the heir of the lessor, unless he happen to be such remainder man. In all such cases, the words used are to be interpreted according to the title when the instrument is executed. So where an estate belonging to the wife is mortgaged, and the equity of redemption is reserved to the heirs of the husband, there is a resulting trust for the wife and her heirs.

The case of Broad v. Broad * was the first in which the doctrine was applied. In Eq. Ca. Abr. 62, it is laid down as a general principle, that where money is borrowed by husband and wife, upon the security of the wife's estate, although the equity of redemption by the mortgage deed is reserved to the husband and his heirs; yet the wife shall redeem, and not the heir of the husband; and for authority, reference is made to the case of Broad v. Broad. According to the facts of that case, to be collected from the reports, T. B. the husband of the Plaintiff in the suit, settled certain houses in Bread-street, London, to the use of himself for life, remainder to the Plain-[116]-tiff for life for her jointure. These houses were burnt down in the great fire in 1666. In order to rebuild them, the husband borrowed £600, and a fine was levied by husband and wife to the lender for 99 years, who re-demised the premises to the husband for 98 years, rendering £36 per annum, and binding himself to repay the £600 at a time,† etc. The husband had agreed with the wife that she should have the redemption paying the interest of the money borrowed. But when the houses were rebuilt, the husband settled them, among other lands, upon himself, in tail to the heirs male of his body—the remainder in tail to his brother, (who was Defendant in the suit) charged with portions of £3000 to his daughters. He died, making his brother, the Defendant, his executor; and his personal estate was not sufficient to pay his debts. The Defendant had executed a bond, upon which he was liable as surety for his deceased brother to the amount of £1600, which he satisfied, and also paid the interest of the £600 borrowed, until 1681, when the Plaintiff filed her bill, by which she prayed that she might redeem, paying proportionably, and hold over until she was repaid with interest. The Defendant insisted that the premises, having been re-demised to his brother, were assets to pay his debts; and further, that the Plaintiff's title was but a parol agreement between husband and wife; and that he had no notice of the agreement until the filing of the bill. [117] It was decreed, that the Plaintiff should have the redemption, paying a third part of the principal, but should have no profits received by the Defendant until the filing of the bill in 1681, when he first had notice of the agreement. The decree, therefore, which was made upon the original hearing, proceeded entirely upon the foundation of the agreement. A bill of review‡ having been afterwards filed, suggesting, that the decree was founded upon a trust arising out of an agreement by the husband, and that the agreement was not mentioned in the decree, nor stated to have been proved: Lord North, then Keeper, admitted the objection to the form of the decree, and said, that he took no notice of the agreement on that account, but affirmed the decree, because when the wife joined in the fine of her jointure, in order to a mortgage or security, it was not an absolute departing with her interest; but there resulted a trust for her when the mortgage was paid, to have her estate again, as if it had been a mortgage on condition, and the money paid at the day.

That was the first § case in which the principle was established. It has ever

* This case appears in Eq. Ca. Abr. 316, referring to 1 Vern. 213, under the name of Brend v. Brend. In 2 Chanc. Ca. 99, it is Brond v. Brond; and in 2 Chanc. Ca. 161, it is Broad v. Broad. See note †, infra.

† It was in such form that mortgages of this species were made at the date of the report.

‡ 22 Feb. 1683, Brond v. Broad, 2 Chanc. Ca. 161. It appears singular that the Court in this case, at the original hearing, should have proceeded upon the ground of the agreement only, and have taken no notice of the doctrine of resulting trust. Because in the same Court three years before, a case seems to have been decided upon that principle. See the note, infra.

§ There is an earlier case, decided in the time of Lord Nottingham, in which the same principle appears to have been applied. Cotton v. Cotton, 2 Chanc. Rep. p. 72, 30 Car. 2. The cause was heard by Mr. Justice Windham, and the application of the doctrine of resulting trust appears incidentally in the report of the decree, which contains the following declaration:—"And as to the mortgage made to Perkins by the said Nicholas and the Defendant his relict, it appearing that part of the mortgaged lands was, before that mortgage was made, settled on the said Nicholas and Katherine in jointure, or otherwise, so as the same came to her as since been adopted [118] and referred to in all subsequent cases, up to the late decision in Ruscombe v. Hare. The rule fixed by those cases is no more than this,—where the equity of redemption is reserved to the husband, upon a mortgage of the wife's estate, and there is nothing more in the transaction, the Courts hold, that no alteration of the previous rights of the parties is effected. But it is an exception to that rule, where other circumstances occur, affording evidence of an intended alteration of rights.

In Rowel v. Whalley, 4 Chan. Rep. 116, the wife joined with her husband in a mortgage of her lands, by a deed containing a proviso and declaration, that if the husband and wife, or either of them, or their heirs, executors, etc. paid to the mortgagee, his executors, etc. the sum borrowed, that the fine to be levied according to a covenant contained in the deed should enure to the husband and wife, and the longest liver of them; with remainder to the right heirs of the husband for ever. Here is a case of a distinct declaration, in no manner depending upon the [119] proviso for redemption, but defining the course in which the property is to be carried after the satisfaction of the mortgage. A fine was afterwards levied, according to the agreement among the parties, and after the death of the husband, a bill to redeem was filed by the relict. The son and heir of the former husband being a party Defendant in the suit, was an infant. The Court decreed, that the Plaintiff and the infant, should proportionably pay what was due upon the mortgage, at the time of the death of the mortgagor, rating the estate for life of the Plaintiff in the premises at one third, and the reversion in fee of the infant at two thirds. In that case it was determined that the subsequent declaration and limitation having no connexion with the proviso for redemption, but declaring what should become of the property after the mortgage was satisfied, operated against the construction of a resulting trust for the benefit of the wife. It was held to be a distinct settlement, and that she had parted with her estate. In the case now pending before us for judgment, the distinction is stronger; for it is the mortgage term which is made redeemable by the husband and wife, and the fee is the subject of settlement.

In the case of the Earl of Huntingdon v. the Countess of Huntingdon,* 2 Vernon, 437, the [120] mortgage was made by the mother of the Plaintiff joining with her husband, of lands, being her inheritance; and the purpose was to raise money for the husband to pay for the place of captain of the Band of Pensioners. The mortgage was for a term of years, subject to which the estate was settled to the Countess, (the Plaintiff's mother), for life, remainder to the Plaintiff in tail; the proviso for redemption was, that on payment of the mortgage money, the term should cease. In 1683, the Countess joined with her husband in an assignment of the mortgage; and in the deed of assignment the proviso was, that on payment of the money borrowed by them, or either of them, the mortgage term was to be assigned as they, or either of them, should direct or appoint. The husband afterwards paid off the mortgage, and took an assignment of the term in trust for himself, and by will bequeathed his personal estate to the Defendant, his second wife, who claimed the term. The Plaintiff filed a bill in Chancery, praying that the term might be [121] survivor: This Court is of opinion, that the equity of redemption belongs to her as survivor, and not to the Plaintiff," who claimed it as heir to Nicholas her husband.

* See Tate v. Austin, 1 P. W. 261, where this case appears as cited by Cowper, Lord Chancellor; but the circumstances are not correctly given in the report. The Lord Chancellor is supposed to state in Huntingdon v. Huntingdon, that the heir of the wife brought his bill to exonerate the inheritance, and to have the mortgage paid off out of the husband's personal estate; which is repugnant to the facts of the case, and the previous statement in the report itself, that the husband had, in his lifetime, paid off the mortgage. The question in the cause was, Whether the executrix and devisee of the husband, (being his second wife), was entitled to hold the term under the will for her own benefit; or whether there was a resulting trust for the heir of the first wife; and if so, whether he was bound to repay to the estate of the deceased husband the principal and interest, which he had paid to discharge the mortgage, or was entitled to have an assignment of the term without such payment.

assigned to him. The Lord Keeper refused to make such decree, except upon the usual terms of a redemption, paying principal, interest, and costs; but upon appeal (1 Bro. P. C. 1) to Parliament the decree was reversed, and the term directed to be assigned to the Appellant, with an account of profits from the death of the Appellant's mother, making to the Respondent just allowances for the maintenance of the Appellant, and management of the estate. In that case, the limitation, after the life-estate, was to the son in tail; and in the case now under discussion, it is to the husband and wife, and the heirs of their bodies; or, in default of issue, to the survivor of the husband and wife in fee; and that is the only difference in that respect between the cases. The proviso for redemption in the Earl of Huntingdon's case was, that on payment by either of them, the term should be assigned as they or either of them should direct. Under these circumstances, the executrix and devisee of the husband insisted that, as he had paid the mortgage, and taken the assignment, it belonged to her as his representative. The son of the former wife contended, that the estate was under settlement, and bound by the terms of the settlement; that the husband and wife could not deal with the estate beyond their own interest; and it was held, as to the term assigned to the husband, and possessed under his will by the Defendant, that there was a resulting trust for the son.

[122] In the case of Lewis v. Vangie (Ambler's Rep. p. 150), the property which belonged to the wife was mortgaged and settled upon the husband and wife, with remainder, not to the wife herself, but to the wife's sister: the wife died, and the sister brought a bill in order to compel the husband to pay off the mortgage. In that case it appeared, that the money raised upon the mortgage being £1100, was in part borrowed for the use of the husband, and part of it for the purpose of paying a debt incurred by the wife previous to the marriage. In giving judgment upon that case, the Lord Chancellor said, "The general rule is, that when the husband borrows a sum of money for his own use, and the wife joins in a mortgage of her jointure, for re-payment of it, that her estate shall be a creditor upon the husband for that sum. So it is where there is no settlement, and the wife mortgages her estate of inheritance, to raise money for the husband, but where, at the time of executing such mortgage, or security, a settlement is made, either before or after marriage, there is no instance in which the husband has been considered answerable to the wife's estate for the money borrowed,"—and he there held, that under the circumstances of this case, there being a settlement of the estate, the husband was not liable for the money borrowed. The subsequent limitation was not impeached by the person who brought the bill, because that person was entitled to the estate under that limitation.

[123] In the case of Jackson v. Parker (Ambler's Rep. p. 687), which was decided by Sir Thomas Sewell, a difficulty occurred of a different description. The husband had borrowed a sum of money, and in order to make a security, by mortgage of his own estate, his wife joined in a fine, which would have the effect of barring her of any claim of dower. The limitation of the equity of redemption was to the husband and the wife, and their heirs; and there was a declaration in the deed, that after payment of the money lent on the mortgage, the fine should enure to the husband and his heirs. Other charges were afterwards made upon the estate, and those subsequent charges were all made redeemable by the husband and wife, and their heirs. The husband by his will made a disposition of this property, in trust, to raise provisions for all his children. But the will was disputed by the eldest son and heir at law, upon the ground, that it was a devise of the equity of redemption, of which the husband was not sole seised; because the equity of redemption was reserved to the husband and wife, and their heirs. Sir Thomas Sewell had some difficulty upon the subject at first, in consequence of the words of the statute of wills, which does not admit of a devise of property, of which the devisor is not sole seised. But upon reflection, he decided, that the case was to be considered as in equity; it was not a legal estate, and as an estate to be governed by the rules of equity, it was the seisin of the husband, and not [124] of the wife. Upon a contest for redemption, the Court would regard the ownership of the estate, previous to the mortgage, and in that view the husband would be considered as the person entitled to redeem, the wife being entitled to redeem only in respect of her interest, which would have been only a right to dower, if she had survived her husband. In such case she would have been entitled to have had the estate redeemed, for the purpose of letting in her dower, but there her right ended, and that therefore the husband must be taken to be, in equity, sole seised of the estate, as if the mortgage had not been made. In that case it was argued, "That the Court will put a true construction on the deed, by taking into consideration the ownership of the estate, and the purpose for which the deed was made. That the husband was the owner of the estate, and the intention of the deed was merely to make a mortgage, and the wife was made a party and joined in the fine, for the sake of the mortgagee."—And this argument was adopted by the judgment.

In the case of Corbett v. Barker, according to the report (1 Anstr. p. 138), the Court do not seem to have had the least notion that there existed a resulting trust, such as the House of Lords held to exist in the case of Ruscombe v. Hare, and they dismissed the bill. In that case, it appears probable that Baron Thomson doubted the correctness of the decision: for he says, "That a reservation of the [125] kind now under discussion, in a fine levied, completely diverso intuitu, shall not, without an express declaration of such intention, carry the estate in a new channel." The cause being afterwards re-heard, the Court seems to have been of opinion, that a trust resulted in favour of the original owner of the estate, and determined accordingly. The report of the case is so very imperfect in its language and statements, that it is difficult to discover what are the facts of the case, and the point decided; but as far as they can be collected, the case appears to have been of the same nature*

* The case upon the original hearing is reported 1 Anstr. 138. The only facts reported, so far as they regard the principle discussed in the text, are as follow:—The Plaintiff's father being seised in right of his wife, he and the wife mortgaged the estate for a term of years, and a fine was levied according to previous agreement and covenant; which fine was to enure to the use of the mortgagee, his heirs and assigns, subject to the proviso, and the equity of redemption was reserved to the husband and wife and their heirs. Afterwards, the mortgage having been assigned to the Defendants; the husband and wife, in consideration of £160, by lease and release, conveyed their equity of redemption in fee, and covenanted, that all fines, conveyances, etc. should enure to the sole use of the Defendant in fee. After the death of the husband and wife, the Plaintiff their son filed the bill, claiming the estate by descent, as heir to his mother, subject to the mortgage. For the Plaintiff it was argued, that the mortgage deed being only for a term of years, though the fine is in fee, yet it is to the uses mentioned in the deed; and there is a proviso that on payment, etc. the term shall be void; then only the term was in the mortgage, and the fee was a resulting use in the wife, from whom it proceeded; and that being vested by the statute, she was immediately in of her old estate as to the fee.

Romilly for the Defendant, argued, that the bill could only reach one half of the estate. For as the fine saves the equity of redemption to the husband and wife, and their heirs, one half was therefore vested in him, and passed to the Defendant; but Thomson, B. interposed, saying, "it had often been ruled, that a reservation of this kind, in a fine, levied completely diverso intuitu, shall not, without an express declaration of such intention, carry the estate in a new channel; nor even if it had been to the husband and his heirs only." After this interposition by the Court, the argument upon this point of the case appears to have been dropped, and the question was then argued and decided upon the fact of length of possession by the mortgagee. Eyre, Chief Baron, at the conclusion of his judgment saying,—As the Plaintiff fails upon this point, (i.e. possession by the mortgagee), it is unnecessary to consider the other, as to the operation of the fine upon the subsequent conveyance; although upon that point the Plaintiff's counsel seemed to be in the right. There is not to be found, either in this report, or in the further report of the case upon the re-hearing, (3 Anstr. p. 755), any other statement or allusion to the doctrine of resulting trust. The principle of decision is to be collected only from the extracts above inserted. It appears singular that it should not have been adverted to by the Court in giving judgment; yet it is possible, considering the decisive remark made by Thomson, Baron, upon the original hearing, that nothing further might have been said upon the subject at the re-hearing.

[126] as Broad v. Broad, and the other cases which have been decided upon a similar principle.

It must now be admitted as an established principle, to be applied in deciding upon the effect of mortgages of this description, whether it be the estate of the wife, or the estate of the husband, if the wife joins in the conveyance, either because the estate belongs to her, or because she has a charge by way of jointure or dower, out of the estate, and there is a mere reservation in the proviso for redemption of the mortgage, which would carry the estate from the person who was owner at the time of executing the mortgage, or where [127] the words admit of any ambiguity; that there is a resulting trust for the benefit of the wife, or for the benefit of the husband, according to the circumstances of the case. But here, it seems to me, that the operation of the deed, as to the mortgage term, and the operation of the deed as to the limitation of the fee, are wholly distinct, and do not in any way depend on each other. The question does not arise upon the interpretation of the proviso for redemption, but it arises upon a distinct and subsequent clause of the deed. The term and the fee are kept distinct in the deed. The term is a security for the re-payment of the money lent, and when the mortgage should be discharged, the intention of the maker of the deed was, that the term should be completely at an end. The way in which they proposed to effect this was, by declaring, that upon payment of the money due, the term shall cease. If the money had been paid at the day, the term ceasing, there would have remained nothing of the mortgage operating upon the property. But there would then have remained the declaration in the deed, directing what should be done with the estate, subject to the term. The term being at an end, the operation of the deed, so far as it declared the limitations of the estate, subject to the term, remained perfectly distinct, and had no connexion whatsoever with the existence of a term, which then would have ceased to exist. A Court of Equity will so deal with a declaration, that, upon payment of a sum of money on a given day, the term shall cease; that, although the term becomes absolute [128] by non-payment of the money at the day, it is still subject to redemption. By whom it may be redeemed, must be discovered from the title, which, by the deed itself, is declared to be in the husband and wife, for their respective lives, then to the heirs of their bodies, and then to the survivor in fee. Upon the declarations, therefore, and the provisions of that deed, the redemption would arise by implication, in case the money was not paid at the day. The implication must be drawn from the deed itself, declaring who were the persons entitled to the estate.

In all the other cases decided upon the general principle, the grounds of the decision were, "that the mode in which the redemption was limited, was by mistake or improper contrivance introduced into the deed." But in this case, there is no ground to raise such imputations. For the deed is clear and express in its declarations and provisions. The case is really in principle, if not in circumstances, the same as the case of Rowell v. Whalley.

Where the declaration of the uses of the fine refers simply to the operation of the deed as a mortgage: where it is simply a declaration, that the money being paid, the fine shall enure to the persons who make the mortgage, and there is nothing else which makes it subject to redemption, that would be considered as a mere clause of redemption, and construed in the same way. But where the form of the equity of redemption has nothing to do with the limitation of the estate; where the limitation of the estate is perfectly [129] distinct, it seems to me the rules which have been established in the cases of resulting trusts, do not in any degree apply.

Suppose that Dr. Jackson had died first, and that Mrs. Jackson had married again, and marrying again, had issue by a second marriage, there being also issue of the first,—what would have been the construction then put upon this deed? According to the deed, if she had only daughters by the first marriage, they would take the estate under the limitation to the heirs of the body of Dr. and Mrs. Jackson. But if the estate was to be considered as a fee in her, and if this subsequent declaration was to operate nothing, if she had a son by her second marriage, that son would be her heir at law. Yet if a contest had arisen between the daughters by the first marriage, and the son by the second, could any doubt have been entertained who would be entitled to the estate? Dr. Jackson had stipulated for his own children. Consider how the estate was limited before the mortgage. It was limited by the original settlement to the children. When that settlement was destroyed by the fine, and the revocation, which was the effect of the fine, and new uses declared, the resulting trust, if any could arise, must be to the old uses declared under the settlement. If otherwise, the estate must have gone according to the new uses; and then there might have been a contest between the persons entitled under the latter disposition, and those who were entitled under the former.

Suppose again, that Mrs. Jackson had survived, [130] and there had been issue of the marriage, and the issue had thought fit to say to Mrs. Jackson, "you are only tenant for life," would not she have had a right to answer, "I am tenant in tail under this deed; I and my husband have levied a fine; and having levied a fine, declared the estate to ourselves and the heirs of our own bodies, which gives me an estate tail, and enables me to dispose of the estate in case I should think fit to suffer a recovery or to bar the entail by a fine." It would have been extremely difficult in such a case to have decided that Mrs. Jackson was not entitled to the benefit of this estate.

The question of fraud must be put out of the case, as it appears to me. How can it be imagined that a prospective fraud was contemplated, the effect of which, according to the view in which the objection is made, must have depended upon the chance, whether the husband would survive the wife. That contingency happened six-and-twenty years after the deed was executed. The Court must interpret the deed. No Court has a power, in such a case, to set aside a deed. Ruscombe v. Hare, and all the prior cases, have been interpretations of the deed. The ownership, prior to the deed, and the purpose of the deed, must be considered, in giving the interpretation:—that is the language of Sir Thomas Sewell in Jackson v. Parker. In the case before us, we are required not to interpret the deed, but to determine that the part of the deed which, having no connection with the mortgage, disposes of the estate, subject to the mortgage term, is to be wholly set aside, [131] either as a fraud, if a case of fraud can be made out, or as a mistake, if a case of mistake can be made out. If they proceed on the ground of mistake, there must be evidence. To support the allegation of fraud there must also be evidence. It must be shewn that this clear and explicit declaration was contrary to the intention of the wife, in consenting to the deed. If the wife had survived, and she had thought fit to insist upon the validity of this deed against her own children, could it then have been said that it was a fraud upon her intention in executing the deed; and yet, to support such a claim on behalf of the children, it would have been necessary to decide that a fraud was practised upon the wife, and that the deed was made contrary to her intention. Nothing short of that opinion would enable the Court to restore the original settlement, and give the children a claim, in contradiction to the rights of the mother, under this deed.

If the question had been put to me, after the death of Mrs. Jackson, whether Dr. Jackson, having survived her, had a good title to this estate, I should not have scrupled to give my opinion, that he had a good title to the estate. If a similar question had been put to me in Ruscombe v. Hare, I should have answered doubtfully; because, in the case of Broad v. Broad, and cases decided upon the principle which there prevailed, I should have found that Courts of Equity had applied the doctrine of resulting trust for the benefit of the wife. But, according to the mode in which [132] this settlement has been made, there is no connection whatever, in legal operation, between the mortgage and the new limitations contained in the deed, which are distinct in form and substance, expressly providing for a subject which was not included in the mortgage. They limit the reversion in fee, while the mortgage is confined to the term of 1000 years.

Upon these grounds it appears to me that the part of this decree which declared, that the Appellant was a trustee of the equity of redemption for Blundell Innes, as the heir of Hester Bower, and for the heir of Cooth, is not according to law. The equity of redemption there intended is, I presume, the equity of redemption upon the original mortgage, which was made by Dr. Jackson and his wife, because the Appellant was not trustee of any equity of redemption upon the mortgage of 1784. Dr. Jackson was mortgagee in that mortgage. The mortgage of 1784 was a mortgage made by Charles Cooth to the late Dr. Jackson. It was a conveyance, under the supposition that Charles Cooth had a legal interest in the reversion of the estate. The supposed equity of redemption was in Charles Cooth, and in those claiming under him, and it was the supposed legal estate that was so far in Dr. Jackson. I apprehend therefore that the declaration that the Appellant was trustee of the equity of redemption, means the equity of redemption upon the mortgage term, which was created and confirmed by the mortgage deeds executed in 1745 and 1746, by Dr. and Mrs. Jackson. If that term of years was vested in Dr. [133] Jackson, it was a term which, according to the spirit of the decree, he or his representative would have been bound to convey. But what is vested in the present Appellant, Mr. Jackson, under the will of the late Dr. Jackson, is not an equity of redemption, but a fee simple of the estate, subject to a term of years, which term of years was subject to an equity of redemption.

I apprehend that at the time when this decree was made, the circumstances of the case could not have been correctly stated to the Court; that there must have been some confusion, arising from the statement which was made to the Court, and owing to that confusion this declaration was contained in the original decree—that the Appellant was a trustee of the equity of redemption in the estates and premises, the Appellant not having in him any estate whatsoever which was in the nature of an equity of redemption. He had the fee simple of the estate, subject to a term of years;—but he had not in him, so far as I can find from the pleadings, the term of years, for I do not find that the term was assigned. He had also whatever interest Cooth conveyed by the mortgage which he executed; but that mortgage executed by Cooth could convey nothing, if Jackson had the fee in him which was vested by the settlement made in 1746. The language, therefore, of the decree is certainly in that respect incorrect, and I think that must have arisen from some misstatement with respect to the circumstances of the case. As they now appear before the House upon the pleadings, my humble opinion is, that this decree, [134] so far as it directs a conveyance by Mr. Jackson to Innes and Edmund Cooth, is erroneous. For the uses limited by the deed of 1746 being to Dr. and Mrs. Jackson, and the survivor of them, and to the heirs of their bodies, with remainder to the survivor in fee, according to the terms of that deed, and as I conceive the intent of the parties, there is no foundation whatever for holding that the settlement made by that deed shall not have the operation which the words of the deed import. I do not find any thing in this case to constitute Dr. and Mrs. Jackson, to whom the estate is limited during their lives, and the natural life of the longest liver, or to constitute the heirs of their two bodies, to whom it was further limited, subject to their estates for life as tenants in tail, or the right heir of the survivor, trustees, or a trustee for any person. But if they were to be deemed trustees, then they must be deemed trustees for the benefit of the persons who would have been entitled under the original settlement. For if the case is to be considered as if the new limitations ought not to have been in the deed, that they ought to be totally expunged from the deed, and that after the declaration that the fine should enure for the purpose of supporting the term of a thousand years, the deed should have no further operation, which is the manner in which a decree of this description, founded on the cases which have been determined, must be framed, if it be maintainable, the consequence would be, that it must result to the trust in the original marriage settlement. In such case, if Mrs. Jackson [135] had survived, and there had been issue of the marriage, she would have had, under this deed, an interest different from that which she would have had under the marriage settlement, and she would then have been reduced to the simple condition of tenant for life, and her issue would have been entitled, the sons in tail male, and the daughters in tail general, and she could have had only an ultimate limitation in fee. If she had survived, and had issue of the marriage, could we have held that she would have taken no benefit under the deed of 1746, but must have been bound by the provisions of the marriage settlement of the year 1743. I confess I cannot find any ground for such a determination, and therefore I cannot find a ground for supporting the decree which has been pronounced.

I shall move simply to reverse this decree, and that the bill should be dismissed.

The Lord Chancellor.—The circumstances of this case are certainly, in point of fact, much better understood than they were, and much greater research has been made into cases, so as to bring before the consideration of the House, the true principle of decision. The Court below did not rightly apprehend the case, as it now appears. The judgment of this House will remove a difficulty, which I know is floating in the minds of many persons. I conceive it to have been the opinion of Lord Thurlow, that in order to dispose of the equity of redemption of the wife in an estate, it was absolutely necessary there should be in the recitals of the instrument, [136] some expression that the parties meant it so: that it was not enough to collect the intention from the limitations; but that there must be something more upon the face of the deed to lead the wife to understand what those limitations were. It does however occur to me, on looking into the cases which have been referred to, that such a proposition cannot be supported, and therefore I am of opinion that the decree must be reversed.

Decree reversed (10th July, 1819).

 After I had written the note which is to be found in pp. 125, 6, I was furnished with an extract of the decree upon rehearing in the case of Corbett v. Barker. The decree contains only directions for the ordinary accounts upon redemption, without any declaration upon the subject of resulting trust.

IRELAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

JAMES BUTLER, Esq. (commonly called Lord Dunboyne).—Appellant;

DANIEL MULVIHILL, and others.—Respondents [21th March 1819].

[Mews' Dig. iv. 80; vii. 179; viii. 826, 832, 862; xiv. 1357. See Nagle v. Baylor, 1812, 3 Dr. and War. 60; Gore v. Gibson, 1845, 13 M. and W. 623; Molton v. Camroux, 1818, 2 Ex. 187, 1849; 1 Ex. 17; Matthews v. Baxter, 1873, L. R. 8 Ex. 132; Imperial Loan Co. v. Stone [1892], 1 Q. B. 599.]

A LEASE obtained by fraud and circumvention, from a person in a state of intoxication, is void in equity.

A lease for lives of lands in Ireland, renewable for ever, is not absolutely forfeited by extinction of all the lives and neglect to pay the fines for renewal, even after notice from the lessor. Under particular circumstances, (as in the following case,) the right of renewal may still exist and be enforced.

In a case where A. the heir of the lessee, having such right, had entered into an agreement with B. respecting an independent lease of the lands held under the renewable lease by the ancestor of A., which independent lease B. had obtained from the landlord when in a state of intoxication, and by circumvention:—It was held, that the heir of A. and purchasers for valuable consideration, claiming under him, were entitled in equity to the benefit of the agreement between B. and A., and that the heir of the landlord (lessor) was entitled to the benefit of the same agreement, so far as B. took an interest.

The Respondent, Daniel Mulvihill, filed his bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, against the Appellant, praying that the Appellant might be decreed to grant to the Respondent D. M. a renewal of a certain lease in the bill, stated to bear date the 5th of July 1718, by inserting the life of Walter Molony in the place of Anthony Brady. The bill stated the following case:

[138] Garret Gough, being in and before the year 1718, seised of the town and lands of Ballyvannon and Tullahara, with their sub-denominations, by indenture, bearing date the 5th day of July 1718, demised the said premises unto Joseph Ringrose, subject to the yearly rent of thirty pounds; to hold unto the said Joseph Ringrose, his heirs and assigns, for and during the life and lives of the said Joseph Ringrose, Richard Ringrose, and Elias Ringrose, and the survivor of them, and the lease contained a covenant for perpetual renewal, on payment of five pounds, as a renewal fine on the fall of each life, and the nomination of another life.

Joseph Ringrose, by virtue of the lease, entered into, and continued seised and possessed of the premises until the time of his death, which happened in the year

1758. He left two sons, Jacob Ringrose and Philip Ringrose. Jacob, as eldest son and heir at law, entered into and became seised of the said lands, and continued so seised to the month of July, 1778, when he died without issue, leaving Philip Ringrose his brother and heir at law, who thereupon became entitled to the said lands and premises.

John Brady, nephew of Jacob Ringrose, having alleged that Jacob Ringrose had devised the said lands and premises to him, and all the persons named in the said original lease, as cestui que vies, being dead, obtained a renewal thereof in his own name from James Butler, the Appellant's father, in whom the fee of the said lands and premises were then vested, for the lives of him [139] the said John Brady, Mary his wife, and Anthony Brady his son, by a deed, bearing date the 11th day of July, 1783.

By indenture, bearing date on the 4th of July 1793, John Brady declared that he had taken the said renewal in trust for Philip Ringrose; and by the same indenture, Philip Ringrose demised the said premises to John Brady, for the life and lives of him the said John Brady, Anthony Brady his son, and Mary Brady his wife, at the yearly rent of one hundred and forty-two pounds: by virtue of which demise, John Brady became, and continued seised and possessed of the premises.

By a deed bearing date the 26th day of July, 1793, Philip Ringrose, for the considerations therein mentioned, conveyed and assigned all his estate, right, title, and interest, in and to the premises to Walter Weldon Molony, his heirs and assigns.

By indenture, bearing date the 27th day of December, 1794, Philip Ringrose and Walter Weldon Molony, in consideration of a marriage then intended to be solemnized between Walter Weldon Molony and Mary Spellisy, granted etc. to the respondent Daniel Mulvihill and Walter Weldon since deceased, the towns and lands of Ballyvannon aforesaid, with its sub-denominations, subject as therein mentioned, to hold, etc. for three lives, renewable for ever, in trust for the several uses, intents, and purposes in the deed mentioned.

James Butler died in the year 1784, and one of [140] the lives named in the renewed lease granted in July, 1783, having dropped, Daniel Mulvihill made several applications to the Appellant, who upon the death of James Butler, his father, became seised of the reversion of the said lands, for a renewal of the said original lease of 5th day of July, 1718, by inserting the life of Walter Molony, in the place of Anthony Brady, named in the renewed lease; and offered to the Appellant the sum of five pounds, with interest from the death of Anthony Brady, and also the proportion of a renewal-fine for the time which had elapsed since the death of the said Anthony Brady.

The Appellant having refused to renew the lease of 5th July, 1718, according to the request, and upon the terms proposed, the bill was filed against him, containing such allegations and prayer as before stated.

The Appellant, by his answer, after admitting many of the principal facts alleged in the bill, proceeded to state, that although, upon the death of Joseph Ringrose in 1758, Jacob Ringrose, his son, became seised under the lease of 1718, and so continued until 1778; yet the said Jacob omitted to renew the said lease, by nominating any other life in place and stead of Joseph Ringrose, and omitted to pay the rent and renewal fine; and although, in the life-time of the said Jacob, namely, between the said years 1758 and 1778, Richard Ringrose, another of the cestui que vies, died, Jacob Ringrose also omitted to renew the said lease, by nominating a life in [141] the place and stead of the said Richard Ringrose, or by paying the rent and renewal-fines; and although, immediately after the death of the said Jacob in 1778, the said Elias Ringrose, the last life in the said lease, died, yet Philip Ringrose omitted to renew or pay the renewal fines, rents, or arrears, pursuant to the covenant of renewal contained in the said lease of 1718, and withheld the yearly rent of the said lands reserved thereunder to a large amount, which arrears of rent and renewal-fines remain still unpaid, whereby the said lease of 1718 became forfeited in the life-time of Jacob Ringrose, and all benefit of renewal thereof for ever lost to the Ringrose family, or any other person claiming under the said lease of 1718.

The answer denied that John Brady, at any time, obtained a renewal of the lease of 1718 in his own name; and stated, that James Butler, who, upon the death of his uncle in or about the year 1778, succeeded as heir at law to the inheritance of the said lands, was a man of weak understanding, and addicted to excess in the use of spirituous liquors, and being educated in a foreign country, and bred up an officer in the German service, was unacquainted with his family affairs; that John Brady, being well aware of the laches and nonpayment of rent and renewal-fines under the lease of 1718, and of the forfeiture of the lease of 1718 thereby incurred, by the most fraudulent means, at a time when James Butler was in a state of intoxication, prevailed upon him to execute an instrument, purporting to be a new lease of the lands comprised [142] in the lease of 1718, bearing date on or about the 11th July, 1783, at the yearly rent of thirty pounds sterling, for the lives of the said John Brady, Mary his wife, and Anthony Brady his son, subject to a renewal-fine of five pounds on the fall of each life, with a covenant for perpetual renewal.

That Philip Ringrose, on the 15th day of October, 1789, filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, against John Brady, impeaching the will alleged by John Brady to have been made in his favour by Jacob Ringrose, and praying possession of the said lands: to which bill John Brady filed his answer, insisting upon the validity of the said will, and that all the lives named in the said lease of 1718, were extinct, and that the term thereof was expired: and stating that he treated with the Appellant's father in whom the fee of the lands was vested, and who alleged that he was not then bound by the covenant of renewal contained in the lease of 1718: and that for several valuable considerations, he obtained a lease of the lands from the Appellant's father, which was executed in 1783, for three lives, renewable for ever, discharged from any claims on the part of P. Ringrose, or any person claiming in his right. And Brady by his answer, further denied that he accepted the said lease as a trustee for Ringrose.

That after a variety of proceedings in the cause between John Brady and Philip Ringrose, they came to an amicable settlement; and that a certain deed, dated the 3d of July, 1793, was executed between them, by which, after reciting that Garret Gough was seised of the lands, and [143] that he executed the lease of 1718, to Joseph Ringrose, and reciting the seisin and possession of Joseph until his death, and the seisin and possession of Jacob till his death, and that all the lives were extinct: and that said Brady thereupon took the lease of 11th July, 1783; it was thereby declared, that the lease of 1783, was taken by Brady in trust for Philip Ringrose, in consideration whereof, Philip Ringrose thereby agreed to execute a lease for three lives, renewable for ever to John Brady, at the yearly rent of one hundred and forty-two pounds, and five pounds as a renewal-fine for each life to be renewed: which lease the said Philip Ringrose, on or about the 4th day of July, 1793, executed to Brady pursuant to the terms of the agreement; and that by the aforesaid deed of 3d July, 1793, John Brady covenanted that all rent then due out of the said premises should be paid by Brady, his heirs, etc. and that Brady would also indemnify Philip Ringrose from all debts and incumbrances due by Jacob Ringrose.

That after the execution of the said deed of compromise of 3d July, 1793, and the said lease of 4th July, 1793, Philip Ringrose, on the 15th of July 1793, executed a mortgage of his interest in the lands to Walter Weldon Molony, his solicitor, to secure a bill of costs claimed by Molony against Ringrose for a sum of £1512.

That Walter Weldon Molony, about the 25th or 26th of July, 1793, prevailed on Philip Ringrose to convey to him the equity of redemption in the lands in consideration of an annuity of forty-[144]-five pounds ten shillings, for the life of Philip, in addition to the former consideration of £1512.

That about the 22d of March, 1800, Philip Ringrose caused a bill to be filed in the Court of Chancery against Walter Weldon Molony and others, impeaching the said mortgage and conveyance for fraud, and charging, that the trustees named in Walter Weldon Molony's marriage-settlement or articles of 1791, had full notice of it: and praying that said deed of mortgage and bond executed therewith, and the said deed of conveyance of 25th or 26th days of July, 1793, and the marriage settlement of Walter Weldon Molony of 26th and 27th December, 1791, so far as same affected Philip Ringrose might be decreed fraudulent and cancelled, and praying a restitution of Molony's costs.

That Molony and his wife, about the 3d of April, 1801, filed a cross bill against Philip Ringrose, insisting that John Brady obtained the said lease of 11th July, 1783, as a new lease for his own benefit, and discharged from the said old lease or any covenant of renewal therein contained.

That Philip Ringrose, about the 10th November, 1801, filed his answer to the said cross bill, in which he does not deny that forty-five pounds were due for rent and renewal-fines of the said lands in 1766, and that some rent remained unpaid at the death of Elias Ringrose, the survivor of the persons named as cestui que vies, in the said original lease of 1718. He admitted that Brady wished to get a new lease to himself of the said [145] lands discharged from the said old lease of 1718, or any covenant for renewal therein contained, or any claim of Philip, and in consequence thereof said Brady obtained the said lease of 1783.

That before any decree was made in the said cause, Ringrose acceded to some amicable settlement.

That the Appellant attained the age of twenty-one years in July, 1801, and never since had received any rent for the lands comprised in the lease of 1783.

That in the year 1801, the Appellant brought an ejectment to recover possession of the lands in question, upon the trial of which, John Brady produced and for his defence relied upon, the lease of 1783, and the jury gave a verdict in his favour.

That the very limited circumstances of the Appellant prevented his taking proceedings to set aside the said lease of 11th of July, 1783, as having been obtained by fraud and imposition.

That James Butler died about the month of May, 1784, and not shortly after the said deed of release of 1794, as by bill alleged, leaving Appellant, his only son; who thereupon became seised of the said lands.

That Anthony Brady, one of the lives in the lease of 1783, died on the 13th day of April, 1804.

Finally, the Appellant, by his answer, admitted that he refused to execute a renewal to the Respondent, Mulvihill, of the lease of 11th July, 1783, or the lease of 1718, on the grounds before stated.

[146] The Respondents, on the 25th day of July, 1809, amended their bill, and thereby stated the death of John Brady. To which amended bill the Appellant put in his answer.

The Appellant filed a cross bill against Daniel Mulvihill, Walter Weldon Molony and Mary his wife, and various other persons interested in the lease; and therein stated the fraudulent means by which the said lease had been, in the year 1783, obtained from his father, the said James Butler, and praying that the same might be declared to have been fraudulently obtained, and be given up to be cancelled.

The Respondents by their answers, respectively insisted on the validity of the lease of 1783, and that they were purchasers of the beneficial interest of the same, without notice of any fraud.

The original and cross causes being at issue, the Respondents respectively exhibited the several instruments under which they claimed to be entitled; and examined a person of the name of Dannaher, to prove that the lease of 1783 had been fairly obtained, and that the fines and rent then due had been paid at the time of the execution of the lease.

The Appellant examined witnesses to prove, First, That the lease of 1783 was not a renewal of the lease of 1718: Secondly, That the lease of 1783 was obtained by fraud, practised on his father when he was so intoxicated as to be incapable of transacting business. Thirdly, That the Respondents, Mulvihill, etc. or those under whom they claimed, had at the time when they became, [147] as they pretended, purchasers of the beneficial interest thereof, notice, that the same had been fraudulently obtained from the Appellant's father, and that the Appellant was an infant, and incapable of doing any act in confirmation of the said lease.*

The causes came on to be heard in 1811, when the Lord Chancellor of Ireland declared, that the Respondent, Daniel Mulvihill, was entitled to the benefit of the covenant for renewal, contained in the lease of the 5th of July, 1718, and directed the Appellant to execute a renewal thereof to the Respondent, Daniel Mulvihill, for the lives of the Respondents, Walter Molony and Arthur Molony, pursuant to the true intent and meaning of the covenant. And in case the parties should differ as to the form of such renewal, or as to the premises contained in the said original lease, it was ordered that it should be referred to the master to compare the lease of the 11th of July, 1783, with the said original lease of the 5th of July, 1718, and thereupon to settle and approve of a proper renewal to be executed between the parties pursuant to the said decree.

* Upon some of the points, and particularly the intoxication, see the depositions, post, p. 150.

The Appellant thinking himself aggrieved by the decree, appealed to the House of Lords upon the following grounds:

The said decree assumes, that the lease of 1718 was in such force, as to entitle the Respondents to a renewal of it, by virtue of the [148] covenant for renewal therein contained; whereas the lease of 1718 had expired in the year 1778; and though the same might, under the Irish Tenantry Act, have been renewed at any time before notice given by the lessor to renew or within a reasonable time afterwards, upon payment of the rent in arrear and renewal fines; yet the lessor was not bound to renew, except upon such terms, and the Appellant's father having given notice, and the same not having been complied with in a reasonable time, he was not afterwards bound to renew, and therefore the court ought not to have decreed a renewal after an interval of upwards of twenty years.

The lease of 1783 does not even purport to be a renewal of the lease of 1718; the several answers of John Brady and Philip Ringrose shew that it was not so intended, and that it includes lands not demised by the said lease of 1718.

The evidence adduced by the Appellant proves, that the lowest rent which was at any time mentioned as the rent to be reserved, was two hundred pounds a year; whereas that actually reserved was thirty pounds a year, and the annual value of the premises very far exceeded even such rent of two hundred pounds a year.

The Appellant's father, at the time when he executed the said lease, was in a condition of mind which did not allow of his duly judging of its contents.

The lease so fraudulently obtained has not been confirmed by any subsequent act, either of the Appellant or his father.

[149] The Respondents who claim as purchasers for a valuable consideration, had notice of the fraud practised in obtaining the lease, and also of the Appellant's intention to impeach the same; and although this objection were founded in fact, it would not follow that the Respondents, as purchasers for valuable consideration, and without notice of a fraud, would be entitled to the assistance of a court of equity to give effect to a fraud practised by a person under whom they claim, more especially to the prejudice of an infant against whose estate such fraud is to be made effective.

On the part of the Respondent it was insisted, that no fraud appeared on the deed of 1783, and that at this distance of time it would be impossible for the Respondents to enter into any proof respecting it. That the Respondents are purchasers for a valuable consideration, without any notice of fraud, (if any were practised by John Brady.) That Walter Weldon Molony gave a full and fair value for the conveyance of the lands to him; and there is no evidence whatever that Walter Weldon Molony knew any thing improper respecting the execution of the said renewal: that the said renewal, though not technically drawn, yet being made by James Butler, as heir-at-law of Doctor James Butler, of Thurles, to John Brady, as devisee of Jacob Ringrose, and at the rent and fine for renewal in the lease of 1718, must be equitably and substantially considered as a renewal, and not as an original lease.

[150] In support of the allegations of the bill filed by the Appellant, a passage from the answer of John Brady to the bill of Philip Ringrose was read: and upon the subject of the notice to renew, the value of the lands, the intoxication, the fraud practised, and the notice to the purchasers, the following evidence was adduced.

Michael Donnellan deposed, that, in the beginning of July, 1783, a conversation took place, in deponent's presence, between John Brady and James Butler, touching a lease, or a renewal of a lease; the particulars of which conversation were, as well as deponent now recollects, as follows: "James Butler told John Brady that his lease of part of the lands which he held was out, for that the lives were extinct; and that although he had been served with notice to renew, and pay the rent and renewal-fines, yet he had neglected to do so; but James Butler added, that he would take no advantage of Brady's neglect; and Brady said, that he could hold the lands in spite of James Butler, and make them his own property, for that the statute of limitations had nearly run against James Butler, but that if James Butler would grant him a new lease, he would take the entire lands; and after some farther discussion, it was determined to postpone any agreement until they should go over the lands in the morning:" and deponent saith, that on the next morning Brady shewed deponent two of the farms on the lands, namely, Ballyvannon and Tullyhara, and sent an old man of his [151] to shew deponent the other two farms, which lay at some distance, namely, Tenehire and Island Grady; and deponent saw, examined, and valued all the lands: that after dinner on that day the conversation was renewed touching a lease or renewal of the lands; and James Butler alleged that the renewal-fines and arrears, which were due to him, amounted to eight hundred pounds, to which Brady replied that they could not amount to six hundred pounds; but Brady said that the better way would be for James Butler to forgive him all the renewal-fines and arrears, and to make him a lease of all the lands; and Brady said, that he would make it up to James Butler, by giving him a good rent for the lands; and James Butler having asked Brady what rent he would give, Brady said he ought not to give as much rent as another, he being then in possession of the whole, part thereof under James Butler, and part thereof, to wit, Tenehire and Island Grady, as devised to his uncle Ringrose, and he and family being old tenants to James Butler and his ancestors to that part of the lands called Ballyvannon and Tullyhara; that Brady, after some further observation, said, that he would give James Butler two hundred pounds a year for the entire lands, on getting a lease thereof for three lives, renewable for ever; and deponent saith he then interfered, and desired said Brady to double his offer, and that he would have the lands for their value, and said that his valuation of the lands was higher, for that he had valued them to five hundred pounds a year, but that he would recommend to James Butler [152] to make a lease of the lands to John Brady at four hundred pounds, as an old tenant; which offer Brady peremptorily refused: that he then recommended James Butler and Brady to go in the morning into the town of Ennis, and to lay all their papers before Counsellor Gregg, who was a man of honour and ability, and to be advised by him as to their respective rights and powers, to which they agreed.

Saith, That James Butler and deponent, on the day after, went together from John Brady's house at Ballyvannon, into the town of Ennis; and James Butler remained at a low whiskey house in the town; and deponent slept at a friend's house; that in a day or two afterwards, Brady also came into the town of Ennis, and renewed his treaty for a lease with James Butler; that Counsellor Gregg having been sent for, he enquired for their title deeds and papers, and neither James Butler nor John Brady having brought them, Counsellor Gregg said it would be impossible for him, without seeing such deeds and papers, to determine whether James Butler had a right to make a lease for three lives, or whether John Brady had any right to withhold any part of the lands: and Counsellor Gregg thereupon refused to interfere: and deponent saith that, perceiving John Brady was very pressing upon James Butler, and knowing from the state of intoxication in which James Butler was constantly, that he would be easily led to make a foolish bargain, deponent sent to Mrs. Butler, etc. etc.: and deponent saith, that on the following day, [153] deponent was in the bed room with James Butler, when John Brady, and a clerk of the name of Michael Dannaher came into the room with a pair of leases, one of them ready filled, and the counterpart about half filled up; that John Brady left the clerk in the room filling up the counterpart of said leases: and in some short time returned with Counsellor Gregg, and Brady asked Counsellor Gregg to look at the lease, which he refused to do, perceiving that James Butler was intoxicated: and Gregg immediately directed that Butler should be put to bed, and desired he would get no more liquor: and told Brady, that it was shameful of him to attempt to get leases executed by a drunken man: and said, that any act which Butler did in his present drunken state would certainly be set aside: that Gregg then went away, and Michael Dannaher then filled up the counterpart of the lease: and deponent saith, that two men had come into the room, one a tenant of James Butler, namely, Bartholomew Scanlan, and the other of the name of Sheehan, a kinsman of James Butler: and Brady turned both said men out of the room, and caused James Butler to sit up in his bed, and Brady and Dannaher produced the leases to James Butler, who then signed the leases in presence of this deponent and Michael Dannaher, who subscribed their names as witnesses thereto, deponent having become a witness thereto, not considering the leases as fairly and honestly executed, but at the desire of Mrs. Butler, in order to be enabled, at a future day, to state the manner in which they were executed and the [154] unfairness of the transaction: and deponent positively saith, that James Butler was, at the time of the execution of the said leases, which was about two o'clock in the day, intoricated and totally unfit and incapable of doing any solemn or serious act: and deponent saith, that in some short time afterwards Mrs. Butler came into town, and on hearing that her husband had executed the leases, she enquired what the rent was, and for what term: and deponent saith, that upon investigating the leases, deponent for the first time discovered that they had been filled up at the yearly rent of thirty pounds, instead of two hundred pounds, as deponent had supposed, according to the low proposal made by John Brady.

Jonathan Gregg in his deposition stated, "that Brady had consulted him on the subject of the renewal, and the differences between him, (Brady,) and Butler; that he, Brady, on account of Ringrose's claim, had been in treaty with Butler to obtain a lease of the lands to himself:—that Butler, in the presence of deponent, had insisted that all right to renewal had been forfeited by the neglect of the tenants:—that on a subsequent day, between twelve and one o'clock, deponent accompanied Brady at his request, and upon his allegation that Butler had agreed to execute the leases which Dannaher was preparing at a public house in the neighbourhood: that upon going to the house, he found Dannaher writing at a table, and James Butler seated on the side of the bed, with a table, a jug, and glasses near him: and that [155] upon addressing himself to James Butler, he found him so stupidly intoricated, that he could not give a collected or rational answer, whereupon he immediately remonstrated,—represented to Brady the invalidity of the lease proposed to be executed under such circumstances, and departed."

Several other witnesses deposed to the same facts, and the intoxication of Butler was denied only by Dannaher. There was also proof that John Brady, after having obtained the lease, called upon Mrs. Butler, and declared "that he never intended to make use of it:—that he had obtained it only to drive Ringrose to a compromise, and when that object was effected, he would give it up to be cancelled."

Depositions were also made to establish the allegation, that Walter Weldon Molony and Dr. Spellisy, his wife's father, had full notice before the settlement was executed, that the lease in question had been obtained by fraud, and that it was the intention of Mrs. Butler and the Appellant to question its validity.*

All the material deeds set forth in the pleadings were proved in the Court below, and in evidence before the House.

[156] For the Appellants, Mr. Fonblanque, Mr. Horne.—For the Respondents, Serjeant Copley, Mr. Wingfield.

After hearing arguments for the parties, the following order was pronounced (24th March, 1819): "It is ordered and adjudged, That the decree complained of in the Appeal be reversed: And it is hereby declared, That the indenture of lease of the 11th July, 1783, in the pleadings mentioned, from James Butler, deceased, father of the Appellant, to John Brady, deceased, in the pleadings mentioned, ought to be, and is hereby deemed to have been obtained by the said John Brady by fraud and imposition: and the same ought to be, and is hereby deemed void, and of no effect, so far as the said John Brady had any interest therein, after the agreement entered into by him with Philip Ringrose, in the pleadings mentioned, but without prejudice to the rights gained under such agreement by the said Philip Ringrose, claiming to be entitled to the benefit of the lease of the 5th July 1718, from Garret Gough to Joseph Ringrose, in the pleadings mentioned, and of the covenant for perpetual renewal therein contained, as the heir at law of Jacob Ringrose, deceased, son of the said Joseph Ringrose, and impeaching the will of the said Jacob Ringrose, under which the said John Brady claimed and had obtained possession of the lands com-

* According to the view of the case taken by the House of Lords, the question of notice became immaterial.

The judgment was moved by Lord Redesdale, with very few observations. The Order penned by the noble lord is so distinct, accurate, and comprehensive, that a report of the judicial observations would be superfluous.

prised in the said lease [157] of the 11th July, 1718; in as much as it does not appear that the said Philip Ringrose, under the particular circumstances of the case, might not, if he had established his right as heir in contravention of such will, have been entitled to have compelled a renewal by the said James Butler, deceased, in his favour of the said lease of the 5th of July, 1718; and especially as the execution of the said lease of the 11th July, 1783, from the said James Butler, deceased, to the said John Brady, compelled the said Philip Ringrose to assert such right against the said John Brady: And it is hereby further declared, that the Respondent, Daniel Mulvihill, surviving trustee in the marriage settlement of the 27th of December, 1794, in the pleadings mentioned, in trust for the purposes in the said settlement expressed, claiming under the said Philip Ringrose, is entitled as against the Appellant claiming under the said James Butler, deceased, to the benefit of the agreement entered into between the said Philip Ringrose and the said John Brady, so far as the same was for the benefit of the said Philip Ringrose: And it is further declared, that the said Respondent, Daniel Mulvihill, as such surviving trustee in the said marriage settlement, is entitled to have a lease of the lands comprised in the said lease of the 5th of July, 1718, in trust for the purposes in the said settlement expressed, subject to the terms of the agreement between the said Philip Ringrose and John Brady, save so far as such agreement was for the benefit of the said [158] John Brady: And it is hereby further declared, that the Appellant, as heir of the said James Butler, deceased, being charged with the effect of such agreement, for the benefit of the said Philip Ringrose, is entitled to the benefit which the said John Brady might claim under the said agreement, and the lease of the 4th of July 1793, from the said Philip Ringrose to him the said John Brady:—And it is further ordered and adjudged, that the said indenture of lease of the 11th of July, 1783, and the said lease of the 4th of July, 1793, be respectively delivered up and cancelled:—And the Appellant, under the circumstances aforesaid, waiving by his counsel his claim to dispute the right of the said Daniel Mulvihill, as such surviving trustee, as aforesaid, to the lands of Tenchire and Island Grady, comprised in the said leases of the 11th of July, 1783, and 4th of July, 1793, and submitting to execute to the said Daniel Mulvihill, as such surviving trustee as aforesaid, a lease of the whole of the said lands comprised in the said leases respectively, according to the terms of the agreement between the said Philip Ringrose and John Brady, save so far as such terms are varied by this judgment:—It is further ordered and adjudged, that the Appellant do execute to the said Daniel Mulvihill, as such surviving trustee as aforesaid, a lease of all the said lands, as if the same had been all comprised in and specially described by the said lease of the 5th of July, 1718, subject to the rents and covenants, and according to the covenant for perpetual renewal contained in the said lease of the 5th of July 1718; and that thereupon the said Daniel Mulvihill, as such surviving trustee as aforesaid, do execute a lease to the Appellant for three lives, renewable for ever, of all the said lands, reserving the same rent, and under the same covenants and agreements as are contained in the said lease of the 4th of July, 1793, from the said Philip Ringrose to the said John Brady: and that such leases respectively, be settled by one of the Masters of the said Court of Chancery, in case the parties shall differ about the same:—And it is further ordered and adjudged, that such of the Respondents who are or may be in possession of the lands in question, or any part or parts thereof, do forthwith deliver possession thereof to the Appellant:—And it is further ordered and adjudged, that the Appellant is intitled to an account of the rents and profits of the said lands, from the time of filing his bill, subject to the rent of £142 reserved by the said lease of the 4th of July, 1793, of which there ought to be paid to the Appellant the rent of £30 reserved by the said lease of the 5th of July, 1718:—And it is further ordered, that the said Court of Chancery do give directions for taking such accounts against the several persons who have been in possession of such lands since the filing of the Appellant's said bill, and do order the payment by such persons, or their representatives, of what shall appear to be due thereon:—And it is further ordered, that an account be [160] taken of all sums of money which may have accrued due to the Appellant for renewal-fines, according to the terms of the said lease of the 5th of July, 1718, since the date of the deed of the 3d of July 1793, whereby the said John Brady declared the said lease of the 11th of July, 1783, to have been taken for the benefit of the said Philip Ringrose: such account of renewal fines to be taken according to the ordinary course of the said Court of Chancery in taking accounts of such fines:—And it is further ordered and adjudged, that if any thing shall appear to be due to the Appellant on such account, the same be paid by the Respondent, Daniel Mulvihill, as such surviving trustee as aforesaid, to the Appellant, before the delivery to the said Daniel Mulvihill, as such surviving trustee as aforesaid, of the lease hereinbefore directed to be made to him by the Appellant:—And it is further ordered, that the Court of Chancery do give all necessary directions for carrying this order and judgment into execution; and particularly such directions as may be necessary on the return of the reports of the Master in Chancery, to whom any reference shall be made, in pursuance of this order; and do give such orders and directions touching any costs which may be incurred by any of the parties in carrying this order and judgment into execution as may be just.

 According to modern decisions, the father of the Appellant, and, a fortiori, the Appellant himself, upon the evidence [161] appearing in the depositions, if the same had been given in the trial at law, ought to have recovered a verdict.

In Cooke v. Clayworth, 18 Ves. p. 16, Sir W. Grant, M.R. said, he apprehended that a deed obtained from a man in such extreme state of intoxication as to deprive him of his reason, would be invalid even at law; and by Cole v. Robins, which is cited in Buller's N. P. p. 172, it seems, that in an action upon a bond, the Defendant pleading non est factum, may give in evidence that he was made to sign the bond when he was so drunk that he did not know what he did. In Pitt v. Smith, 3 Campbell's Rep. p. 34, Lord Ellenborough appears to have laid down a similar doctrine with great latitude. For according to the Report, he says, "Intoxication" (without limiting the degree) "is good evidence, upon a plea of non est factum to a deed; or non concessit to a grant; and of non assumpsit to a promise."

This doctrine appears to be contrary to the law, as laid down in Co. Litt. 247 a, who says, "As to a person who, by his own vicious act, depriveth himself of his memory and understanding, as he that is drunken,—that kind of non compos mentis shall give no privilege or benefit to him or his heirs." And again, "As for a drunkard who is voluntarius daemon, he hath no privilege thereby," etc. The doctrine seems to be also contrary to the principle upon which it has been held that a man who is non compos shall not disable himself. The opinions have been various upon that subject:—But Littleton, in sect. 105, and Sir Ed. Coke, citing the passage, and Beverly's case, are of opinion, that a man non compos cannot avoid his own act by entry, plea, or writ. And with that opinion accords the case of Stroud v. Marshal, Cro. Eliz. 398.

As to relief in equity against a deed or agreement obtained from a man when drunk, it is laid down, that the having been in drink is no reason for granting relief; for this were to encourage drunkenness. But if, through the management or contrivance of the party who obtains the deed, etc. the grantor, etc. was drawn in to drink, relief is administered upon the ground of fraud. See Johnson v. Medlicott, 3 P. W. 130, note A. See also Rich v. Sydenham, 1 Ch. Ca. p. 202; Cory v. Cory, 1 Ves. 19; Cooke v. Clayworth, supra, and Cragg v. Holme, there cited.

[162] The Scotch law makes an important and necessary distinction:—"Persons while in a state of absolute drunkenness, and consequently deprived of the exercise of reason, cannot oblige themselves; but a lesser degree of drunkenness, which only darkens reason, has not the effect of annulling the contract." See Stair, July 29, 1672, 1d. Hatton. So Erskine in his Instit. p. 822, says, "An obligation granted by a person in a state of absolute and total drunkenness, is ineffectual, because the granter is incapable of consent."

The rule of the French law, in cases of contract, is similar. See Pothier Traite des Obligations, p. 1. c. 1. art. 1. "Il est evident que l'ivresse, lorsque elle va jusqu'au point de faire perdre l'usage de la raison, rend la personne qui est en cet etat, pendant qu'il dure, incapable de contracter, puisque elle le rend incapable de consentement." *

To satisfy this rule, the drunkenness must amount to a privation of reason; but in gambling contracts, the protection afforded by the French laws to drunkards is more ample.

* See the translation of Pothier on Contracts, by Evans.

For in such cases something far short of a privation of reason is sufficient to annul the contract. Pothier says, "Lorsque l'un des joueurs est dans un état d'ivresse, le contrat que renferme le jeu est nul, etc. Nous parlons d'une ivresse qui, sans rendre la personne absolument incapable due consentement, peut seulement rendre imparfait son consentement en l'empêchant de faire les réflexions qu'elle eût pu faire si elle eût été à jeun." Traité du Jeu, c. 1. sec. 1. art. 2.

So the law stood before the Revolution; and although the "Code Civil" forbids gaming, except upon martial or gymnastic exercises, and in general affords no remedy to the parties concerned, either to enforce the payment, or the recovery of money won or lost, yet the intoxication of loser at the time of playing, would form an exception, and the case would fall under the rule of the old law.

The Civil Law has no text upon this head. The only allusion to the subject, so far as I can discover, is in the Digest, lib. 49. tit. 16. s. 6. De Re Militari. "Per vinum aut lasciviam lapsis capitalis poena remittenda est, et militiae mutatio irroganda."

SCOTLAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

JOHN SHAW STEWART, and ROBERT STEWART.—Appellants: WILLIAM M'KNIGHT CRAWFORD.—Respondent. JOHN GEDDES, WILLIAM DONALDSON, HUGH CRAWFORD, HUMPHREY GRAHAM.—Appellants: JOHN SHAW STEWART, and ROBERT STEWART.—Respondents [11th Feb. 1819].

[This case is cited as Geddes v. Stewart, in 1 Bli. 287, note.*]

Where freehold estates are conveyed under circumstances which may create a suspicion that the grantee is under an obligation, legal or honorary, to vote in the election of representatives in parliament, as the grantor shall direct—if the grantee, in the Freeholders' Court, or in the Court of Session, offers to be examined upon interrogatories, the Court has power to administer such interrogatories ex officio. Whether such obligation is a valid ground to exclude the grantee from the roll of freeholders—or only to reject his vote—Quære.

An obligation, either legal or honorary, to vote as the grantor of the estate shall direct, accompanied by a correspondent obligation to re-convey the estate upon refusal to vote, according to the compact—is sufficient to invalidate the freehold and vote, and to warrant the exclusion of the claimant from the roll of freeholders. But mere political attachment, or feelings of gratitude on the one side, and expectations on the other, which do not amount to reciprocal or perfect obligation, are not disqualifications within the statute, 7 Geo. 2.

The words of the oath prescribed by that statute; "that any title, etc. is not created, in order to enable me to vote, etc." are to be coupled in construction with those which follow: "But that the same is a real estate in me for my own use and benefit," etc.

The penalty given to the party objecting to a vote by the [164] Scots Act, 1681, and 16 Geo. 2. cap. 11. is in the nature of damages; and therefore it seems that the party claiming the vote cannot object to a discovery on the ground that it may subject him to such penalty.

In the year 1815, the Earl of Eglinton, having taken measures to revive a number of dormant* freeholds upon his estate of Eaglesham, in the county of Renfrew, went through the necessary process to separate the property from the superiority, and to reduce the titles into such a form, that he might dispose of nine superiorities in life-rent, of value sufficient to give to each of the dispanees a vote for the county.* In pursuance of [165] this plan, Lord Eglinton, directly, or by the medium of his agents, entered into a treaty, and finally addressed proposals to the Respondent in the first, and the Appellants in the four last appeals: and also to Mr. Martin, his agent; Mr. Simpson, partner of Mr. Martin; Mr. Crichton, his factor; and a Mr. McKerrell; offering to sell and convey to each of them a life-rent superiority in the lands above-mentioned, sufficient to afford a freehold qualification, with a feu duty, payable by [166] him as vassal to each life-renter. The dispanee was to pay a price for his grant, in proportion to the feu duty receivable by him during his life, the value to be ascertained by reference to some of the common tables for calculating annuities.

* These freeholds are said to be dormant, because, the superiority and the property being in the same person, the right of voting in respect of the superiority is suspended, or the two rights of voting are merged in each other.

Before the conclusion of the treaties upon this first proposal, it having been suggested to Lord Eglinton, by one of the intended purchasers, that an objection to the votes might arise, if the price given was a mere equivalent for the life-interest in the feu duty, that something ought to be added to the price for the freehold qualification; and that it would be expedient also, to prevent objections,† that the agents for the purchasers should prepare the respective dispositions in their favour; new proposals, framed upon these suggestions, were made to the several gentlemen selected as purchasers. These new terms were immediately accepted by all the intended vote-holders, and dispositions were accordingly completed, either upon making small

* By the Scotch Act, 17th Sept. 1681, the qualification of electors for counties is confined to those who are infeft in property or superiority, and in possession of a forty shilling land of old extent held of the king or prince, or where the old extent appears not, to those who shall be infeft in lands, liable to taxes, for four hundred pounds Scots, (£33 6s. 8d.) of valued rent.

Superiority is the seignior, as distinct from the usufruct of land. A superior who has not the beneficial property, is the mesne lord, between the king and the tenant. The rent service, or quit-rent, accruing to the superior, used to be a mere acknowledgment of right, and frequently not exacted. But in consequence of late decisions upon the head of nominal and fictitious, a new system has been adopted, by which the transaction assumes the shape of a real bargain of sale and purchase. (See Bell on Election Law, p. 303.)

The old extent is a valuation of the lands in Scotland, supposed to have been made in the reign of Alexander the Third, in order to ascertain the proportion which the different proprietors were to pay, of a subsidy raised for his daughter's tocher, or portion, upon her marriage with Eric, King of Norway. Lands which were computed at 40s. in this old valuation, entitle the holder in life-rent superiority to be put on the roll of freeholders, whether they amount to £400 valued rent, or not. But as by the statute of the 16th of Geo. 2. cap. 11. sect. 8. no other evidence of old extent can be admitted, but a retour of the land prior to the 16th Sept. 1681, the most general and easiest method of making out a qualification, is by what is called, the valued rent. A retour is an inquisitio post mortem, or verdict of a jury, who are summoned to inquire into the title of a claimant to succeed as heir to the estate of his ancestor.

The valued rent is a valuation of the lands in the different counties in Scotland, made in the time of the Commonwealth, and adopted after the Restoration.

An estate for life, in a superiority, of the value specified in the statute, entitles such superior to vote in the election of a representative for the Commons in Parliament. By dividing a large estate into such superiorities, and granting them for life, as many votes may be created as the number of forty shilling lands, or the amount of the valued rent of the whole, will bear. But this may be limited by the objections of the tenant, upon whom the lord is not at liberty to put a new superior without his assent. The practice of splitting superiorities to create votes has become so common in Scotland, that, in most counties, two or three proprietors (generally Peers) are, in effect, the electors of the representatives in the House of Commons. (See Wight and Bell on Elections, and Ersk. Inst.)

additions to the price of each freehold, or by small reductions in the feu duty : so as to add or leave a consideration for the freehold, conferring the right to vote upon these titles.

At the Michaelmas head court, in 1816, claims of enrolment were presented on behalf of the several disponees, claiming right to vote under the life-rent qualifications. The enrolments were opposed on behalf of the freeholders, by the Respondents in the four last appeals, and objections were lodged in their names, as members of the court of freeholders ; upon the ground, that the freeholds were held upon terms of confidence, nominality, and dependence. These objections, having been considered by the court of freeholders, were sustained, and all the claims were rejected as inadmissible ; although the Claimants, who were present, offered to submit to examination, upon oath, as to the nature of their estates, and the terms on which they held them. The matter was then brought before the Court of Session, by petitions and complaints, at the instance of each of the claimants, appealing against the judgments of the freeholders, affirming their independence in the transaction, and their ignorance of any unlawful views, by which Lord Eglinton might have been actuated. These allegations they offered to establish by their declarations on oath (see the Note ||, p. 178) if the Court would direct interrogatories to be administered to them upon the subject.

In the mean time, those who objected to the votes, presented a petition to the Court, craving a diligence for the recovery of writings relating to the transaction between the Earl of Eglinton and the petitioning tenants of his freeholds. By an interlocutor, dated Feb. 1, 1817, the Court granted to the objectors a power to recover all letters regarding the freeholds, which might have passed previous to the dates of the several dispositions between Lord Eglinton and his agent, on the one hand, and the proposed freeholders and their agents on the other. By virtue of this diligence, the corresponding evidence was obtained, which comprises the substance, and forms the evidence of the case.* Upon the production of this correspondence, replies and duplies were ordered by the Court, and given in by the respective parties. Whereupon the Court having formed an opinion, that the confidential nature of the freeholds had been established by evidence, ordered all the petitions and complaints to be dismissed, finding that the titles of the Complainants were nominal, confidential, and fictitious, and sustaining the objections to the claims of enrolment ; and further found the Complainers liable to the Respondents, in the penalty of £30 sterling, in terms of the statute.†

[169] Some of the parties, without reclamation or appeal, submitted to the judgments pronounced against them ; but the Respondent, Mr. McKnight Crawford, presented a petition, reclaiming against the interlocutor made in his case. This petition, complaining of the judgment, contained a request that he might be personally examined as to the facts of the transaction. In compliance with the order of Court,

* The correspondence, so far as it is made the subject of observation in the judgment, and enters into the reasons and grounds of the decision, is printed in the Appendix subjoined to the case.

By that correspondence, and the judgment, the slight distinctions and varieties in the cases of the several Appellants in the last four, and the Respondent in the first appeal, will sufficiently appear. It has been thought most convenient, and best suited to a clear apprehension of the subject, to state in the text no more than a general outline, comprehending the substance of all the cases.

† The Scots statute of 1681, Sept. 17, No. 21, which prescribes the mode of making up the roll of freeholders for the election of commissioners for shires, and the form in taking objections, and the process for obtaining a final decision upon such objections, provides that, "If the persons objected against shall appear at the parliament, or convention, and instruct the right to vote, the objector shall pay their expenses, and be farther fined in 500 marks ; and if the objection be sustained in parliament, the objectors appearing shall have their expenses, and the party objected against shall be fined in 500 marks."

This statute is explained and amended by the 16th Geo. 2, cap. 11, which gives a penalty of £30 against a claimant rejected by the freeholders, and appealing to the Court of Session.

the Appellants in the first appeal gave an answer to this petition, declining to refer any thing to the oath of the Respondent, and insisting that the Court had no power to order the examination requested. On advising the petition and answers, the Court, on the 14th of Nov. 1817, pronounced an interlocutor, directing that a condescendence should be given in, containing such interrogatories to be answered by the petitioner, as the objectors might judge material, to ascertain how far the petitioner's qualification was nominal, fictitious, and confidential, or defeasible.

In pursuance of this order, a condescendence was given in, containing general interrogatories,* to be administered to the Respondent. The objectors, Appellants in the first appeal, at the same time protesting by a minute, that the interrogatories did not originate at their instance, and submitting that Mr. McKnight Crawford should be interrogated, if at all, by judicial examination, either in the presence of the Court, or before a commissioner, and not by answers deliberately prepared, and returned in a written form. It was, however, decided that the answers should be in writing; and they were so made accordingly.* [170] Upon advising these answers, the Appellants in the first appeal having craved, that certain incidental questions, suggested by the answers, should be put to and answered, visâ voce, by Mr. McKnight Crawford; an interlocutor was pronounced on the 5th of Feb. 1818, whereby the Appellants in the first appeal were directed to lodge a minute, containing the additional interrogatories, which they proposed to administer to Mr. McKnight Crawford. A minute, containing a few additional interrogatories, was lodged accordingly, and answers in writing were put in by the Respondent, Mr. McKnight Crawford.

The whole cause, between the parties in the first appeal, came on to be finally heard on the 12th of Feb. 1818; when the Court, having considered the petition, answers, additional interrogatories, and answers to both, altered the interlocutor reclaimed against, and found that the petitioner, in virtue of titles produced before the freeholders, was entitled to be enrolled in the roll of electors, and that the objections to his title were not relevant. Therefore they granted warrant to, and ordained, the Sheriff-clerk of the county of Renfrew, to add his name to the roll. The Appellants in the first appeal, on the 14th of March, 1818, presented a petition, reclaiming against the judgment, but the petition was refused, without answers, by an interlocutor pronounced on the 7th of March, 1818.

In the last four cases,† the Appellants also re-[171]-claimed against the judgments, but they were finally confirmed by the Court of Session. Against these several decisions of the Court below, the parties respectively appealed to the House of Lords.

The Attorney General, Mr. Charles Warren, Mr. Brougham, Mr. W. Adam, and Mr. Robert Grant, appeared and argued on different sides for the respective parties.‡

The principal questions argued were as follows:

1st. Whether there was any agreement, understanding, or honorary engagement between the Earl of Eglinton and the several grantees, that they should vote under

* See the interrogatories and answers in subjoined Appendix.

† The facts of the case as they relate to the appeals, with slight differences appearing in the subjoined correspondence, are very nearly similar. The only varieties material to be noticed are, that as to the letter which is called the first circular from Lord Eglinton, there was no proof that it was directly communicated to Mr. McKnight Crawford; that the purchase of his vote was transacted through the medium of Mr. Hugh Crawford, in the manner which will appear by the letters passing between the parties; and that Dr. Donaldson was the family physician of Lord Eglinton; a circumstance which formed a subject of observation in the printed papers, and the arguments before the House of Lords.

Of the nine life-rent dispositions, which were the subject of litigation in the Freeholders' Court, and the Court of Session, five, being the cases above reported, were brought before the House of Lords by way of appeal; one was redispensed to Lord Eglinton; and upon the remaining three, judgments were given, finding them nominal and fictitious, and the parties did not appeal.

‡ The arguments occupied five days of hearing. They are not inserted on account of their length. The most material appear in the above abstract of the questions discussed; and in the opinion delivered by the Lord Chancellor.

his influence, and as he [172] directed; and whether such agreement, etc. could be inferred, from mere inadequacy of price.

2d, Whether it was sufficient to invalidate the vote, that such an agreement, etc. existed, unless it were rendered effectual by a concomitant agreement to re-convey the estate upon breach of the engagement as to voting, or unless the estate were in substance held in trust for the grantor, and whether such trust could be inferred from an honorary engagement to vote as the grantor should direct.*

3d, Supposing such understanding existed between the Earl and his agents, whether the proof of that fact, and the inferences to be drawn from their intercourse and correspondence with each other, or with any of the parties, could be evidence to affect the rights of other parties, and how far, and at what particular time, if at all, the grantees or any of them had adopted the agents of the Earl, as their agents in the transaction, so as to be affected by their acts and declarations.

4th, Whether the facts proved were sufficient ground to adjudge the votes nominal and fictitious; or whether the oath of verity (see the Note ||, p. 178), or interro-[173]-gatories respecting the purity of the transaction, ought to have been administered to the parties before the final decision of the Court of Session; and whether the Court had authority to direct such proceeding upon the requisition of the claimant, where it was opposed by the freeholders objecting to the votes.

5th, Whether interrogatories could be administered to a party, who, by the answers, might subject himself to penalties by the Scotch act, 1681, and the English act, 16 Geo. 2, cap. 11, sect. 4.†

6th, Whether the grant of the superiorities did not constitute sufficient freeholds to entitle the grantees to be put upon the roll,‡ although the [174] facts proved might have furnished valid objections to their votes.

In the course of the arguments, the following were the principal authorities cited and discussed.

Forbes v. M'Pherson.§ Fac. Coll. 6th March, 1789; D. P. 19th April, 1790; Luders on Elect. v. 3, p. 387.

* Whether the grantee in such case is bound to re-convey, was a question discussed in Forbes v. M'Pherson. Lord Thurlow inclined to the affirmative of that proposition. See the judgments in this case, and the opinion of Eldon, C., as to the equitable right of the grantor in a similar case, Curteis v. Perry, 6 Ves. Jun. 747, citing a case before Lord Kenyon, where a father had conveyed an estate to a son to qualify him to sit in parliament, and, the purpose having been answered, filed a bill to have a re-conveyance, the bill was dismissed with costs.

† These penalties relate only to proceedings before the superior Courts, and not to proceedings before the Court of Freeholders. Whether this objection is competent to any but the party examined—Query. By the Scots Act, 1681, if the objection of the freeholders, to put the claimant on the roll, shall, upon petition, be sustained in parliament, the objectors appearing shall have their expenses, and the party objected against shall be fined 500 marks.

By the stat. 16 Geo. 2, cap. 11, sect. 6, which gives to either party aggrieved a summary appeal to the Court of Session, if the judgment of the freeholders, refusing to admit, or striking any person from the roll, shall be affirmed by the Court of Session, the party complaining shall forfeit to the objector £30 sterling, with full costs of suit. As to the examination of parties upon oath, see Ersk. Inst. b. 4, tit. 2, sect. 8, 9, and the note, as to the exceptions in cases of prosecutions for penalties, and of interrogatories under the game laws, which are admitted, notwithstanding the liability of the party to penalties. See also the Note ||, p. 178, and further observations on this point.

‡ A freehold may be conveyed under such circumstances, that the party holding it would have no right to vote in the election of a Member of Parliament; yet he has many other duties and rights as a freeholder, for the purpose of performing and enjoying which, he ought to be put upon the general roll. The Stat. 1681, speaks of the election roll as a distinct instrument.

§ In Forbes v. M'Pherson, the oath of verity was tendered, and inquiry prayed, by the freeholders objecting to the votes.

Sir H. Moncrieff v. J. Campbell, 3-tius. W. S. 1813.†

* In this case, the Court of Session found that the estate was nominal and fictitious, upon proof of an understanding between the parties, that the freehold was to be used for the behoof of the grantor. At the next annual Court of Freeholders, the grantee produced a discharge from the grantor, of any obligation to re-dispense, express or implied; and he was then inrolled upon the same titles as before. But upon complaint to the Court of Session, it was ordered that his name should be struck out of the roll.

† This case is not reported. The following are the circumstances under which it was assimilated to the present, and quoted, on behalf of the freeholders, in support of the objections to the votes. Mr. Campbell (the defender) was agent for Mr. Graham, of Kinross. In 1806, he wrote to him as follows: "I think a seat in parliament would be desirable for you in many points of view, and therefore take the liberty of suggesting to you, that it may be proper to secure yourself against all risks by giving votes to some of your friends." The writer afterwards added, "My brother, George Brown, got a vote from Mr. George Graham, but the titles never were delivered, and he has not on that account taken it. Were you to confirm this conveyance, as he has been some years infeft, his vote would be immediately a good one. To secure yourself, you would require at least other five. Mr. Templar, I believe, would accept of one; and I once, I think, heard him express a wish to that effect. Dr. Henderson would be a safe one; and if no other occurred, William Brown, my brother-in-law, of the Lisbon house, now resident here, might answer, and would give a small purchase money to secure it from challenge. I have requested Mr. Templar to write to you on the subject; and on mature reflection, I think it a matter of such consequence to you, that I have extended a disposition by you to Messrs. Templar, George Brown, and myself, of five votes, which I enclose, that if you think right, you may sign it according to the instructions annexed to it."

Mr. Graham acceded to this proposal, and signed the disposition, after which Mr. Campbell again wrote to him as follows: "I wrote you in answer to the first, and prefix a copy of my letter, and have to acknowledge receipt of the dispositions and mandates, with which, I trust your friends will be able to secure you a seat in Parliament. You do not mention the names of these you mention to have enrolled. Should the attorneys approve, I would suggest the following: 1st, Mr. Templar's son; 2d, Mr. George Brown; 3d, Mr. William Brown; 4th, John Campbell. These superiorities being taken to support your interest, I reckon their value as follows: The average price of superiority over Scotland may be taken at £100 sterling for a vote; but Kinross is only represented every second parliament. The value may therefore be taken at one half, or £200. This is the value of a proprietor in the county, who wishes, besides having a vote, to connect his property with a freehold. To those who have no property, but who take it to support a friend, I would reckon £150 a fair price. This price I am very willing to pay, and I have no doubt that those whom I have mentioned will not stumble at it."

In the month of May, 1809, some other votes in Kinrossshire having sold much higher than Mr. Campbell had calculated, he wrote to Mr. Graham in the following terms: "Whilst on the subject of superiority, I think it proper to mention, that the value having gone far beyond my idea of it; and, of course, the calculation on which I proposed the price to be paid by your friends, who took the votes with the view of supporting your interest, turn out inapplicable, I consider myself bound to give up the vote, which on these principles I got to myself. The price of £150 sterling, which, with interest, was to be paid out of the money to be drawn from India, is quite under the mark, which, in proportion to the £375, should be at least £250. I beg leave, therefore, to re-dispense to yourself, or any friend you may wish." In answer to this letter, Mr. Graham, of this date, said: "In regard to your own qualifications, it is my wish that it should remain as originally arranged, with this exception, that in the event of your having a wish to relinquish it, I should have an option of taking it back on the same terms." To this letter, Mr. Campbell answered thus: "I delayed troubling you, in hopes of seeing you here; but as the time draws near for lodging claims of enrolment, I think it necessary to mention, that I do not consider such an understanding, as that mentioned in your last, at all safe. It would be considered as evidence of the vote being nominal and fictitious. Whatever votes you make, therefore, you must consider as real conveyances, and it is in that view I feel such delicacy in retaining the vote. When I stated the £150 as the price payable by your friends, I looked on £250 as the most a vote could go to; and I consider the value of £250 as not too much to make up for the loss of interest on the £150, whilst it should be held, as the holders could reap no benefit from the property. As the price however has gone so high, I do not see any plan that can be followed, but my giving it up, or advancing the price a little. I could not conveniently go above £200, but I am willing to give this sum, and thus make the vote a good one. There can be no agreement to any return, but from the connexion that would follow of course. I beg to mention from you, as to this. In course, I shall lodge the claims." Mr. Graham acquiesces in the proposition for valuing the vote at £200, and Mr. Campbell was enrolled as the freeholders, but the Court of Session ordered him to be expunged from the rolls with costs.

* This was a case of gratuitous grant, at an elusory feu dug's by an uncle to a nephew. The Court of Session, upon complaint of a freeholder, ordered the name of the claimant to be struck out of the roll. The House of Lords, on appeal, remitted the cause—that interrogatories might be put to the claimant. He, by his answers, having denied that any confidence or understanding existed between him and the grantor, his right to enrolment was confirmed.

† This case is not reported. The objection was, that the freehold having been taken in exchange for another freehold, in a different county—the mutual grantees being also candidates for the respective counties, at the ensuing election—was void, as nominal, fictitious, and confidential. But the Court of Session decided otherwise, and Lord Meadowbank observed: "It is a confidence which the law allows. It is a motive for the grant of the vote: but does not affect its legality or independence. They have a mutual confidence in and affection for each other. There is no nominality, nothing fictitious. We have only to consider whether the freehold is held in trust. I do not see a vestige of any thing of the kind. The fee is given away. It is given absolutely to a personal friend. And is a personal friend incapable of receiving a gift?"

‡ In this case, a freehold gratuitously granted by Lord Seaforth to Mr. Proby, who had been his secretary, was held not nominal and fictitious.

§ This was another case of a gratuitous grant by Lord Elphinstone, who was at that time Lord Lieutenant of the County, to his clerk of lieutenancy and quondam secretary. It was held valid.

¶ In the course of the argument, it was said, that answers to interrogatories should not be confounded with the oath of verity. But the distinction (if any)

[179] The arguments proceeded chiefly upon the foregoing authorities, and the construction and [180] operation of the Scotch Act, 1681, the 12 Anne, st. 1. c. 6. and the 7 Geo. 2. cap. 16.*

The Lord Chancellor.—The question in these cases relates to several interlocutors, seems to be little more than nominal. Answers to interrogatories are declarations upon oath, by a party either confessing or denying what is alleged or proposed, by questions put at the instance of the adverse party, or ex officio by the judge; as in the case of McKnight Crawford.

The law as to examination upon the oath of verity, so far as it regards the subject discussed on this point, is thus stated by Erskine, b. 4. tit. 2. sect. 8.

“Though one's right may be taken away by his own oath, when, upon a solemn appeal to God, he is forced to acknowledge that his claim is ill-founded, or cut off by a just exception: yet it is a self-evident proposition, that no man's right can, in the common case, be either proved by his own oath, or extinguished by that of his adversary; because these are no more than the averments of the parties themselves in their own favour. From this rule, however, there is an exception in the case of oaths, which are called oaths of verity, where the pursuer, confiding in the defender's veracity, or perhaps sensible that he can bring no other evidence, refers the point in controversy to his oath. For if the defender shall, upon such reference, swear that the pursuer's claim was either groundless from the beginning, or is now extinguished by payment, it is entirely cut off by such oath, though the strongest evidence should be afterwards brought, that his claim was good. In the same manner, the right of a pursuer may be proved by his own oath, affirming it to be good, when the defender refers the point in issue to it. An oath of verity has so strong an effect, not because it can work any conviction in the Judge from the nature of the evidence; for no single testimony upon oath, of the most unsuspected witness, can be received in evidence; but it depends entirely on the transaction that is supposed to intervene between the party referring, and him who deposes, by which they put the issue of the cause upon what shall be sworn,” etc.

Sect. 9. “Oaths of verity cannot be urged against a defender in any trial properly criminal, so as to compel him to depose against himself. Vid. infr. t. 4. sect. 94; but in trespass, you,” &c. the conclusion draws no deeper than the damage of the person wronged. In a civil action, where a fine, a defender may be compelled to swear; as in bloodwits before an inferior Judge: Durie, Feb. 13, 1634, (Tait against Darling, Dict. p. 736), in batteries, Fount. July 24, 1678, Gordon (Dict. p. 9397) cited in folio Dict. 1, p. 14; and in injuries verbal or real, Clerk Home 5, (Fiscal of Edinburgh, Jan. 1, 1736, Dict. p. 9400). The same was decided in a prosecution, brought by the procurator fiscal, on the Statute 1707, c. 13, ‘for preserving the game,’ where the prosecutor restricted his claim to one penalty of £20 Scots: Fac. Coll. June 27, 1787. Procurator Fiscal of Edinburghshire, Dict. p. 12412.

Sect. 14. “Oaths of verity, as they have been now explained, are oaths referred voluntarily by one party in a suit to his adversary; which therefore are finally decisive of the cause. But oaths of verity are sometimes put by the Judge ex officio, without reference by either party to the other; which, because they are necessary, and not grounded on any implied contract between the litigants, are not final; so that sentences proceeding on them may be declared void upon proper vouchers afterwards recovered; or the cause may be brought from the inferior Court to the Session, on this ground, that the Judge ought not to have ordained the party to swear, etc.”

* By the 7 and 8 W. 3. all conveyances, in order to divide the interest in any houses or lands among several persons, to enable them to vote at elections of members to serve in Parliament, are declared void.

By the 53 Geo. 3. cap. 19. it is declared, that devises by will shall be held conveyances within the meaning of the Act.

By the 45 Geo. 3. cap. 59. sect. 8. amending the Irish Act, 35 Geo. 3. cap. 29. it is enacted, that if any person shall fraudulently grant any interest, importing to be a freehold, which is not so, with intent to enable any person to vote, such grant shall be valid against the grantor,† for very purpose but enabling the grantee to vote.

† The word “and” seems here to be wanting in the clause.

which have been pronounced by the Court of Session, in the five several causes which have been heard at the bar: all of them involving a consideration of the same or similar points: whether the estates created by the Earl of Eglinton, according to the law of Scotland, are real or nominal and fictitious estates in the several persons to whom he sent, what is called, the circular letter; namely, one to Mr. Hugh Crawford, writer in Greenock; another not sent by himself, but communicated by [181] Hugh Crawford to William McKnight Crawford; another to Humphrey Graham, writer to the signet; another to Francis Martin, a writer at Paisley, who appears to have been a sort of agent to the others; and that communicated by him to a gentleman of the name of Alexander Simpson, his partner. There was likewise a letter sent to a gentleman of the name of Fulton McKerrell, who was a manufacturer at Paisley; and this circular letter appears, according to the statement I have in my hand, to have been communicated by him to his brother John McKerrell, likewise a manufacturer there. Fulton McKerrell gave up his freehold, as it is stated, in order to make way for William McKnight Crawford. The seventh person particularized, is Mr. John Geddes. There appears likewise to have been (though we have not heard much of that, except that in the papers before me there is an occasional reference to it) a communication to a gentleman of the name of James Crichton, a writer at Irvine. And the ninth, was Dr. William Donaldson, physician in Ayr.

As I understand the proceedings of the Court of Session, the first division of the Court of Session decided, in the first instance, that William McKnight Crawford's title was nominal and fictitious, but they seem afterwards to have thought it requisite, further to examine the grounds of that judgment: and accordingly, under the direction of the Court, the persons who objected to this vote administered to William McKnight Crawford, a great variety of interrogatories; and notwithstanding the inferences stated in the pa-[182]-pers, and the implications as to what must have been the intention and understanding of William McKnight Crawford, drawn from the nature of the correspondence which took place between the Earl of Eglinton and his agents, and particularly Mr. Hugh Crawford, it is material to observe, that William McKnight Crawford, when the Court directed him to be examined upon interrogatories, has entirely, or to a very great extent, destroyed all those inferences and implications. Why similar inferences and implications should not be equally answered by others, whose cases were not much, if any thing stronger than his, I do not perceive.

With respect to Mr. Francis Martin, who was a writer in Paisley, very much connected with Lord Eglinton, it appears from one of his letters, that he certainly meant to accept this vote, in order to support the political influence of Lord Eglinton. He has thought it right, I understand, to abandon his vote. In so doing, it must be considered, that he has acted from a sense of honour, and propriety: for, notwithstanding the terms of this letter, I doubt whether he could have been compelled to abandon his vote.

Mr. Simpson, his partner, became a purchaser of one of those estates, in consequence of a representation made by Mr. Martin, in a letter to Lord Eglinton. He appears to stand very much in the same circumstance as Mr. Martin, and I understand that Mr. Simpson has likewise abandoned his vote.

Mr. Fulton McKerrell made way for William [183] McKnight Crawford, whose vote has been sustained. Upon the correspondence of McKerrell, it is extremely difficult to say, that he was not bargaining for an independant vote; and from that circumstance, I should have inferred that the person standing in his place, William McKnight Crawford, was also bargaining for an independant vote. If we are permitted to infer from the acts of one man, to the intention of another, it may be difficult to answer the inferences which a suspicious mind would raise. From the acts of Hugh Crawford, who dealt for William McKnight Crawford, to a certain extent, he was his agent. But if it can be shown, upon this correspondence, that Fulton McKerrell was really bargaining for an independant vote, and where Lord Eglinton appears not indisposed to let him have such a vote, it is difficult to suppose that a change was made with respect to the person to stand in his place.

In the case of Mr. Geddes, the first division of the Court of Session having found that his titles were nominal and fictitious, he has complained of this interlocutor.

What has been done with Mr. Crichton, I do not know: as he was an agent of Lord Eglinton's, he has probably abandoned his claim.

Then there follows the case of Dr. William Donaldson, who is a physician of Ayr. With reference to whom they found likewise, without examination of the party, that his vote was nominal and fictitious: among other circumstances, upon this, that Dr. Donaldson is, as they say, the phy-[184]-sician of Lord Eglinton, and it has been contended in argument, that, being physician of Lord Eglinton, he could not purchase of his patient a substantial vote.

Appeals have also been made, by Mr. Hugh Crawford, who complains that his vote has been taken to be nominal and fictitious; by Mr. Graham, who complains that his vote has been taken to be nominal and fictitious; and by Dr. Donaldson, who makes the same complaint: that is, there are four persons who state that their estates are mere estates, affected by no obligation, either of a perfect or imperfect kind (I will state presently, why I use the term of an imperfect nature): and that they ought therefore to be put upon the roll, and be allowed to vote on elections. On the other hand, there is an appeal from the gentlemen who are the voters' objectors, with respect to the estate of William McKnight Crawford; and who say, that the Court of Session is quite mistaken in finding that his estate was not nominal and fictitious. They insist that his estate is nominal and fictitious, although interrogatories have been addressed to him, which would puzzle, I think, Mr. Crawford, as much as many we have seen in this part of the island.

It is not my intention to discuss at present the law of Scotland, as to what does or does not constitute nominality and fictitiousness, further than I find it determined in cases. I think we shall be able to collect from these cases, and what has been stated in Judgment in this House, what this House has taken to be (if I may use such an ex-[185]-pression) the common law of Scotland; by which I mean the law of Scotland as it has obtained, independantly of those statutes which have prescribed the rule to us, and likewise the effect of the law of Scotland with respect to those statutes which require an oath to be taken to guard against nominality and fictitiousness. I do not enter into the discussion, because the law of Scotland is very fully stated in the cases, and therefore it would be a useless waste of time.

It is not my intention to say one word upon the question, whether it is good policy, or whether it is likely to contribute to the purity of the constitution, that estates, not nominal and fictitious, but legal, should be reserved and created in the way in which it is acknowledged they may in Scotland. I accede to the notion of Lord Thurlow, who says (in Forbes v. McPherson): "He must be a bold man, who undertakes, on any abstract ideas, to new model the constitution of a country." We are not assembled here as a branch of the legislature, but as a Court of Session, to decide what the law is now, and not what it ought to be.

The Scotch statute, which passed on September 17th, 1681, regulates the election of commissioners for shires. According to the opinion of Lord Thurlow, supposing the subsequent statutes of Queen Anne and George the Second not to have passed, this objection of nominal and fictitious would have been just as good an objection, as it was after the acts of Queen Anne, and George the Second passed. This statute regu-[186]-lates the manner in which freeholders shall be allowed to vote. It was made to prevent delay in dispatch of public affairs in parliament, and convention of estates, occasioned by the controverted elections of commissioners for shires. It directs who shall vote in the election of commissioners; namely, those who shall be publicly infeft in property or superiority, and in possession. It provides for the making up of the roll, and at the time when the roll is to be made up, objections may be taken. The persons who, according to this statute, have a right of voting, are those who are publicly infeft, and in possession.

It then states, "that if the objections shall not be cleared, and acquiesced, they shall take instruments against the admitting to, or excluding any person from the roll, and that no other objection shall be held competent in parliament or convention, but what shall be contained in the instruments taken as aforesaid." (I observe here, there were other objections, besides those of nominality and fictitiousness taken in the Freeholders' Court, and again at the election, but all abandoned, except those of nominality and fictitiousness.) Then it is declared, that if the persons objected against shall appear at the parliament or convention, and instruct the right to vote, the objector shall pay their expenses, and be farther fined in 500 marks; and if the objection be sustained in parliament, the party objected against shall be fined in 500 marks. I have read thus much of the statute, which has no application to the question before us, except as it describes the nature of the property which the [187] voters are to have, for the purpose of taking notice of this penalty of 500 marks. Upon which it may be enough for me to say, that, whatever my opinion may be upon what is to be found in the text writers and the practice of the law of Scotland, there is a great difference between acting upon the oath of the party directed to be administered in such cases, and a penalty given in the nature of damages to the party objecting. It may be open to argument, whether, when a statute gives a penalty, in any shape, the construction of that statute is to be a loose or a strict construction. I state this remark the more strongly, because, in addition to the penalty of 500 marks, the party is required to take the oath prescribed by subsequent statutes: by which it is further provided that the party shall not only be subject to a penalty, but be indictable for perjury.

The statute of the 12th of Anne says this: "Whereas of late, several conveyances of estates have been made in trust, for redeemable elusory sums, no ways adequate to the true value of the lands, on purpose to create and multiply votes in elections of members to serve in parliament, for that part of Great Britain called Scotland; Be it enacted, that from and after the determination of this present parliament, no conveyance or right whatsoever, whereupon infeftment is not taken, and seizin registered, one year before the test of the writs for calling a new parliament, shall, upon objection made in that behalf, entitle the person or persons so infeft to vote, or to be elected at that election, in any [188] shire or stewartry, in that part of Great Britain called Scotland; and in case any election happen during the continuance of a parliament, no conveyance or right whatsoever, whereupon infeoffment is not taken one year before the date of a warrant for making out a new writ for such election, shall, upon objection made in that behalf, entitle the person or persons so infeft, to vote or be elected at that election." This part of the act seems to apply rather to occasionality than to nominality and fictitiousness."

The next part of the act is applied to this point. "And that from and after the said day, it shall or may be lawful to or for any of the electors present, suspecting any person or persons to have his or their estates in trust, and for the behalf of another, to require the preses of the meeting, to tender the following oath to any elector; and the said preses is hereby empowered and required to administer the same in the words following: I A. B. do, in the presence of God, declare and swear, that the lands and estate of —, for which I claim to give my vote in this election, are not conveyed to me in trust, or for the benefit of any other person whatsoever; and I do swear before God, that neither I nor any person to my knowledge, in my name, or by my allowance, hath given, or intends to give, any promise, obligation, bond, back bond, or other security, for re-disposing or re-conveying the said lands and estates, any manner of way whatsoever; and this is the truth, as I shall answer to God."

[189] This statute does not in terms, as I perceive, enact, that a person shall be guilty of perjury, and suffer the pains of perjury as the subsequent statute does; but perhaps, one might venture to go the length of saying, that, without an express enactment, the party might be considered as guilty of perjury.

The words of this oath deserve peculiar attention. It appears to me, from the language of Lord Thurlow, in the case of Sir John Macpherson, that he kept them in view, when he came to talk of what he called the honorary obligation. I was counsel in that case; and I have to this moment, a very lively recollection, that I considered this thing called honorary obligation, though very fit to be considered, was an extremely difficult thing, to be enforced by positive law. When Lord Thurlow speaks of honorary obligation, he uses an explanatory expression, which, in itself, suggests a good deal of difficulty to the trammelled mind of a lawyer, that you are to find, not merely that the voter has a motive operating upon his own mind, but you must be satisfied "that some sensation has passed out of the mind of the grantor into the mind of the grantee, and that the sensation has returned again, out of the mind of the grantee into the mind of the grantor;" so that there shall be an understanding between them, that the vote is to be used, as the author of the vote shall be pleased to direct. And Lord Thurlow seems to have been of opinion, that if a man was so circumstanced as to be under an honorary obligation, as to the use he was to make of the real [190] estate, he must consider himself under the same obligations of honour to re-dispense the estate.

The statute of the 7 Geo. 2. which is entitled, "An act passed for the better regulating the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, for that part of Great Britain called Scotland, and for incapacitating certain persons to be elected, or to sit or to vote in that House—" that act recites, "Whereas doubts may arise, whether the acts of parliament made in England, for preventing false and undue returns of members to serve in parliament, extend to that part of Great Britain called Scotland." Then there is a penalty given against a false return. Then it is enacted, "that every freeholder, who shall claim to vote at any election of a member to serve in parliament, for any lands or estate in any county or stewartry in Scotland, or who shall have right to vote in adjusting the rolls of freeholders, instead of the oath appointed to be taken by an act made in the 12th year of Queen Anne, shall, upon the request of any freeholder, formerly inrolled, before he proceed to vote in the choice of a member, or on adjusting the rolls, take and subscribe, upon a roll of parchment to be provided and kept by the sheriff, or steward clerk, for that purpose, the oath following, which the preses, or clerk to the meeting, is hereby empowered and required to administer, that is to say, I A. B. do, in the presence of God, declare and swear, that the lands and estate of —, for which I claim a right to vote in the election of a member to [191] serve in parliament, for this county or stewartry, is actually in my possession," (those words are not in the act of Queen Anne,) "and do really and truly belong to me," (those words are not in the act of Queen Anne,) "and is my own proper estate," (those words are not in the act of Queen Anne,) "and is not conveyed to me in trust, or for or on behalf of any other person whatsoever," (those words are in the act of Queen Anne;) "and that neither I nor any person to my knowledge, in my name, or on my account, or by my allowance, hath given, or intends to give, any promise, obligation, bond, back-bond, or other security whatsoever," (those words are in the act of Queen Anne). Then follow these words, which are not in the act of Queen Anne: "other than appears from the tenor and contents of the title upon which I now claim a right to vote, directly or indirectly, for re-disposing or re-conveying the said lands and estate in any manner of way whatsoever, or for making the rents or profits thereof, forthcoming to the use or benefit of the person from whom I have acquired the said estate, or any other person whatsoever." Then follow these words, upon which, if they had not received a judicial construction, and received that judicial construction over and over again, I think it would have been very open to argument what the meaning of them was: "And that my title to the said estates is not nominal or fictitious, created or reserved in me, in order to enable me to vote for a member to serve in parliament, but that [192] the same is a true and real estate in me for my own use and benefit, and for the use of no other person whatsoever; and that is the truth, as I shall answer to God."

If this had been res integra, I should have found it extremely difficult, in the case of any person claiming an estate under the circumstances now before us, to have advised that person to swear that his title to the lands was not created or reserved in him, in order to enable him to vote for a member to serve in parliament. But construction has put an end to all argument. It has been determined, that you are to take the whole of this sentence together, and that if the purpose be, as in this case I have no doubt it was the purpose of Lord Eglinton, to enable the party to vote in elections to parliament, yet the words following are to qualify those words, namely, "that the same is a true and real estate in me for my own use and benefit, and for the use of no other person whatsoever;" and that, although an estate should have been created or reserved, in order to enable a party to vote for a member for parliament, yet, if it was a real estate in him, vested in him for his own use and benefit, though the purpose was to enable him to vote for a member in parliament, yet, if he was under no obligation in point of honour to vote otherwise than his judgment would direct him to vote, the estate, nevertheless, was not to be considered as nominal and fictitious, but to be considered as a good estate.

Upon the authority of decided cases, these [193] principles are considered as now settled by the law of Scotland: namely, that if the estate is really an estate vested in a person for his own use and benefit, if it be an estate of a quality to give a vote for a member to serve in parliament, the extent of it is of no consequence; and if bona fide given without consideration, the fact of its being so given is no objection to the vote. I have found no case in which it has been decided that if the sensation in the mind of the grantor does not pass to the mind of the grantee and the sensation in the mind of the grantee does not pass back again to the mind of the grantor—if there is not an understanding created between them, that the man shall vote as the grantor of the estate shall direct him to vote, that it will not be a good vote. It has been held, and Lord Thurlow himself has stated, that he cannot meddle with estates when the persons voting in respect of them, vote from gratitude, or common obligation, but that there must be a sort of paramount and perfect obligation disappointing the law, as he expresses it: an understanding, that the man who made the vote made it for the purpose of making the grantee his creature, and that the man who took the vote understood that he so took, and was under, if we may so call it (I cannot easily define it), an honorary obligation, that he would in truth become the creature of the man who meant to give him the estate, for the express purpose of his voting as he the grantor pleased. I should apprehend, that Lord Thurlow must have conceived (as it appears from the tenor of his judgment in [194] the case of Sir John Macpherson) that this did not depend upon the oath, but was in the nature of the parliamentary law of Scotland. It would, indeed, be very difficult to apply to an honorary obligation the words which are contained in the statute: "In case any person shall presume wilfully and falsely to swear and subscribe the said oath, and shall be thereof lawfully convicted, he shall incur the pains and penalty of perjury, and be prosecuted for the same, according to the law and form in use in Scotland."

In a Civil Court, much might be effected, according to that case of Sir John Macpherson. Where an oath is administered to the parties, the grantee may declare upon his oath, that he was not bound, that he would not have taken the estate, if there had been any suspicion that he was bound in honour: that the grantor may also declare that there was no such understanding on his part: that in creating votes for members of parliament, he would much rather give those votes to his political friends, and to men of his own turn of thinking, under the notion that, morally speaking, they were much more likely to support his own notions of the constitution of the country, than other persons who differed from him. But, on the other hand, if both parties were to pledge themselves by their oaths, that whatever were the language, or the appearances, neither the one nor the other had any such intention; that no such understanding or obligation existed: it would be a very bold measure, to say, on the general words of this oath, that the parties must be convicted of [195] wilful perjury. It must, therefore, I apprehend, have been the idea of Lord Thurlow and this House, in the case of Sir John Macpherson, when they resorted to the term "honorary obligation," that it was not the thing prohibited by this oath, but that kind of understanding, which it is very difficult to prove exists, but which, when proved to exist, this House has undoubtedly determined, would vitiate the vote, upon the ground that it was not a real, but a fictitious estate: that the grantee was bound in honour to make no use of it: and he is equally bound in honour to re-dispose it, lest he should make use of it. In other words, to make the honorary obligation equal to the effect of the oath, where the honorary obligation existed, inducing the consequence in law that the estate was not a real estate, and inducing a further consequence in law, if the estate could not be used: namely, the obligation to re-dispose it.

In Forbes v. Macpherson, it is material to consider what this House must be taken upon the record to have decided. For the Judges of the Court of Session have, in all the cases now before us, except the case of Macknight v. Crawford, refused to direct an examination, which this House required in Forbes v. Macpherson: yet the Judges of the Court of Session suppose they have been acting upon the authority of this House in the case of Macpherson.

I have stated what appear to me to be principles established, and they may be taken so [196] to be. Yet there is no denying, on the other hand, that if a doubt fairly arises, whether the vote is nominal and fictitious, or not, you will look at all the circumstances; you will inquire whether the man has the possession; you will look at the want of consideration; and in every case of that kind, there may be a number of circumstances creating suspicion, which would, on sound principles, mature a suspicion into judgment, that the estate was nominal and fictitious. But then I see Lord Thurlow, when he was venturing upon this extremely delicate and difficult ground, this thing called honorary obligation, states himself thus, "It must be upon the general state of the transaction, that the Court may collect, that the estate, instead of being intended to be used or disposed of by the grantee, was intended between them, to be at the use and disposition of the grantor, and whenever a case affords circumstances sufficient, fairly and roundly to raise that presumption in an unanswerable degree, or to raise it in a degree which the party himself cannot answer," (that is, cannot answer by his oath) "in such a case as that, the vote must be held to be void." Then, Lord Thurlow here requires that the circumstances should fairly and roundly raise that presumption, in an unanswerable degree. I observe here, that the Judges of the Court of Session were at first of opinion, that in the case of M'Knight Crawford, the presumption was raised in an unanswerable degree; but when they have put the [197] party to answer, he has answered in a clear and unequivocal way, and they have reversed their judgment.

Taking the whole of what Lord Thurlow says together, he does not mean to say, that he would not raise the presumption, merely because the party answers it. His expression is, if the presumption is raised in a degree which the party himself cannot satisfactorily answer. He appears to be of opinion, (and I think the case imports as much,) that although the party has been examined on interrogatories, yet, if the case required you to disbelieve the party, (it is another question, whether you believe him or not,) you might disbelieve him, provided the circumstances had fairly and roundly raised such a presumption, that his answer to it could not get the better of that presumption, and could not repel it, and drive it out of the judicial mind of the court.

This being the way in which the matter was treated in the case of Forbes v. Macpherson, it is hardly necessary to state the former case of Elphinstone v. Todd. Lord Thurlow's judgment in which is set forth in the printed cases.* In the later case, I think I shall be able to determine what must have been the meaning of the House. As the case is stated, it is said, "It is believed no country can afford a more remarkable instance, than the county of Aberdeen, where, by parcelling out the superiority of lands contained in one charter, a noble Duke has at-[198]-tempted to add to the roll of freeholders, one wadsetter, and twenty-four life-renters;" (that is, five-and-twenty. Upon that I would observe, there is no doubt in the world that the contemporaneous creation of votes, and the number of votes contemporaneously created, are circumstances of evidence to be attended to. In the present case we have nine, in the case of the Duke of Gordon there were twenty-five:) "In consequence of an equal number of dispositions and assignments, all dated in one day, the 26th of Sept. 1786, and of as many instruments of seisin, all dated in like manner, the 27th, and registered the 29th of the same month," (there is, indeed, a similarity in the cases, in respect of the dates of the instruments.) "The whole of these pretended titles were made by the order, and at the expence, of the Duke of Gordon."

But in this case, Lord Eglinton is not so liberal, and he has found more disinterested adherents. For they have given large considerations for their purchases, and it is not alleged in the case that they have not substantially parted with the money. If it were fit for judicial minds to entertain suspicion, there might be ground for a surmise that the money which passed, was like a sensation that it passed from the hands of the grantee to the hands of the grantor, and back again from the hands of the grantor to the hands of the grantee. But allegations of such a nature cannot be entertained without proof, nor can it be presumed, in the absence of proof, that this gentleman, the physician, and several others, who had [199] no more connexion with the Earl of Eglinton than the most indifferent persons or mere strangers, have thought proper, in order to become his creatures, and to vote as he pleased, each of them to put into his pocket a hundred pounds, or thereabouts.

* See the judgment in Loders, Election Cases, vol. iii. p. 371.

There is no contract to redispense that money, a circumstance which becomes extremely material.

If a proposition were made to give me an indifferent vote, provided I would send the proposer a certain sum of money, and in a country where it is expressly admitted, that if it be absolute gift, without a money consideration, it is a good vote; can it be requisite, that I, as a purchaser, should reject an independent vote, because it is offered at a low price? Must I insist on paying a larger price than the owner demands for his vote? It is possible I may be taking from him, as matter of sale, that which is intended as matter of gratuity; but surely it is contrary to the settled rule of legal presumption, to hold that, because the surrender is made in that shape, therefore, it must be a case ubi aliud agitur, aliud simulato concipitur. Those who make the allegation, must prove it; they cannot shut out the evidence, whether the fact be of the one nature or of the other. In the case of the Duke of Gordon, the whole affair was transacted at his own expence. He had not the least consideration for any of the estates conveyed, some of the alienees being asked previously, whether they would accept of a qualification. The deeds, when engrossed at Edinburgh, were blank, in the names of the grantees, and remained so till sealed at Gordon Castle.

[200] After this, a very remarkable circumstance happened. It suited the purpose of the Duke of Gordon, to tender these votes when at the Freeholders' Court in Aberdeen; but it suited likewise the ideas of the agent of the Duke of Gordon, without any communication with any one of these voters, whose claims had been improperly put upon the roll, (as it was said,) to withdraw the whole five-and-twenty of them; and then in the subsequent year, without any authority from any of these claimants, except two, they were brought forward again; and being brought forward, the freeholders stated, that the qualification upon which Sir John Macpherson, (who was one of them,) claimed to be enrolled as a freeholder of the county, was nominal and fictitious, and created for the sole purpose of enabling him to vote, and that in fraud of the statute of 7 Geo. 2. The majority of freeholders, however, thought proper to admit him to the roll.

In consequence of this, there was an application under the authority of the statutes, summarily to the Court of Session, and various questions were proposed to be put, in order to prove that these votes were nominal and fictitious. The questions, each and every of them, I understand to have been sanctioned as questions which might be put by the Court; because the Judgment of this House was, that Sir John Macpherson should confess or deny the averments in the pleadings mentioned. The averments in the pleadings mentioned were, "First, that the conveyance of the lands, contained in the Respondent's titles, was made without his previous consent, [201] or knowledge, or at least, that the Respondent was solicited by the noble Duke, from whom he derived his right, to accept of a freehold qualification. Secondly, that the expence of making out the title deeds was paid by his Grace;" (and I need not here state, that matters, which are alleged, and not denied, are in Scotch pleadings taken as confessed.) "Thirdly, that these title deeds were not delivered to the Respondent before his enrolment, or at any time in his possession previous thereto. Fourthly, that when he was informed of the conveyance, or was prevailed upon to accept it, he did not mean or think himself called upon to defray the expence of defending his title in the Court, or elsewhere. Fifthly, that he did, when he accepted the said conveyance, and still does, consider himself as in honour bound to vote for the candidate who may be patronized by the noble Duke, and to renounce his freehold qualification at his Grace's pleasure." To be sure, if a man was bound in honour to vote for the candidate of the Duke, and felt that obligation in honour, he could not say that he was not bound in honour (to use a Scotch phrase) to denude himself of the estate, when called upon, in case his views differed from those of his patron.

What did Sir John Macpherson say to these averments? (Lord Thurlow anticipated that Sir John Macpherson could not support his case by the oath required.) Sir John Macpherson stated in his pleadings, "That the estate he had acquired from the noble Duke yielded 16s. 8d. a year, and that he had purchased it at a fair [202] and adequate price," not saying what it was, and "that it was for the express and special purpose of enabling him to vote for a member of parliament." Now, although he admitted it was for the purpose of enabling him to vote for a member of parliament, yet, if it was a real estate, the decision of this House would not interfere with it solely on that ground. That was his object. Had it not given him that right, he probably would never have acquired it; and were that right taken away, he would care very little what became of the superiority. He nevertheless maintained, and that he might maintain with good effect, "that a life-rent superiority afforded a good freehold qualification; and that his titles were not nominal or fictitious, because he was possessed of every thing they contained." But the law of Scotland, as declared by the authority of this House is, that the conveyances are to be not only clear, but sincere.

The Lords of Session found that it was incompetent to put the question to the Respondent, proposed by the complainers; but they did not stop here, for they repelled the objection of nominal and fictitious to the Respondent's qualification, and therefore dismissed the complaint, assolized the Respondent, and decerned.

In that case, the appeal to this House was on two grounds. First, it was said that the Court ought to have put those questions; but, secondly, that if the Court did not put those questions, the circumstances of the case were sufficient to shew that those estates were nominal and fictitious. Upon the decision in this House, though [203] Lord Thurlow stated that honorary obligation would destroy the right, he nevertheless, in the conclusion of what he states, beseeches the House not to come to a hasty conclusion of the matter; that he would wish to know every thing which could be known upon the subject; and instead of deciding on the circumstances of the case as they appeared in the transactions between the Duke of Gordon and those voters, he sent the case back again to examine the parties; and it turned out that he had prophesied very truly. For Sir John Macpherson would not take the oath proposed to be administered, and he refusing to take that oath, his estate was held to be nominal and fictitious. If he had taken the oath, (as I understand Lord Thurlow,) it would then have been reserved for the Court to have considered the effect of his oath; but his silence was deemed a confession, and he was therefore struck off the roll.

The question, then, I apprehend to be, whether the case of Macpherson is to be taken as an authority for what the Judges of the Court of Session have done in the present cases. It is not my intention to go through all the circumstances of the present cases, and to consider the effect of Lord Eglinton's proposal to create nine voters; his proposing for one Mr. Martin, his agent; and another, Mr. Simpson, the partner of that agent; and for a third, Mr. Crichton, his agent, at Irvine. There is not, in the case of Mr. Martin, evidence that would satisfy me, that his was not a real estate, provided he would deny that which would [204] affect his estate; and looking at all the correspondence that passed with Hugh Crawford, the correspondence that passed with McKnight Crawford, through Hugh Crawford, and his whole correspondence; looking at the correspondence which passed with Geddes, and with McKerrell: looking at the correspondence which passed with Dr. Donaldson the physician: looking at that correspondence which I must look at, if I can consider it as evidence at all, with infinite caution, I mean the correspondence with Mr. Martin, and through him, Mr. Simpson, and the communication to Mr. Crichton—the agents having possibly very different purposes from those of the Earl, who proposed to sell; looking at the voluntary increase of price, (which I confess I do not wonder at, in these writers of the signet, and if I were purchasing an independent vote, I had rather have given more for it, than any of those persons had given. You might call that my motive to meet a popular prejudice, or my motive to meet the judicial inferences that would be raised in the House of Lords, as to the motive of the conveyance, because I had not given enough for it;) yet if the parties sincerely believed that the Earl of Eglinton was offering independent votes, and purchased accordingly, they would not be destroyed by such circumstances. I do not pass over here, the fact that the votes were created out of dormant titles. That acts both ways. The Earl of Eglinton had dormant titles, and it is stated that he had formerly created votes, which he could not support. There is no evidence to the fact: but [205] taking it to be so; am I to suppose that the Earl of Eglinton, if examined as a witness, would state, that instead of that which he professed to be his purpose; namely, the making independent votes, he had no such purpose; that it was all simulation—am I to suppose, that in a case in which his Lordship acted with the advice of such a man as Mr. Cranstoun, who appears to have been his adviser, aided by persons of considerable professional skill, I mean the writers here spoken of, Mr. Russell, Mr. Anderson, and Mr. Martin, that he who had been foiled in his purpose before, of creating fictitious votes, was really endeavouring, in contradiction to all that was stated by him, in contradiction to all that is stated by those who are dealing with him, and in contradiction to what they voluntarily undertake to swear, wishing to examine him as well as themselves—and I, notwithstanding all these circumstances, to understand, that in his second attempt, he was endeavouring to do the same nugatory thing, which he had formerly attempted, but failed to accomplish.

I do not go through every observation which may be made upon every part of this case, but I say again, that the case of Mr. McKnight Crawford teaches me to deal with infinite judicial jealousy, with the question how far I am to cut down an estate, which upon the title deeds is clear, and which the parties aver is sincere, as well as clear by inferences and implications, from the acts of other persons. Inferences and implications were raised in the case of Mr. McKnight [206] Crawford, with almost, or quite as much force, as in the case of these Respondents. But all these inferences and implications were proved to be unfounded, even in the judgment of the Court of Session in Scotland.

We are here upon an infinitely delicate subject. I agree the objection is founded, if the estate can be shown from circumstances, from the refusal of the party to be examined upon interrogatories, or from his deficient answer to those interrogatories, to be an estate not given to him for his own use and benefit, to be used by him as he shall think proper. But I follow Lord Thurlow in opinion, that if the grantee shall, from the obligation of gratitude, act in the same interest as his friend the grantor, that is no objection. Where a father gives to his son a qualification; where an uncle gives to his nephew a qualification; where a brother gives to a brother a qualification; it is very difficult to suppose that the qualification is given by the father, uncle, or brother, without conceiving that, in the one instance, filial affection, and in the other instances, the affections resulting from those relationships, will induce the party to vote in the same interest, with his relative and patron. But authorities cited in argument prove that there must be something further: that you must make out that there is this understanding between the parties. How far that rule is to be carried, is a consideration which led me to submit to this House, in the case of Fleming v. Drummond,* the [207] propriety of remitting the case to the Court of Session; and I expressed a very strong wish, that, if they sustained their first opinion, they would do that which they have often done most usefully to the King's subjects, embody, in their decision, the reasons for that decision.

It is my purpose to propose that this case should be remitted, very much in the terms in which that case of Fleming v. Drummond, was remitted. If the Court of Session shall be of opinion, after the examination, that they cannot come to the same conclusion as in the case of McKnight Crawford, I again respectfully express to them my wish, that they would embody in their interlocutor the reason upon which they proceed. The authority of this Court, as established in Macpherson's case, must not be shaken. To the extent of that case, the law is settled: but the doctrine, if pressed beyond that authority, may be attended with grievous consequence. Suppose I have a whole fee which I could contrive to vest in the noble Lord who sits near me, and he might create out of that a dozen votes; if I should happen to say, I know your political principles: we have gone through life's journey together, acting very much in the same way with respect to what we conceived to be the public interest, and I had rather you should have that estate for £5000 than some men, whose private character I revere, and whose conduct I estimate very highly, for double the money: will it be said, because I make a foolish pecuniary bargain, (if that is the real case,) and I am at liberty in this view to make the hypothesis—that my impro- [208] dence, caprice, or policy, is to destroy the estate thus created? and this may be diversified in a number of modes. Upon the whole, therefore, I cannot come to such a conclusion as Lord Thurlow contemplated, in the case of McPherson; namely, that these estates were intended, between the Earl of Eglinton and these grantees, to be at the use and disposition of the Earl of Eglinton; or that the case, as it now stands before me, affords circumstances sufficient fairly and roundly to raise that presumption in an unanswerable degree. I should have said exactly the same, if the case of McKnight Crawford had come here before it had been reviewed in the Court of Session, and before they had been convinced that their presumption was not raised in an unanswerable degree. Nor can I go to the length of saying, after what I have seen, in Fleming v. Drummond, and what I have seen in this case, that the circumstances do fairly and roundly raise a presumption in such a manner, that these parties cannot satisfactorily answer it. If I am right in saying the circumstances fall short of producing that degree of presumption, I conceive I have the authority of this House for saying, that they fall short of that ground, on which this House can be called upon to support the judgment, and that it is our duty to send it back again to the Court of Session, for revision, with liberty to examine the parties as in that case. If they shall be finally of opinion that these estates were nominal and fictitious, I again respectfully intimate my entreaty that they would state the grounds upon which they come to that finding.

With these observations, I purpose, after the [209] drawing out an order, something in the terms of that made in the former case of Fleming v. Drummond, to send this case back again to the Court of Session to be reviewed, and to examine the parties on interrogatories, in the four last appeals. But the final judgment in the case of Mr. McKnight Crawford must be affirmed.

In each of the four last appeals the following order was made:

"Die Joris, 11 Februarii, 1819.—Ordered and adjudged, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland to hear parties further thereupon with liberty to receive such new allegations as the occasion may require, and with liberty for the Appellant to confess or deny such averments as to the alleged nominality, as the Respondents, by interrogatories, according to the course of the Court, shall call upon him to confess or deny: And it is further ordered, that the Court do review the interlocutors appealed from, and determine, whether it is sufficiently established, that the freeholders of the County of Renfrew did right in refusing to admit the Appellant upon the roll, and also do determine, whether such fact shall be sufficiently established by what hath already been made to appear to the said Court, together with any such evidence or proof, as may be received or made, under such liberties as aforesaid."

APPENDIX.

No. I. First Letter sent by the Earl of Eglinton, to the Persons whom he had selected as the Holders of his Freeholds.

Eglinton Castle, 2d February, 1815.

Dear Sir: Being determined to bring forward and dispose of some dormant freeholds in the county of Renfrew, I must naturally apply to those gentlemen who I consider my friends, and whom I already consider myself under obligations to. The plan I propose, after mature consideration and consultation with the first counsel at the bar, is as follows:—

That I am to convey the superiority of my own property lands to afford a freehold qualification in life-rent, with a feu-duty payable by me to the life-renter of £5 sterling yearly. The price I receive will be the value of £5 sterling upon the life of the person to whom this conveyance is made, conform to the most approved tables of annuities.

Should it be more agreeable to you to have a larger sum of feu-duty paid, (although it can make no difference to the title, and therefore appears quite unnecessary,) be so good as inform me what extent you would wish it, and I will take it into consideration. To save you trouble I herewith enclose a table for calculating the value of these freeholds.

(Signed) EGLINTON.

This letter was sent to the following Claimants, or their agents, viz.

1. Hugh Crawford, writer in Greenock.

2. By Hugh Crawford to William McKnight Crawford of Cartsburn.

[211] 3. Humphrey Graham, W.S.

4. Francis Martin, writer, Paisley.

5. By him communicated to Alexander H. Simpson, his partner.

6. Fulton McKerrell, manufacturer, Paisley, and by him to his brother, John McKerrell, manufacturer there. John McKerrell is one of the Complainers; but Fulton McKerrell gave up his freehold, in order to make way for William McKnight Crawford.

7. John Geddes, of the Verreville glass works, Glasgow.

8. Communicated verbally to James Crichton, writer, Irvine, who, as his Lordship's agent at Irvine, corresponded with the other Complainers.

9. Communicated verbally to Dr. William Donaldson, physician in Ayr, as appears from a subsequent letter to him.

No. II. Second Circular, sent as above, and intitled on the back, "Lord Eglinton to the different purchasers of Renfrewshire freeholds, relative to the additional sum proposed by Mr. Russell, W.S."

Eglinton Castle, 20th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: I have received a letter from Mr. Russell, with respect to the superiorities in Renfrewshire, which I am disposing of. He observes, "that although the superiorities are meant to be disposed of for a price, without trust or confidence, yet it may be right, in order to meet the popular prejudice, not to confine the price to the precise value of the life interest in the feu-duty. But to add something to it, as for the freehold, such as from £20, or £30 to £50 on each freehold." He likewise recommends, that the purchasers' own agents prepare the dispositions in their favour, and complete their title by infeftment.

If either of these sums should be agreeable to you, to [212] add to what was mentioned formerly, a copy of the proper disposition will be sent by Mr. Martin, that you may give directions to your agents to extend it accordingly. I remain, dear Sir, your's faithfully,

(Signed) EGLINTON.

P.S. The same idea as mentioned by Mr. Russell had occurred to my friend, Mr. Humphrey Graham, W.S. who is a purchaser, and requested, that instead of paying the sum corresponding to his age in the table, which was £75, that it should be made £100.

Copies of the above wrote to the following gentlemen:—Colonel Geddes, Verreville, Glasgow; John McKerrell, Esq. Paisley; Hugh Crawford, writer, Greenock; Dr. Donaldson, Ayr.

LETTERS RELATING TO THE CASES OF MR. MCKNIGHT CRAWFORD AND MR. HUGH CRAWFORD.

No. III. Excerpt from Letter, Lord Eglinton to Hugh Crawford, Esquire, Writer in Greenock.

27th January, 1815.

After a long paragraph on a separate and private matter, his Lordship writes as to the freehold thus:—

I hope in a short time now to have my dormant freeholds in your county brought forward, and will be happy that you should have one of them. I believe you understand the footing on which they are to be sold,—for the life of the purchaser; and as to the sum to be paid, five pounds or fifty will make the freehold equally good. Will you have the goodness to write me on the subject? and hope you will have the goodness to purchase one of them. Few men will be more agreeable to me, being grateful for the friendly support I have received from you. I remain, etc.

[213] No. IV. Excerpt from Letter, Mr. H. Crawford to Lord Eglinton.

[Produced by Lord Eglinton.]

Greenock, January 1815.

My Lord: I feel very much honoured and obliged by your Lordship's polite information respecting the division of your Lordship's freeholds in this county, and I shall be most happy to become a purchaser of one of these life-rents, so soon as your Lordship shall have made the arrangements, and fixed a price. I have the honour to be, etc.

(Signed) HUGH CRAWFORD.

The Right Hon. Earl of Eglinton, etc.

No. V. Hugh Crawford, Esquire, to Lord Eglinton.

Greenock, 9th February, 1815.

My Lord: During my absence in Edinburgh, where I have been for a week, your Lordship's favour of the 2d arrived, containing the scheme upon which your Lordship is inclined to dispose of some freeholds in this country. I have attentively considered the scheme, and, in so far as I can judge, it has my hearty approbation. I beg leave, therefore, to mention that I shall readily become a life-rent purchaser from your Lordship of one of these freeholds. My age is between 52 and 54, so that I shall fall under the class of £56 7s., and the money will be paid whenever, and in any manner, your Lordship may be pleased to signify. My friend, Mr. Crawford of Cartsburn, is very desirous of purchasing £180 of valuation to join to his own extent, which is so much defective; but if that cannot be obtained, he will purchase a complete freehold, and upon the terms that your Lordship has pre-[214]-scribed. May I be permitted to recommend Mr. Crawford to your Lordship's notice? I again beg leave to offer your Lordship my most respectful acknowledgments, for the repeated kindnesses which your Lordship has shown to me; and remain,

(Signed) HUGH CRAWFORD.

To the Right Hon. the Earl of Eglinton, etc.

No. VI. Lord Eglinton to Hugh Crawford, Esq.

Eglinton Castle, 11th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th inst., and am glad that you are to become a purchaser of one of the freeholds.

It would have given me pleasure that I had it in my power to have accommodated your friend, Mr. Crawford of Cartsburn, by the valuation he wants, to make out a freehold, but I have it not. I will be happy, therefore, that he will purchase one of those on the terms I have been advised to propose; and, as you mention, that he will accept, I have wrote Mr. Martin to transmit his name to Mr. Russell, at Edinburgh, for that purpose, and I hope it is not yet too late. I shall be proud to have two such respectable purchasers as he and you. I have wrote Mr. Martin, therefore, in case the number is filled up, if possible to give a preference to Mr. Crawford, in the room of some other. Excuse this hurried note. I am, etc.

(Signed) EGLINTON.

Hugh Crawford, Esq. Writer, Greenock.

P.S. I will be most happy to be honoured with the acquaintance of Mr. Crawford, and if you will be so good as to endeavour to prevail upon him to pay me a visit, and show him the way here, it will give me very great pleasure.

[215] No. VII. Lord Eglinton to Mr. Martin.

(Private.)

February 11, 1815.

Sir: In a letter which I have just received from Mr. Crawford of Greenock, he mentions that Mr. Crawford of Cartsburn is willing to purchase one of my votes. He, therefore, privately, is much more agreeable to me than young Mr. Robertson, who I wrote you of, yesterday. I beg, therefore, his name may be forwarded to Mr. Russell, which completes the number, being eight. I have time to add no more, but remain, etc.

(Signed) EGLINTON.

No. VIII. Hugh Crawford to William McKnight Crawford.

Greenock, 13th February, 1815.

My Dear Friend: I lost no time, upon my return, in writing to the Peer of Eglinton, and last night's post brought me a letter from his Lordship, which I now beg to transcribe:—

[Here Lord Eglinton's letter to Hugh Crawford, of 11th February, 1815, already printed No. VI. is inserted.]

This, you will say, is civil enough, and I hope soon to advise you that there is yet one open for your honour.

I trust that, in the course of this season, you will be able to run down the length of the Castle, taking another castle in your way.—I am, etc. ever yours affectionately.

(Signed) HUGH CRAWFORD.

No. IX. Lord Eglinton to Hugh Crawford.

Eglinton Castle, 12th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: Since writing you, I had received a letter from Mr. Fulton McKerrell, accepting of the terms offered for the purchase [216] of one of the freeholds. He had made an application formerly upon the subject, but as I had not received an answer, I concluded that the terms were not agreeable to him. From his letter, however, I find that he has been from home, and as his application was prior, I am afraid he must be preferred. Perhaps, however, I may have an after one to offer to Mr. Crawford, which I will be happy to do. In the mean time, I hope that will not prevent me from having the pleasure of seeing you and him here, and to be honoured with his acquaintance. I remain, dear Sir, etc.

No. X. Mr. Hugh Crawford to Mr. McKnight Crawford.

Greenock, 14th February, 1815.

My Dear Sir: Since writing yesterday, I last night had another letter from the Earl of Eglinton, dated the 12th, of which the following is a copy:—

[Here Lord Eglinton's Letter of 12th February, No. IX. is inserted.]

I confess much disappointment at this last letter, as I really concluded that all was fixed. Before making any reply to these letters, I request to hear from you, and may I beg of you to do so on receipt, etc.

No. XI. Mr. McKnight Crawford to Hugh Crawford, Esq.

15th February, 1815.

My Dear Sir: I know no particular answer that can be given to the Peer's letter, but that I regret my application had not been [217] made sooner. If a sum of valuation to make up my title could be had at a reasonable expence (my own writings included), it would require only about £180 Scots. Thank the Earl in my name for his wishes to serve me.

(Signed) W. McKNIGHT CRAWFORD.

No. XII. H. Crawford, Esq. to Lord Eglinton.

Greenock, February 22, 1815.

My Lord: On my return last night from the interment of Mrs. Crichton, I found your Lordship's favour of the 20th. The suggestion of Mr. Russell, I presume, is very proper, and I have no objection whatever to make a corresponding advance in the same way as Mr. Graham has done.

My class is that falling under the purchase of £56 7s.; so that if Mr. Graham (whose class is £75) advances £25, mine will be in proportion. When convenient for your Lordship, you can direct Mr. Russell to correspond with my agent, Mr. Horne, W.S., who between them will do all matters properly. I regret very much that I had not the honour of paying my respects to your Lordship yesterday, as I returned home immediately after the interment. I have, etc.

No. XIII. The Earl of Eglinton to Hugh Crawford, Esq.

Eglinton Castle, 25th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: Mr. Martin is just now with me, and I find that I have still another freehold to dispose of in the county of Ren-[218]-frew, upon the estate of Eastwood, which I am glad to have it in my power to offer to your friend, Mr. Crawford. If he will have the goodness to accept, I beg you will write to Messrs. Russell, Anderson, and Tod, mentioning his Christian name and age, without delay, in the hope that his disposition may be made out, along with the others, which I have given positive directions to be immediately completed. I will be glad to hear from you. Excuse this hurried letter, and believe me to be, etc.

No. XIV. Hugh Crawford to Lord Eglinton.

Greenock, February 27, 1815.

My Lord: I am this morning honoured by your Lordship's letter of the 25th, and have by this post transmitted a copy of it to Mr. Crawford, with a request that he may, with the least possible delay, inform Messrs. Anderson, Russell, and Tod, of his resolution. His residence (Ratho) is within seven miles of Edinburgh, and I trust my letter will find Mr. Crawford at home, in which case he will to-morrow write to, or wait on these gentlemen, and I shall not fail to communicate his answer to your Lordship.

I again beg your Lordship to accept my grateful acknowledgments for these repeated marks of attention; and I remain, with the greatest respect, etc.

[219] No. XV. Hugh Crawford to Messrs J. and D. Hornes and Easton, W.S.

Greenock, 4th March, 1815.

Dear Sirs: I have purchased from the Earl of Eglinton one of his Lordship's life-rent freeholds in the county of Renfrew, and he has suggested that my agents should draw the conveyance, and for this purpose it will be necessary that a meeting be had with the Earl's men of business, Messrs. Anderson, Russell, and Tod, W.S.

Will you have the goodness immediately to see these gentlemen, and have all matters properly fixed. I am, etc.

No. XVI. Messrs. Hornes and Easton, W.S. to Hugh Crawford, Esquire, Writer, Greenock.

6th March, 1815.

Dear Sir: In consequence of your letter of the 1th received yesterday, we, to-day, waited on Messrs. Russell, Anderson, and Tod, the agents for the Earl of Eglinton, to receive the titles, and arrange respecting the conveyance of the freehold purchased by you from His Lordship; but we were told that the terms had not yet been agreed on between Mr. Martin of Paisley and you, and that nothing could be done here until that should take place. The only things we understood you had to fix were, the price and the fee-duty. When they heard of that being done, they were to let us know, and we shall of course lose no time in getting the conveyance prepared.

[220] No. XVII. Mr. Francis Martin, Writer, Paisley, to Hugh Crawford, Esq

7th March, 1815.

Dear Sir: I inclose you a draft of a life-rent disposition by Lord Eglinton to you.

There is a blank left for the price. You can fill it up with any sum from £50 upwards. The sum you insert regulates the feu-duty. You'll observe that twenty guineas is to be included for the value of the vote.

I request, after you have perused the draft and filled up the blank article, that you will send the deed to your agent, Mr. Horne, who will deliver it to Mr. Russell, W.S., that the description of the lands may be inserted; after which Mr. Horne will extend it, and then Mr. Russell will transmit the extended deed to be signed by his Lordship. I beg you'll get this done as expeditiously as possible. I am, etc.

Have you given orders for Cartsburn's disposition being extended as it stands, agreeable to the Earl's wish?

No. XXX. Hugh Crawford, Esq. to John Dillon, Esq.

Greenock, 14th March, 1814.

Dear Sir: Our friend Mr. M. Crawford having completed the purchase of a freehold (life-rent) in this county from the Earl [226] of Eglinton, his agent, Mr. Martin, of Paisley, is very solicitous that the business be immediately completed.

It falls to you, as Mr. Crawford's man of business, to draw the disposition, and Mr. Crawford having by this post written to you to that effect, he has desired me to state to you, under what class in the scheme of valuations of lives Mr. Crawford falls. His age, between 29 and 30, makes the value of his life £74 9s.; will you therefore immediately wait on Messrs. Russell and Anderson, (the agents for the Earl,) and peruse the draft of the disposition, which can be filled up with the above sum, and then get it extended, so as no time may be lost in obtaining the Earl's signature, and afterwards Mr. Martin expedes all the infeftments on the same day. I believe Mr. Anderson has Mr. C.'s name and designation; if not, you can give it, designing him younger of Crawfordsburn. I am, etc.

No. XXXI. Mr. M^K. Crawford to Lord Eglinton.

Cartsburn by Greenock, 4th March, 1815.

My Lord: Mr. Hugh Crawford has just informed me that your Lordship has still a freehold in this country to dispose of, and that you was willing to let me have it. I shall be very happy to become the purchaser; and I have directed Mr. Crawford to write to your Lordship's man of business on that subject. I regret very much that owing to the shortness of my stay in this part of the country it is out of my power to accept of your invitation of being at Eglinton; and in the mean time, etc.

[227] No. XXXII. Mr. Dillon to Mr. Hugh Crawford.

March 15, 1815.

Dear Sir: I have your letter of yesterday, and called upon Russell. Anderson, and Tod, when I saw the latter, who tells me he has the papers ready for signing by Lord Eglinton, which create a feu-right, previous to conveying the superiority; these, he said, he was to get signed to-day by Lord Eglinton, who is in town; after which they will be sent west for infeftment. The one for Mr. C. contains a feu-duty of £5 to be conveyed to him for his life, the value of which he desired me to calculate, which we have to pay, along with £21 for the vote. I mentioned to him your calculation of £74 9s. which I suppose is the value of £5 a year for the probable term of Mr. C.'s life. Please mention to me the number of years, and according to what table it is taken, that I may adjust the calculation to their mind. When the feu-right is completed by infeftment, I will get from them the materials for a disposition to the superiority. I am, etc.

[In the above letter was inclosed a copy of Lord Eglinton's circular letter to his voters.]

[228] No. XXXIV. Mr. Hugh Tod, W.S. to Mr. John Dillon, Writer, Edinburgh.

59, George Street, 23d March, 1815.

Dear Sir: I return you revised the draft of the disposition by Lord Eglinton to Mr. McKnight Crawford of the superiority in Renfrewshire, and should be glad if you could get it extended and sent to me in time to-morrow, to admit of its going west by the post of that evening. I am, etc.

(Signed) HUGH TOD.

Mr. John Dillon, Writer.

No. XXXV. Hugh Crawford, Esq. to John Dillon, Esq.

Greenock, 11th April, 1815.

Dear Sir: Yesterday I forwarded my life-rent disposition from the Earl of Eglinton to Francis Martin, writer, Paisley, in order that he might expedite my infeftment. This morning I have a letter from him, acknowledging the receipt of that deed, and saying that he would be at Eaglesham on Friday, and then pass my infeftment, along with some others. He then adds,—“Have you given orders for Cartburn's disposition being extended as it stands, agreeable to the Earl's wish?” As I am unable to answer that query, and as the sooner Mr. Crawford is infeft the better, I request you may get the disposition expedite, with the least possible delay. I have written to Mr. Martin to the above effect. I am, etc.

(Signed) H. CRAWFORD.

[229] No. XXXVI. John Dillon, Esq. to Hugh Crawford, Esq.

Edinburgh, 12th April, 1815.

Dear Sir: I have your letter of yesterday. Mr. Crawford's disposition has been extended, signed, and delivered. On inquiry where I was to get the charter to expedite the infeftment, Mr. Tod told me that it was lodged with Mr. Martin, in order that his Lordship's disponees might have access to it for that purpose. Accordingly, I yesterday dispatched the disposition, and a draft of the sasine, to Mr. Knox, with instructions, without delay, to get Mr. C. infeft, and, for that purpose, to apply to Mr. Martin for the charter. Perhaps they may go together to the ground, and do the business at the same time. I am, etc.

LETTERS RELATING TO THE CASE OF HUMPHREY GRAHAM.

No. XXXVII. Lord Eglinton to H. Graham, W.S.

Eglinton Castle, February 2, 1815.

Dear Sir: There are several dormant freeholds on my estate in Renfrewshire, which I want to dispose of to my particular friends, on the footing mentioned in the inclosed letter. If your father or you will have the goodness to purchase one of them, it will add to the favour and friendly attachment I have already received from you. There can be no doubt that these freeholds are unchallengable, and as in-[230]-dependent as any in the kingdom, but of this you will be a perfect good judge yourself. I remain, etc.

(Signed) EGLINTON.

[This letter contained the general circular of 2d of February, 1815, No. I.]

No. XXXVIII. H. Graham, W.S. to Lord Eglinton.

Edinburgh, 6th February, 1815.

My Lord: Allow me to return your Lordship my most grateful thanks for the very polite offer of a life-rent freehold in Renfrewshire, contained in your letter of the 2d current. A purchase of this nature would not suit my father so well,—but as I have every desire to become a voter in that county, if your Lordship will be so good as put a value on the life-rent qualification, as well as on the feu-duty, I shall be happy to become a purchaser. The value of the annuity seems accurately calculated according to the government tables,—and a vote purchased in this manner must undoubtedly be as good as any in the kingdom. I have the honour to be, etc.

(Signed) HUMPHREY GRAHAM.

No. XXXIX. James Crichton, Writer, Irvine, Factor for Lord Eglinton, to H. Graham, W.S.

Irvine, 9th Feb. 1815.

Sir: I am desired by the Earl of Eglinton to explain to you the value of the life-rent freeholds mentioned in his Lordship's letter to you of 2d inst. in answer to your letter of 6th.

You request, in that letter, the Earl to put a value on [231] the freehold. The value of the feu-duty being in the nature of an annuity on the life of the purchaser, you will find, according to the age, by the table sent, and this value is meant to be the price of that feu-duty, and freehold thereby given.

If this be satisfactory to you, you will have the goodness to mention it to Mr. Russell, who will make out the deed in your favours, and it will be obliging your dropping me a few lines, saying you have done so. I am, etc.

(Signed) JAMES CRICHTON.

No. XL. Mr. Graham's Answer to the above Letter from Mr. Crichton.

Edinburgh, 11th February, 1815.

Sir: I have, to-day, been favoured with yours of the 9th current. I was aware of Lord Eglinton's goodness in intending the qualification should be included in the price of the annuity. But as it undoubtedly possesses a value over and above what-ever may be that of the annuity, I should wish to give what may be considered a fair price for it also. Say, therefore, that both together may be worth £100. If this price be approved of, I shall apply immediately to Mr. Russell, so that the necessary deeds may be prepared as soon as possible. I remain, etc.

(Signed) HUMPHREY GRAHAM.

No. XLI. James Crichton, Esq. to H. Graham, W. S.

Irvine, 15th February, 1815.

Sir: I am favoured with yours of the 11th current, and have to observe, that though the sum only in the table sent you is exacted as the price of the annuity and freehold, and is calculated on Price's tables of annuities, as the value of the £5 only, yet the same sum laid out to the best advantage in purchasing an annuity only, would [232] yield nearly one half more than the £5. So that the difference may be considered as the value of the freehold. You can arrange the matter to your satisfaction, however, with Mr. Russell,—meantime, I am, etc.

(Signed) JAMES CRICHTON.

No. XLII. Lord Eglinton to H. Graham, W. S.

Eglinton Castle, 15th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: My wish is, that the purchase of the freehold may be made entirely to your pleasure. I am happy to have such a purchaser. If you will be so good, therefore, as take the trouble to communicate with Mr. Russell on the subject, the affair will be settled; and I am anxious that dispositions and conveyances may be made out, that the freeholds may be effective as soon as possible. Excuse this hurried note, and I remain, etc.

(Signed) EGLINTON.

No. XLIII. H. Graham, W. S. to George Russell, Esq. W. S.

Edinburgh, 21st February, 1815.

Dear Sir: I have, within these few days, had some correspondence with Mr. Crichton at Irvine, relative to my purchasing from Lord Eglinton a life-rent vote in Renfrewshire, with a feu-duty attached of £5 sterling, and I have been referred by him to you, in order to conclude the business. I made offer of £100 for the feu-duty and vote together, of which, perhaps, about one-half may be considered the price of the annuity, as I should conceive myself entitled to not less than 10 per cent. on my life, and the remainder to be the value of the vote. If you agree with me in thinking this a fair price, I shall be glad to have it concluded as soon as possible. I remain, etc.

(Signed) HUMPHREY GRAHAM.

No. XLIV. Lord Eglinton to H. Graham, W. S.

Eglinton Castle, 25th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: I am so much hurried to-day, that I have only time to say in answer to your letter to Messrs. Russell, Anderson, and Tod, on the purchase of the Renfrewshire freehold, which they sent me, that I heartily agree to its being done in the way you propose. It is my wish that the matter should be made quite agreeable to you and the purchasers, and you are entitled to have it done so. Pray remember me kindly to your father. And I remain, etc.

(Signed) EGLINTON.

No. XLV. George Russell, Esq. W. S. to H. Graham, W. S.

Edinburgh, 27th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: I have Lord Eglinton's instructions to accept the offer contained in your letter to me of the 21st instant, and hope soon to be able to send you the necessary papers for completing the transaction. I am, etc.

(Signed) GEORGE RUSSELL.

No. XLVI. Hugh Tod, Esq. W. S. to H. Graham, W. S.

59, George-Street, 23d March, 1815.

Dear Sir: We delayed handing you the writs necessary to enable you to prepare the draft of the disposition to the freehold in Renfrewshire, purchased from Lord Eglinton, until a vassalage was completed, and that being now done, I request you will take the earliest opportunity of framing and sending, for our review, a draft of the disposition to the superiority, in the terms mentioned in your offer. I [234] cannot conveniently part with the charter, but it shall be shown to you before the transaction is completed, and, in the mean time, I annex a note of the description of the lands. I shall also satisfy you afterwards, that these extend to the valuation necessary. To save us both some trouble, I send you the draft of a similar disposition, which I beg you will return.

No. XLVII. Hugh Tod, Esq. W. S. to H. Graham, W. S. also dated 59, George Street, 23d March, 1815.

Dear Sir: With reference to my letter in the early part of the day, I have now to trouble you with the Crown-charter in favour of Lord Eglinton, among others, of the superiority of the lands which is to be conveyed to you, and also a certificate of the valuation of his Lordship's property lands in the county of Renfrew, both of which I hope you will return me early to-morrow. I am, etc.

(Signed) HUGH TOD.

No. XLVIII. H. Graham, W. S. to Hugh Tod, W. S.

Edinburgh, 24th March, 1815.

Dear Sir: I am this morning favoured with yours of the 23d, accompanying the Prince's charter in Lord Eglinton's favour, and certificate of valuation of his Lordship's lands in Renfrewshire. I return you herewith these writings, with the draft disposition you were so good as send me. I have prepared a draft disposition of the freehold purchased by me, which I enclose for your revival, and shall be glad how soon it be returned to be extended. It will be proper, at the same time, that I see the feu-rights of the lands disposed.

LETTERS RELATING TO THE CASE OF JOHN M'KERRELL, MANUFACTURER, PAISLEY.

No. XLIX. Fulton M'Kerrell to Lord Eglinton.

Paisley, 10th February, 1815.

My Lord: On my return from Ayrshire, where I have been for a few days, I have the honour of receiving your letter of the 2d instant. Permit me to express how sensible I am of the very handsome manner in which you are pleased to offer me a freehold qualification in this county. At the same time I have to state to your Lordship, that when I made application on this subject to Mr. Robertson at Irvine, it was for my brother John M'Kerrell of this place, as well as for myself, and to whom, I am persuaded, you will feel equally friendly disposed. If, therefore, you have not already completed your number, I hope we may both be included. If, however, it should unfortunately prove otherwise, and although I am very anxious for a vote, yet I feel I should not act properly by my brother, considering that I undertook to apply for him at the time I did for myself, if I did not yield the qualification to him. To this arrangement, should it prove inconvenient for you to accommodate us both, I trust you will have no objection. I have noted below my brother's age, as well as my own.

With regard to the sum of feu-duty to be paid, it is perfectly the same to us, and may be made whatever is agreeable to your Lordship. I have the honour to be, etc.

(Signed) FULTON M'KERRELL.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Eglinton, etc.

[The letter of which M'Kerrell here acknowledges the receipt, is the general circular, 2d February, No.1.]

No. L. Alexander M'Lean (Lord Eglinton's Secretary) to Francis Martin.

Eglinton Castle, 11th February, 1815.

Sir: Lord Eglinton wrote you to-day, requesting that you would transmit Mr. Crawford of Cartburn's name to Mr. Russell, for a freehold in Renfrewshire. His Lordship has, however, by this night's post, received an answer to his letter to Mr. M'Kerrell, of which I inclose you a copy. His Lordship desires me to say, that he is most anxious, if possible, to accommodate the Mr. M'Kerrells, and requests that you will, in the mean time, delay transmitting Mr. Crawford's name, although he is equally anxious to have him as a purchaser.

Perhaps it may not be an object of much consequence to Mr. Simpson at this time to get upon the roll; if he could, therefore, withdraw his claim till the Eastwood votes are made effective, it would, I think, be agreeable to His Lordship. I am, etc.

(Signed) ALEX. McLEAN, Secretary.

Lord Eglinton will write you himself soon.

Mr. Martin, Writer, Paisley.

No. LI. Lord Eglinton to Francis Martin.

Eglinton Castle, 12th February, 1815.

Sir: Mr. McLean, at my desire, sent you a copy of Mr. McKerrell's letter by last night's post. It is very unfortunate that I did not receive this letter sooner, as I should have been anxious to accommodate these two gentlemen, and to have had them for purchasers. I scarcely know what can be done. One of them, however, must have a preference to Mr. Crawford of Cartsburn, and I will write his friend, Mr. Hugh Crawford, on the subject, Mr. McKerrell having the undoubted right, from having first [237] applied. I know no way of accommodating the brothers, but by soliciting either your friend Mr. Simpson, or Mr. Crichton, to resign their claim, and it will be doing me a particular favour, if one or other of them should be good enough to do it. May not another vote afterwards be made out upon Eastwood, which may be given in lieu of the one given up! I have some reason, upon enquiry, to believe that I am superior of John Govan's Mains of Eastwood.

I request your answer as soon as possible. If you have wrote to Mr. Russell, it will be proper that you write him again, that a more correct list will be sent him. I mean to be in Edinburgh myself this day se'nnight, when I will get this and other business arranged. I am, etc.

No. LII. Lord Eglinton to Fulton McKerrell.

Eglinton Castle, Feb. 18, 1815.

Dear Sir: I have a thousand apologies to offer you, for not having answered your letter sooner; but being engaged in some very interesting business, I hope you will accept as my apology.

I very much regret that, from prior engagements, it will not be in my power to give a freehold to your brother. Had I known at first I would have been most happy to have given a preference to you, to most others on the list.

I hope, when your brother and you come to this country, that you will not pass this house, for, I assure you, nobody will be more happy to see you, or make you more welcome. I am, etc.

(Signed) EGLINTON.

Fulton McKerrell, Esq. Paisley.

[238]

No. LIII. Mr. Martin to Lord Eglinton.

Paisley, 13th Feb. 1815.

My Lord: I have the honour of your Lordship's different letters respecting the freehold qualifications in this county. It is my intention to be in Edinburgh on Wednesday, where I shall remain for several days, during which I shall be frequently with Mr. Russell, and shall endeavour to bring west with me the dispositions, so far as they can be got finished.

In the list of names which your Lordship has transmitted me, I do not find the ages of the several gentlemen; Mr. Russell will of course be unable to fill up the sums until this is known. Your Lordship has not signified your pleasure with regard to the feu-duties. I therefore take it for granted that you have fixed upon £5 to go with each vote, in which case the price will be regulated by the age entirely.

With respect to Messrs. McKerrells' application, I was quite aware of Mr. Fulton McKerrell's intention as to his brother John, and I knew also that he wished for a vote himself; but I fear that he cannot put his vote in action so long as he holds his present situation of distributor of stamps for the district. Perhaps he may have some arrangements in view respecting it, but it is right for me to apprise your Lordship of his situation, in case I might be reflected on afterwards.

I shall be happy to have the honour of a letter from your Lordship while I am in Edinburgh, with information as to the particulars above stated, in which case I shall be able to bring the dispositions with me. I have the honour to be, etc.

LETTERS RELATING TO THE CASE OF MR. GEDDES.

No. LIV. Lord Eglinton to Colonel Geddes.

Eglinton Castle, February 22, 1815.

Dear Colonel: The enclosed is a circular which I have sent to several of my friends, who appear willing to purchase the freeholds which at present are dormant in your county. When I had the pleasure of seeing you at Eaglesham, you flattered me by saying that you would purchase one of them. I will take it as a particular favour if you will do so. If the footing they are put upon is not agreeable to you, I will be glad to make it in the way most agreeable to you. As it stands at present, it is according to the opinion I had at Edinburgh from Mr. Cranstoun and other professional gentlemen there.

I beg you will accept of my warmest thanks for the many instances of attention and friendship I have received from you, which shall be ever remembered with heart-felt gratitude. Yours, etc.

(Signed) EGLINTON.

No. LV. Colonel Geddes to Lord Eglinton.

Verreville, February 3, 1815.

My Dear Lord: I am honoured by your Lordship's obliging communication of the 2d instant, and will readily purchase a life-rent qualification in the county of Renfrew, upon the terms mentioned in your Lordship's letter.

Your Lordship will be so kind as desire the proper deed to be prepared, and I shall at once pay the price, agree-[240]-able to the table sent me, estimating my age at 56, which it is. I have the honour to be, etc.

LETTERS, ETC. RELATING TO ALL THE CASES PRODUCED BY LORD EGLINTON AND HIS AGENTS.

No. LIX. Deposition of Lord Eglinton.

Before Archibald Bell, Esq. Sheriff-depute of the county of Ayr, etc.

N.B. The first part of this document relates to letters set forth in this Appendix, and produced by Lord Eglinton as a haver. The document concludes thus:—

The commissioner, on considering the terms of the commission, conceives that it does not include the private correspondence between his Lordship and his own [242] agents; and, therefore, that his Lordship is not obliged to produce the same. And all the letters or copies of letters above produced are marked by the deponent and commissioner as relative hereto; and depones, That he has not willfully put away or concealed any documents which might be called for under this commission, nor does he know that any such are in any other person's possession. All which is truth, etc.

No. LX. Letter from Mr. Robertson, Lord Eglinton's Factor, to Mr. F. Martin—inclosed in the above.

Bower Lodge, January 20, 1816.

Dear Sir: On the subject of the freeholds, I have the Earl's authority to say, that £250 may be fixed on as the price of each, with a life-rent annuity corresponding to this sum, according to the respective ages of the different parties.

Of that you have already a scale, and I should suppose, in the first place, that a scroll of a disposition might be made out on some one particular life (say your own), and this by Messrs. Russell, Anderson, and Tod, and sent out by them to the Earl, after which his Lordship would cause it to be signified to his different friends, who, if they agreed to it, the whole might be gone into without more delay. I am, etc.

(Signed) GEO. ROBERTSON.

Francis Martin, Esq. Writer, Paisley.

No. LXI. Mr. Francis Martin, Writer in Paisley, to Messrs. Russell, Anderson and Tod, W.S. Edinburgh.

Paisley, 24th January, 1815.

Gentlemen: On the preceding page I send you a letter which I received from Mr. Robertson, under cover from his Lordship.

[243] You will please make out the draft of a disposition in my favour, to as much superiority as give a vote. I should prefer it upon Eastwood, if agreeable.

My age is 41, and the annuity corresponding to this is £7 10s. per cent. per annum upon my life.

I believe you have the scale made out by Mr. Robertson; but in case you have not, I enclose you the copy sent to me. As the Earl is desirous to have the votes immediately created, I shall be extremely obliged by your writing me when the draft of the disposition has been sent to him. I am, etc.

No. LXII. George Russell, Esq. to Francis Martin, Esq.

Edinburgh, 26th January, 1815.

I was yesterday favoured with your letter of the 24th instant, and by this post I send to Lord Eglinton drafts of the dispositions relative to the freeholds he meant to dispose of in Renfrewshire, together with a memorandum, stating what has occurred to me on the subject, and in consequence of which I have no doubt that you will be immediately sent to for your assistance in the business.

No. LXIII. Mr. Martin to Lord Eglinton.

Paisley, 4th February, 1815.

My Lord: I have the honour of acknowledging receipt of your Lordship's letter of the 2d current, and beg leave to return your Lordship my most grateful thanks for the confidence you have been pleased to repose in me.

The possession in a freehold in the county of Renfrewshire is highly flattering to me, and it is no less gratifying to my feelings, the idea that it will afford me an opportunity of promoting your Lordship's political interest in this quarter, which has hitherto remained inactive.

[244] I am quite satisfied of the legality, as well as the independence of the freehold votes your Lordship intends to create, and I have no objections, if it meets with your Lordship's approbation, to pay for an increase of the feu-duty proposed to be given with each vote, according to the table transmitted to me, so as to make the amount £15 or £20 per annum; but this entirely as your Lordship shall consider proper.

My age is 41; Mr. Russell can therefore regulate the price by the table accordingly. I have the draft of a disposition, which came under your Lordship's cover to me two days ago, accompanied with Mr. Russell's notes, which I shall take the liberty of returning to him, if your Lordship does not require it to be transmitted to you.

It appears to be Mr. Russell's opinion, that the calculation of the valuations of the different freeholds is rather too close. No doubt, they are as near to the legal amount as it is possible to make them; but as the valuations are accurately taken from the cess-books, it would be a pity to extend the amount of each vote far beyond the legal quantity, so as to make a sacrifice of a vote, if it is possible to save it.

Eaglesham affords eight qualifications, including the old re-tours on Floors, and leaves a surplus of	£169	1	2
Eastwood, after deducting £11 13s. 6d. thrown into one of
Eaglesham votes, extends to	608	6	6
Amounting together to	£777	7	8

which is within £33 of making two votes more; and if your Lordship is superior of John Givan's Mains of Eastwood, it stands valued at £73 6s. 8d. which is sufficient to make up the vote. I do not know how this stands, but Mr. Russell will perhaps know. If your Lordship is not superior of Mains, then the spare valuations may be divided as he proposes, because it is insufficient to make a vote of itself; but if it is very near that, I think it practicable, for the necessary quantity to complete it, to be obtained from some proprietors in the county, in which case your Lordship would be able to create ten votes in all, besides the two already held by General and Mr. Montgomerie.

As soon as your Lordship has fixed upon the names of the voters, I shall furnish Mr. Russell with the descriptions for each, as he requires in his notes.

I took the liberty of mentioning to Mr. Robertson, on a former occasion, the wish of my partner, Mr. Simpson, to hold one of your Lordship's votes; I think I can safely pledge myself for his attachment to your Lordship's interest, and I beg leave most respectfully to recommend his application to your Lordship's consideration. I have the honour to be, etc.

(Signed) FRA. MARTIN.

No. LXIV. Francis Martin, Esq. to George Russell, Esq.

Paisley, 7th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: Along with this you will please receive a new cast and description of My Lord Eglinton's lands in Eaglesham parish, the superiority of which is to be conveyed in life-rent, as formerly proposed. This cast affords eight votes, including the retour of Floors.

I also enclose you in this packet the draft of one of the life-rent dispositions, which I presume is correct. But in a letter from his Lordship to me, of date the second current, he says, "I am to convey the superiority of my own property lands, to afford a freehold qualification in life-rent, with a feu-duty, payable by me to the life-renter, of £5 sterling yearly. The price I receive, will be the value of the £5 upon the life of the person to whom this conveyance is made, conform to the most approved tables of annuities." He afterwards adds: "Should it be more agreeable to you to have a larger sum of feu-duty, although it can make no difference to the title, and, therefore, appears quite unnecessary, be so good as to inform me to what extent you would wish it, and I will take it into consideration." Now will it not be necessary to take notice of the feu-duty in the disposition? The sums will vary according as the dispoonees purchase a greater or less quantity of feu-duty. The particulars of which, and the names of the dispoonees, will most likely be transmitted to you by his Lordship this week.

I also enclose you the draft of the disposition for separating the property from the superiority, which is to be filled up in your favour.

As his Lordship has expressed his anxiety to get the votes made effectual as soon as possible, I trust you will get the disposition expedited at your earliest convenience.

I have not kept any copy of the valuation of Eastwood, but you have the certificate from the cess-books, which will enable you to describe the lands when you come to convey them. I may observe, however, that many of the possessions are now in the hands of other persons than those who are stated as the possessors when the valuations were split in the cess-books; but I presume this will make no difference in the description now, if the words "as some time possessed by," are used. I am, etc.

No. LXV. Lord Eglinton to Mr. Martin.

Eglinton Castle, 11th February, 1815.

Sir: Being most anxious to have the Renfrewshire freeholds completed as soon as possible, I do not delay a moment answering your letter of yesterday. I thought that it had been understood that I had fixed upon £5 to go with each vote, so that the price will be regulated by the table; the names and ages only wanted, which I will now fill up as far as I can. Colonel Geddes, 56 years past.—Hugh Crawford, Esq. writer, Greenock, returns himself between the age of 52 and 54. John McKerrell concluded his 56th [247] year the August 1814.—William Donaldson, Esq. physician in Ayr, 36 years.—James Crichton, 13.—Yourself and your partner you can fill up, and I request you will call upon Mr. Humphrey Graham, W.S. who I have every reason to believe will be a purchaser, and who will inform you of his age, which completes the number, eight.

You will observe by this that I still give a preference to your partner, Mr. Simpson, and, upon consideration, I think it but fair, as, in fact, I knew only at the time of one of the McKerrells. This, I hope, will finish the transaction: at all events, the sums need not delay the making out the dispositions and conveyances, so that the gentlemen may be infest without delay, and I trust that this may be done before the Exchequer term rises. I have not time to write Mr. Russell, but request you will be so good as to read him this letter. Upon reading your letter over again, I am glad to observe you say that you will be able to bring the disposition with you. I am, etc.

No. LXVI. Mr. Martin to Lord Eglinton.

Paisley, 20th February, 1815.

My Lord: I had the honour of your Lordship's letter of the 14th current, when in Edinburgh, and as it appeared to me to contain all the information requisite, I devoted part of two days in arranging the descriptions of the several parcels of land with Mr. Tod, preparatory to the drawing of the dispositions.

After finishing this, however, I found that both Mr. Russell and Mr. Tod had some difficulties to remove, which they requested I would state in a personal conversation with your Lordship, as it would be improper to commit them to writing, and that I should wait upon you for that purpose. It occurs to me that I can state what was said to me to Mr. Robertson, at Eaglesham, this week, who can report to your Lordship on his return to [248] Eglinton Castle. But if your Lordship should think it necessary for me to wait on you for the purpose myself, I shall accompany Mr. Robertson from Eaglesham, on hearing from your Lordship previous.

I beg to return your Lordship my grateful thanks for the preference which you have shewn to Mr. Simpson, in the list you did me the honour to transmit me, and have the honour to be, etc.

(Signed) FRA. MARTIN.

No. LXVII. Francis Martin, Esq. to George Russell, Esq.

Eglinton Castle, 24th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: I have, this afternoon, had the honour of an interview with my Lord Eglinton. The alteration of the feu-duties in the dispositions intended to be granted by his Lordship of the superiorities in Renfrewshire has been agreed to by the gentlemen to whom they are to be granted, and I am directed by his Lordship to send draughts of the dispositions, leaving blanks for the price and feu-duties, to the several gentlemen interested, to be filled up by their agents, his Lordship being desirous to make the matter quite agreeable to all of them. I shall, therefore, on my return home to-morrow, transmit the scrolls accordingly, leaving the description of the lands also blank, as this will fall to be filled up by you, from the arrangement made with Mr. Tod when I was in Edinburgh; after which they can immediately be returned to me, that they may be put into the gentlemen's hands, to get extended by their agents.

In the meantime, it will be proper for you to go on with the trust disposition to the feus of the different lands, preparatory to the execution of the feu-dispositions.

His Lordship desires me to say, that he accepts of Mr. Graham's offer, and he requests that you will be so good as mention so to him: and now, that there appears to be [249] nothing in the way of getting matters brought to a speedy termination, he hopes that you will forward the dispositions, so far as depends on you, without delay, and am, etc.

(Signed) FRA. MARTIN.

No. LXVIII. Francis Martin, Esq. to George Russell, Esq.

Eglinton Castle, 25th February, 1815.

Dear Sir: Upon perusing the two precepts of clare, lately granted by the Earl of Eglinton, in favour of Mr. Brown of Nether Borland, and John Mather in Muirhouse, I find that the lands of Nether Borland are described as being a ten-shilling land of old extent, and Muirhouse a twenty-shilling land of old extent; but I can discover no retour of these lands, although certainly one must be. If any retour could be found of these lands, there is a retour of the ten-shilling land of old extent of Windhill, which would be sufficient to make up another vote in Renfrewshire. May I take the liberty of requesting that you will be so obliging as write me on the subject as soon as possible?

Besides the eight votes upon Eaglesham, there is superiority sufficient for another upon Eastwood, which my Lord Eglinton has also signified his intention to dispose of. I do not know the amount of the feu-duties payable to his Lordship on Eastwood; but if they do not amount to £5, the price of the vote must be less in proportion to the deficiency, in reference to the Eaglesham votes.

It occurs to me, after different conversations with his Lordship, that twenty guineas may be specified as the price of the vote, exclusive of the price of the feu-duty; and upon this principle the purchasers can easily regulate the amount of the feu-duty, as his Lordship leaves it to themselves to increase or diminish the proposed sum of £5 as they feel inclined, and this freedom of choice will no doubt produce a difference in the purchase prices in [250] almost all the dispositions, which is what appeared to me to be your opinion should be the case. If any thing occurs to you on the subject, I shall be extremely happy to hear from you, and am, etc.

(Signed) FRA. MARTIN.

Might not a small portion of valuation be taken from Eaglesham, and added to Eastwood, in which case the feu-duty could be fixed according to the wish of the purchaser? I have read the above letter to my Lord Eglinton, who begs you will write by return of post.

No. LXIX. George Russell, Esq. W.S. to Francis Martin, Esq. Writer, Paisley.

27th February, 1815.

I am favoured with your letters of the 24th and 25th instant. You mentioned, that, at the Earl's desire, you are to transmit drafts of the disposition, leaving blanks for the price and feu-duties to the several gentlemen who are to become purchasers; and you then add, "in the meantime it will be proper for you to go on with the trust-disposition to the feus of the different lands, preparatory to the execution of the feu-disposition." Now, I am quite at a loss to understand this. You will recollect that I stated to you distinctly when you were here, that we could not move one step until the feu-duties to be attached to each parcel were ascertained, but that so soon as we were informed of the amount of these respective feu-duties, the feu-disposition for creating the vassalage, and in which the feu-duties must necessarily be inserted, would be made out and sent to be executed by the Earl. And after this, the sasine being taken, on the feu-right, nothing remained to be done but to convey the superiorities to the different purchasers at the stipulated prices. The feu-dispositions are granted in trust, but as to any other trust-disposition, I really cannot imagine what it would refer to.

We have examined our retour-book for Renfrewshire, [251] but do not find any separate retours either for Nether Borland or Muirhouse. We observe a two-merk land of Weitland and Borlands, in the lordship of Semphill, and a Muirhouse, as part of the seven-pound land of Leye; but nothing can be made of these cumulos, unless the separate extent of each parcel had been given.

The feu-duty of the whole of Eastwood is £5, and a proportion of this could be conveyed corresponding to the extent of the superiority, that is to constitute a freehold. I am afraid it would derange the state you have already made up if you were to take part of the Eaglesham valuation and add it to Eastwood; but you will be able to judge of this from the materials in your hands.

What you have proposed, as to putting a certain value on the freeholds, and modifying the feu-duties, according to the inclination of purchasers, is agreeable to what I suggested, and I hope you will soon be able to inform me what the feu-duties of the different parcels are to be, so that no time may be lost in completing the feu-rights.

No. LXX. Francis Martin, Writer in Paisley, to George Russell, Writer to the Signet.

Paisley, 6th March, 1815.

I send you Mr. McKerrell's, Mr. Simpson's, and my own dispositions for your perusal. I wish Mr. Tod would be so obliging as correct the description in mine, as I have copied it from some loose notes, which I cannot depend upon, and he has the certificate of the valuation, which is correct. Have the goodness to return the drafts to me, after you have perused them, although I am aware that they cannot be signed until you have arranged the whole feu-duties, and got the dispositions to the feus. I have requested of the other purchasers to forward their drafts to you with all speed, and I am, etc. (Signed) FRANCIS MARTIN.

No. LXXI. Mr. Russell to Mr. Martin.

Edinburgh, 9th March, 1815.

I am favoured with your letter of the 6th instant, with drafts of three life-rent dispositions of Lord Eglinton, in favour of yourself, Mr. McKerrell, and Mr. Simpson; but to revise these deeds before the feus are created, would be putting the cart before the horse, and might lead to confusion. I expect the Earl in town to-morrow, and hope while he is here to get all the feu-dispositions executed; and this being once done, the conveyances of the superiority will go on in regular course. I take it for granted that I shall immediately be apprised of the extent of all the respective feu-duties.

No. LXXII. Mr. Martin to Mr. Russell.

Paisley, March 13, 1815.

I inclose you Colonel Geddes's disposition, which, after you have revised and filled up the description you will please return me, to be given to his agent to extend.

No. LXXIII. Mr. Hugh Tod, Writer to the Signet, to Mr. Martin.

Edinburgh, March 27, 1815.

I return you, as a parcel by this evening's mail, the drafts of the dispositions by Lord Eglinton to yourself, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Geddes, and Mr. McKerrell, which you may get extended, and then forward them, with the scrolls, to Mr. Crichton, who will get them executed by Lord Eglinton. I have mentioned to Mr. Crichton, that the two last cannot be signed until we receive back from Mr. Lamont a renunciation of a life-rent right which he holds over certain parcels of the lands contained in them, and which has been sent to him in England for his sub-[253]-scription; but this need not delay your sending to Mr. Crichton the extended disposition. Mr. Ferrier, the accountant, struck the feu-duty to be paid to Mr. Geddes at £8 11s. 10d., holding the purchase-money to be £79, and his age 56.

No. LXXIV. Mr. Tod to Mr. Martin.

Edinburgh, March 27, 1815.

I have only to say, that the deed of renunciation by Lamont has just come to hand, and that the dispositions to the superiority may therefore be completed as speedily as the parties incline.

No. LXXV. Extract from Letter Mr. Tod to Mr. James Crichton, Writer, Irvine.

Edinburgh, 27th March, 1815.

We have revised and adjusted the whole of the dispositions to the superiority, in order that they may be got extended in the meantime. The drafts of those of Dr. Donaldson and yourself, we send you as a parcel by this evening's mail-coach. The feu-duties are £5 each, and Mr. Ferrier has struck the Doctor's purchase-money at £61, taking his age to be 36, and yours at £56, holding your age to be 43. This is besides £21 for the votes. We also send the extract of Lord Boyd's retour, upon which your vote proceeds.

You will please observe, that, with the exception of the disposition to Mr. Martin and Mr. Simpson, none of the others can be signed by the Earl until we advise you that Lamont has signed and returned the renunciation.

No. LXXVI. Mr. Tod to Mr. Crichton.

Edinburgh, March 27, 1815.

I am happy to inform you that since writing you, as above, the deed of renunciation by Lamont has been re-[254]-ceived and is put on record, so that you need not delay getting one and all of the dispositions to the superiority, signed by the Earl, how soon they come to hand.

No. LXXVII. Mr. Crichton to Messrs. Russell, Anderson, and Tod.

Irvine, 31st March, 1815.

I am favoured with both your letters of the 27th, and the packet containing drafts of the dispositions by the Earl of Eglinton to Dr. Donaldson and myself,—also extended dispositions by his Lordship to H. Graham, Hugh Crawford, and M^cKnight Crawford. The three dispositions are signed. I forwarded Dr. Donaldson's on the 29th to Ayr by the Earl, who has since been there. I expect it to-morrow, when the whole five will be sent you along with the tack of Auchinmead, which you wrote for, to make out the articles of roup of that farm.

I have not heard from Mr. Martin with the other dispositions, but when they are sent will be attended to. I have fixed with the Earl that the prices of the whole of these freeholds are to be paid to you.

No. LXXVIII. Mr. Crichton to Messrs. Russell, Anderson, and Tod.

Irvine, 3d April, 1815.

I have this night sent, to go by coach to-morrow from Kilmarnock, the dispositions, by the Earl of Eglinton, in favour of Humphrey Graham, Esq., Hugh Crawford, Esq., and William M^cKnight Crawford, Esq., as you desired, also the scroll of the one in favour of Dr. Donaldson, and extract tack of Auchinmead.

[255] No. LXXIX. Mr. Crichton to Messrs. Russell, Anderson, and Tod.

Irvine, 7th April, 1815.

This morning I sent off to Kilmarnock, to go by the coach, a sealed parcel, addressed to you, containing the four scrolls of dispositions, by the Earl of Eglinton, which were sent me from Mr. Martin, on the 5th current, and executed the same day, also the scroll of my own, from his Lordship.

No. LXXX. Note showing the Annuity Price, and Feu-Duty, attached to each of the nine Freeholds.

Interrogatories in the Condescendence for John Shaw Stewart, Esq., and Robert Stewart, Esq., and answers thereto, for William M^cKnight Crawford, Esq.

30th January, 1818.

Q. 1.—Whether the complainer had any intimacy or intercourse with Lord Eglinton, previous to 9th February, 1815? If he had so, state what it was.

[256] A. 1.—Above twelve years ago, the complainer met Lord Eglinton at the Ayr races, to whom he was introduced. This circumstance he had forgot, till lately put in mind of it. He has not since that time had the honour of being in his Lordship's company.

Q. 2.—Whether upon any other ground of family connection, or otherways, he had any reason to expect that Lord Eglinton would sell him any property for less than its full market-price? If he had, to state the same.

A. 2.—The complainer has no reason to think that Lord Eglinton would sell him any property at less than his Lordship thought a fair price.

Q. 3.—Whether he ever employed any person (excepting Mr. Hugh Crawford, to whom subsequent interrogatories apply), to make proposals to the Earl for his receiving a life-rent, or other qualification for him, previous to 9th February 1815? If so, state the particulars of that correspondence and negociation.

A. 3.—The complainer never employed any person to make proposals to the Earl: The part Mr. Hugh Crawford took in this business, falls to be explained afterwards.

Q. 4.—Whether the complainer has been several years acquainted with Hugh Crawford, writer in Greenock, and lived in habits of intimacy with him, both previous to and in the course of the year 1815?

A. 4.—The complainer, since his infancy has been acquainted with Mr. Hugh Crawford, writer in Greenock, and has lived in habits of intimacy with him, both previous to, and in the course of the year 1815; but owing to a particular circumstance, he was very little in Mr. Hugh Crawford's company towards the end of 1814, and during the whole of 1815.

Q. 5.—Whether, previous to the year 1815, and during that year, the complainer took the chief management of the estate of Cartburn, belonging to his mother, and corresponded with Hugh Crawford, and gave instructions relative to the management of that estate.

A. 5.—The complainer, during the lifetime of his father, [257] was frequently employed to copy some, and to write other letters to Mr. Hugh Crawford, about the management of Cartburn: and since his father's death his mother has managed all her business through him.

Q. 6.—Whether, between 27th January and 9th February 1815, he met with Mr. Hugh Crawford at Edinburgh or elsewhere, and had conversation with him with regard to the liferent freehold Mr. Crawford was to receive from Lord Eglinton? Whether he had one or more conversations; to state the particulars of these conversations.

A. 6.—On Saturday the 4th February 1815, the complainer dined at the Pitt Club, at which dinner Mr. Hugh Crawford was present. On the 5th, the complainer called at Mr. Leven's for Mr. Crawford, who accompanied him to Ratho House; staid all night, and went next morning to Glasgow by the mail coach. The complainer does not recollect that the subject with regard to the liferent freehold Mr. Crawford was to receive from Lord Eglinton was even mentioned.

Q. 7.—Whether, previous to 9th February 1815, he authorised Mr. Hugh Crawford to apply to Lord Eglinton for £180 of valuation, or if he could not obtain that for a liferent freehold qualification?

A. 7.—The complainer has, for many years past, wished to add a freehold to the estate of Cartburn: this wish he uniformly expressed in the most open manner, and he more than once hoped to have made a purchase. With the steps he took, Mr Hugh Crawford was made acquainted; but he does not recollect of giving any instructions to Mr. Hugh Crawford, to apply to Lord Eglinton either for £180, or for a liferent freehold qualification. At the same time, Mr. Hugh Crawford was perfectly aware, that the complainer would be most happy to purchase either the £180, or the liferent.

Q. 8.—Did the complainer receive Mr. Hugh Crawford's letter of 13th February 1815, ingrossing copy of Lord Eglinton's letter, 11th February 1815.

[258] A. 8.—The complainer received and produced the letter.

Q. 9.—Did the complainer receive Mr. Hugh Crawford's letter of 14th February 1815, ingrossing copy of Lord Eglinton's letter of 12th February 1815?

A. 9.—The complainer received and produced this letter.

Q. 10.—Whether, from these letters or otherwise, the complainer understood, that other persons besides Mr. Hugh Crawford and himself were to receive freehold qualifications from Lord Eglinton in the county of Renfrew?

A. 10.—Till the complainer was refused the freehold on account of Mr. Mac-kerrell's acceptance, he was ignorant that any other person, save Mr. Hugh Crawford, had purchased a life-rent vote in Renfrewshire from Lord Eglinton.

Q. 11. When did he first hear of that circumstance, and from whom, and what was the nature of the information he received?

A. 11. The complainer first heard from Mr. Dillon, that others besides Mr. Hugh Crawford and Mr. Mackerrell, had purchased from Lord Eglinton; but with even their names he was unacquainted until he went to the county meeting, at which his claim for enrolment was rejected. It was after the complainer had made his own purchase, when Mr. Dillon mentioned that others were to be infest on the same charter.

Q. 12. Did the complainer receive a letter from Mr. Hugh Crawford, written on or about the 27th February 1815, containing a copy of Lord Eglinton's letter of 25th February 1815?

A. 12. The complainer did not receive this letter.

Q. 13. If he did not receive it, say whether he knows or suspects what is become of the said letter from Mr. Hugh Crawford, containing copy of Lord Eglinton's said letter of 25th February 1815.

A. 13. The complainer left Ratho House on the 27th February 1815; and on the 28th he arrived at Broadfield, [259] near Port-Glasgow, where he remained some time. During his visit there, he occasionally saw Mr. Hugh Crawford. It, therefore, Mr. Hugh Crawford did write, and put a letter into the post-office of date 27th February, 1815, that letter would go to Ratho House, and would from thence be forwarded to the complainer, at Mr. Hugh Crawford's office, Greenock, the direction that the complainer left for his letters, which were to be forwarded to him. When the letter arrived there, he suspects it would either be used as waste paper, or perhaps returned to the post-office. He has in vain made many inquiries and searches about this letter.

Q. 14. Whether the complainer received from Mr. Hugh Crawford, Lord Eglinton's three principal letters of the 11th, 12th, and 25th February, 1815, produced by the complainer? State where, when, and on what occasion, he received these three principal letters, and what conversation took place on his receiving them.

A. 14. In January, 1817, Mr. Dillon mentioned to the complainer, that he wished to have the originals, or copies of all the letters that mentioned any thing about the freehold qualification. The complainer requested Mr. Hugh Crawford to look out and send him any letters, or copies of letters, that he might have, noticing in any way the subject of the complainer's freehold. Mr. Hugh Crawford thereupon sent to the complainer these three principal letters of Lord Eglinton.

Q. 15. Whether Mr. John Dillon, the complainer's law-agent in Edinburgh, proceeded upon the directions and informations he received from Mr. Hugh Crawford to make up the titles?

A. 15. As this is a question that can be answered alone by Mr. John Dillon, the complainer must refer it to him. The complainer supposes that Mr. Dillon derived the first knowledge of the bargain from Mr. Hugh Crawford. Mr. Dillon afterwards received information from Mr. Tod, and from the complainer. It appears by a letter from Mr. Hugh Crawford to Mr. Dillon, of date 11th April, 1815, [260] and Mr. Dillon's answer, of date 12th of that month, Nos. 29, and 30, of Appendix, that Mr. Dillon did not communicate with Mr. Crawford as to the steps he was taking.

Q. 16. Was it at the desire of the complainer that Mr. Hugh Crawford wrote to Mr. Dillon relative to this vote?

A. 16. The complainer does not recollect of giving Mr. Hugh Crawford any directions to write to Mr. Dillon on this occasion: he does not recollect of ever seeing Mr. Hugh Crawford's letter to Mr. Dillon, till after the commencement of this process.

Q. 17. Did the complainer write to Mr. Dillon on that occasion? If he did, he is desired to say if he knows or suspects what became of his letters to Mr. Dillon?

A. 17. The complainer can find no copy or jotting of any letter to Mr. Dillon on this occasion. If he did write, the letter would be sent by post. He supposes Mr. Dillon keeps his letters.

Q. 18. Whether the complainer produced, when cited as a haver, Mr. Hugh Crawford's letters to Mr. Dillon, dated 11th and 17th March and 11th April, 1815, and copy letter by Lord Eglinton to Mr. Hugh Crawford, inclosed in Mr. Hugh Crawford's letter of 17th March?

A. 18. The complainer produced Mr. Crawford's letters to Mr. Dillon, of 14th and 17th March, 1815: he did not produce the letter of 11th April, 1815.

Q. 19. Whether the price of the freehold was at one time calculated at £74 9s. or thereabout?

A. 19. The complainer never heard of this calculation till after the price had been fixed and paid.

Q. 20. Whether the price which he or his agents ultimately agreed to pay, was £95 9s.?

A. 20. The price agreed upon was the only one that was fixed or proposed, and was £95 9s. which was the sum paid.

Q. 21. What was the cause of the difference?

[261] A. 21. There was no difference, and therefore no cause of difference.

Q. 22. Was the complainer consulted with regard to paying that difference?

A. 22. As there was no difference, there was no consultation about it.

Q. 23. When, and by whom was he consulted, and did he give any instructions relative to it?

A. 23. He was not consulted about the difference, as none existed.

Q. 24. Whether the complainer did not bring with him, on the day fixed for his examination as a haver, the ten writings specified in the inventory from No. 14, to No. 24, inclusive?

A. 24. The complainer took in all the letters he had discovered, with the exception of the three principal letters above mentioned, from Lord Eglinton, and gave them to Mr. Dillon. But Mr. Dillon then told the complainer, that he ought to produce these three letters also. There was not time for him to return to Ratho House that day and bring them in. He, therefore, left those which he had brought with Mr. Dillon, and on a succeeding day, he again returned to Edinburgh, and brought with him the three said letters, which were also put into the inventory, and he accompanied Mr. Dillon to the Outer House, where Mr. Dillon gave the letters, etc. to Mr. Patrick, who took them away with him. Some time afterwards, perhaps half an hour, Mr. Patrick returned, and told the complainer, that there was no occasion for his longer attendance, nor for his examination on oath, which the complainer testified his willingness to give.

Q. 25. Did he state to the Respondent's counsel, that on his word of honour, these were all the writings he had relative to the transaction, in consequence of which his examination on oath was dispensed with?

A. 25. In answer 24, this question is fully answered, and the complainant could only repeat that answer, to which he refers.

[262] Q. 26. Whether these were, or were not, the whole papers and letters that were in his possession at the time?

A. 26. These were all relative to this transaction, and included within the diligence, that he had discovered to be in his possession at the time.

Q. 27. Whether he has since discovered any other papers or letters relative to this transaction between Lord Eglinton and him? If he has, he is desired to produce them.

A. 27. The complainer did afterwards discover a jotting of a letter from himself to Lord Eglinton, of date 4th March, 1815, which he immediately sent to Mr. Dillon, and it was printed page 9th of his petition; had he discovered any other, he would instantly have sent them, but he has not found any other.

Q. 28. Whether he wrote a letter to Lord Eglinton upon 4th March, 1815?

A. 28. He did write that letter mentioned in the preceding answer.

Q. 29. Whether he ever wrote any other letter to Lord Eglinton, or had any other correspondence or communication with him, directly or indirectly, after 9th February, 1815, otherwise than through Mr. Hugh Crawford? If he had, to state what it was.

A. 29. The complainer never wrote any other letter to Lord Eglinton, nor had any correspondence or communication with him directly or indirectly, except that which has been fully and distinctly stated in the previous answers.

Q. 30. Whether, previous to 29th March, 1815, he had any conversation with any person at Greenock, or at any place in the county of Renfrew or elsewhere, relative to Lord Eglinton's measures for bringing forward and disposing of his dormant freeholds, in the county of Renfrew, or heard any thing thereof?

A. 30. Previous to 29th March, 1815, the complainer never knew or heard of Lord Eglinton's measures for bringing forward and disposing of his dormant freeholds in the county of Renfrew.

[263] Q. 31. Was any progress of titles, or search of incumbrances on Lord Eglinton's estate exhibited to you, or to your agents, or had you any information with regard to them?

A. 31. No progress of titles, or search of incumbrances on Lord Eglinton's estate was exhibited to the complainer, nor had he any information with regard to them.

He refers to his agent Mr. Dillon, for a further answer to this question, to whom he trusted the conducting of this business. W. MACKNIGHT CRAWFORD.

Ratho House, 26th January, 1818.

Minute for John Shaw Stewart and Robert Stewart, Esqrs. containing additional interrogatories.

6th February, 1818.

In terms of the above interlocutor, and under the reservation and explanation contained in their former minute of 13th January last, the Respondents now propose the following additional queries to the complainer, Mr. Macknight Crawford:

1mo. When the complainer mentions, in answer to query 5th, that his mother managed all her business through him, does he not mean, that she managed her whole business, and particularly the business of the Cartsburn estate, through the complainer; and was not Mr. Hugh Crawford the factor and country agent who managed the Cartsburn estate under the complainer, and with whom the complainer, previous to and during the year 1815, corresponded in that character?

2do. The complainer has stated, in answer to query 6th, that when he saw Mr. H. Crawford, on the 4th of February, and afterwards went with him to Ratho-House, on the 5th, "he does not recollect that the subject, with regard to the life-rent freehold Mr. Crawford was to receive from Lord Eglinton, was even mentioned." He is desired to read Mr. H. Crawford's letter to him of the 13th February, 1815, written on his return from Edinburgh, in which he says, "My dear Friend, I lost no time upon my return, in writing to the Peer of Eglinton, and last night's post brought me a letter from his Lordship, which I now beg leave to transcribe"; and he is desired to say, whether this letter does not refer to a previous conversation between Hugh Crawford and the complainer, in which it had been agreed, that Hugh Crawford should apply to Lord Eglinton, for one of his votes to the complainer?

3tio. The complainer is also desired to read the following passage in his reclaiming petition, page 7, viz. "To that gentleman himself, (Mr. Hugh Crawford) Lord Eglinton had offered to convey a superiority in life-rent, at the value of the feu duties, calculated at a price, according to the tables for ascertaining the worth of annuities. This circumstance Mr. Crawford mentioned to the petitioner in conversation, when he happened to be at Edinburgh, and to be with the Petitioner at his seat of Ratho, in this neighbourhood, about the beginning of February, 1815, stating verbally the price and mode of calculation, without showing to the Respondent any letter from Lord Eglinton; and the Respondent immediately said, that at this rate he would willingly purchase either superiority to the extent of £180 in valued rent, or to the amount of an entire qualification." The complainer is desired to say whether this statement was not made by his authority, and whether the same was not correct, according to his recollection at the time.

4to. In query 10th, the Respondents inquired, whether the complainer understood, from letters or otherwise, that other persons besides Mr. H. Crawford, himself, were to receive freeholds from Lord Eglinton. In answering the query the complainer states, that he was ignorant that any other person, save Mr. Hugh Crawford, had "purchased a life-rent vote" from Lord Eglinton. The complainer [265] is requested to read the passages after quoted from the following letters, viz. 1st, From Lord Eglinton's letter to Hugh Crawford, of 11th February, 1815, (admitted to have been received by the complainer) in which Lord Eglinton writes, "I will be happy, therefore, that he, (the complainer) will purchase one of those, on the terms I have been advised to propose; and as you mention that he will accept it, I have wrote Mr. Martin, in case the number is not filled up, if possible to give a preference to Mr. Crawford in the room of some other." 2d. The passage from Lord Eglinton's letter to H. Crawford, of 12th February 1815, (also admitted to have been received by the complainer) in which his Lordship writes, "I have received a letter from Mr. Fulton McKerrel, accepting of the terms offered for the purchase of one of the freeholds"; and, 3dly, The passage from Lord Eglinton's letter of 25th February, (the contents of which the complainer admits to have been communicated to him at Greenock,) in which his Lordship writes, "I have still another freehold to dispose of in the county of Renfrew, which I am glad to have it in my power to offer to your friend Mr. Crawford. If he will have the goodness to accept it, I beg you will write to Messrs. Russell, Anderson, and Tod, mentioning his christian name and age, without delay, in the hope that his disposition may be made out, along with the others which I have given positive directions to be immediately completed." The complainer is now desired to state, Whether from these, or any other letters or information, he did not understand that freeholds in the county of Renfrew had been offered to other persons besides himself and Hugh Crawford? and Whether he was not aware that other persons were to receive, or were in treaty to receive, such freeholds?

5th. The complainer has stated, in answer to query 13, that he left Ratho-House, and arrived at Broadfield, on 28th February, 1815, where he remained some time, during which he occasionally saw Mr. Hugh Crawford; and it was during this period that he states, in his reclaiming [266] petition, page 9, that Mr. H. Crawford made a verbal communication to him of the contents of Lord Eglinton's letter of 25th February, and in the same page of the petition, he quotes a letter from himself to Lord Eglinton, written at Greenock, during the same visit, dated 4th March, 1815, in the following terms:—"Mr. Hugh Crawford has just informed me that your Lordship has still a freehold in this county to dispose of, and that you was willing to let me have it. I shall be very happy to become the purchaser, and I have directed Mr. Crawford to write to your Lordship's man of business on that subject"; and he states in his reclaiming petition, that it was the complainer "who himself accepted the purchase." The complainer is desired to say, whether he did not understand the above letter to be an acceptance on his part of the terms, previously offered by Lord Eglinton, in his correspondence with Mr. Hugh Crawford, both to Mr. Hugh Crawford himself, and to the complainer. If he shall say, that it was not an acceptance of these terms; then, whether there were any other terms of which it was an acceptance; what were these terms, and to whom communicated? The complainer is farther required to say, whether the terms which he states, in the above letters, that he accepted of had not previously been communicated to him, and stated to be the same as offered to Mr. Hugh Crawford himself, and if he shall say they were not communicated, then did the complainer write the above letter accepting of the freehold, while in ignorance of the price, and other terms on which it was offered.

6th. The complainer has said in his petition, page 10th, that Mr. Crawford communicated the transaction to Mr. Dillon, the complainer's agent, "and it was left to Mr. Crawford to frame that communication as he saw fit." And again, "The only notification of the bargain to Mr. Dillon, was contained in the above letter from Mr. Hugh Crawford," viz. the letter of 14th March, in which Mr. Crawford writes:—"His (the complainer's) age, between 29 and 30, makes the value of his life [267] £74 9s. Will you, therefore, immediately wait on Messrs. Russel and Anderson, and peruse the draft of the disposition, which can be filled up with the above sum, and then get it extended." Is it not the complainer's opinion that Mr. H. Crawford, in this letter, communicated the terms of the bargain which had been concluded with Lord Eglinton, to the best of his knowledge and belief at the time; and does it not appear, from this letter, that the price fixed by Mr. Hugh Crawford was £74 9s.?

7th. The complainer is also requested to peruse Mr. Dillon's answer to this letter of 15th March, where after mentioning the demand made by Lord Eglinton's agents, at Edinburgh, of £21 for the vote, besides the £74 9s. he writes—"Please mention to me the number of years, and according to what table it is taken, that I may adjust the calculation to their mind"; and Mr. Crawford's reply of 17th March, in which he writes—"I beg to inclose you a copy of the Earl's letter to me, with the schedule of the lives. Mr. Crawford's age is 30, so that you can be at no loss to fix the sum."—and also to peruse the copy of Lord Eglinton's letter, here stated to be inclosed, being the letter of 2d February, 1815, called the first circular (all which letters were produced by the complainer), and regarding which last-mentioned letter the complainer states, in his petition, page 11. "that neither he nor his man of business knew of its existence till it was communicated by the preceding letter of 17th March, expressly to inform the latter of the principle on which the value of the freehold was calculated." The complainer is desired to say, whether it does not appear from these letters, that the price, for which the freehold was offered by Lord Eglinton, was the value of £5 of feu-duty, upon the life of the purchaser, conform to a table of annuities annexed; and whether it did not appear, that according to this table, the price of the annuity, on the complainer's life, amounted to £74 9s.; and whether it does not appear, from the above letters, that Mr. Crawford, when he wrote [268] them, acted on the belief that he had made the purchase for the complainer at the above price of £74 9s.

8vo. The complainer states, in his reclaiming petition, page 12th. "That on receiving the information contained in the above letters, Mr. Dillon immediately waited on Messrs. R. A. and Tod, the agents of Lord Eglinton, in this city. He calculated the value of the annuity, and found it correct, to which was added, 20 guineas for the freehold, making the whole price £95 9s. To this, with the defender's (complainer's) approbation, he agreed." The complainer is required to say, at what time this meeting between him and Mr. Dillon took place, and whether it was not immediately after Mr. Dillon had received the above letter of 17th March, with its inclosure, and prior to Mr. Dillon waiting on Messrs. Russell, Anderson, and Tod, and finally settling the transaction as alluded to in the passage before quoted.

9no. Was the disposition by Lord Eglinton to the complainer prepared after this meeting, and was that deed subscribed by Lord Eglinton on the 29th March, 1815?

Answers for William Macknight Crawford, Esq. to the Additional Interrogatories.

1. The complainer has already stated in the most unqualified terms, that his mother managed all her business through him. The complainer did correspond with Mr. Hugh Crawford, as factor of his mother upon the estate of Cartburn, and as her agent in the country, previous to, and during the year 1815.

2. The complainer has no recollection still, that any thing was said about "the life-rent freehold Mr. Crawford," (that is, as the complainer understands, Mr. Hugh Crawford) "was to receive from Lord Eglinton," at the time here referred to. Neither has the complainer any recollection, that the subject of the complainer's own intention to purchase superiority, or a life-rent qualification, was then spoken of between them, either at Ratho House [269] or at Edinburgh. At this time there was no prospect of getting either. He recollects that their time was occupied when together upon that occasion, so far as they had leisure, with a law question then in dependence before the Second Division of this court, relative to some shore ground at Cartburn. Indeed, the complainer is satisfied from the correspondence, that Mr. Hugh Crawford did not receive Lord Eglinton's letter to himself, of 2d February, 1815, till after he, Mr. Hugh Crawford, had returned from Ratho House to Greenock. Mr. Hugh Crawford wrote to Lord Eglinton, his letter of 9th February, 1815, without making any communication whatever to the complainer, of the letter of the 2d, which the Earl had written to him. The first communication Mr. Hugh Crawford made to the complainer of this correspondence, was by his letter to the complainer of the 13th February, produced.

3. The complainer entrusted the preparation of the reclaiming petition for him to his agent Mr. Dillon. He furnished to Mr. Dillon all the correspondence and copies which he had, and left it to Mr. Dillon and his counsel to make the proper use of these materials. The complainer did not revise the reclaiming petition when drawn, or see it before it was printed and presented. No statement in that paper alters or affects the complainer's own recollection of the facts. It is evident from the correspondence, that Mr. Hugh Crawford did not receive the communication from the Earl of Eglinton to himself, of the 2d February, 1815, till after he, Mr. Hugh Crawford, had returned to Greenock.

4. The complainer did not formerly answer to query 10th. that "he was ignorant that any other person, save Mr. Hugh Crawford, had purchased a life-rent vote from Lord Eglinton." His answer was, that he was ignorant of this, "till the complainer was refused the freehold, on account of Mr. Mackerrel's acceptance." The complainer had no information upon the subject of this additional question, except what he received from the terms of the [270] letters he has produced. He made no inquiry as to the offers or treaties of any other persons for freehold qualifications, and to the best of his recollection, he heard no more of their transactions with Lord Eglinton, than appears from the terms of the letters to which he refers.

5. During the complainer's visit at Broadfield, in the end of February and beginning of March 1815, he recollects that his thoughts, which at no time have been much engrossed by county politics, were particularly disengaged from that subject. It has been only from finding the note of his letter to Lord Eglinton of 4th March, 1815, that he has been able to recollect the fact, that he then wrote to his Lordship; and it is from the same evidence he is now satisfied that he had a verbal communication with Mr. Hugh Crawford at that time. The complainer has no recollection that he then knew the exact price required, nor does he believe that it had then been stated to him. He had no idea that any other terms could be proposed to him but the price, and no other terms but the pecuniary terms or price ever were, directly or indirectly, proposed to the complainer. He left Broadfield on the 26th March, and dined in Edinburgh on the 27th. He does not now remember that he actually then saw Mr. Dillon, or that Mr. Dillon then told him the sum of the price. But he has no doubt that he did on the 27th see Mr. Dillon at Edinburgh, and then learned from him the sum of the price. And he is certain that Mr. Dillon first informed him what the price was, and did so about this time. The complainer has a loose recollection, that from the first his impression was, that the price demanded would not exceed £100; but he cannot remember upon what authority he took this impression. The complainer thinks it proper to add, that he does not now remember directing Mr. Hugh Crawford to write to Lord Eglinton's man of business while he was at Broadfield, and he has no reason to think that Mr. Hugh Crawford did write any such letter. The complainer's mind was otherwise engaged at the time. He did not suppose the circumstances to be of the small-[271]-est consequence, and he has no farther recollection of these than he has stated.

6. The letter of Mr. Hugh Crawford to Mr. Dillon was not shown to the complainer, nor were its terms mentioned to him. He cannot, therefore, say what were Mr. Hugh Crawford's views when he expressed himself in these terms. It now appears to the complainer that Mr. Hugh Crawford then calculated only the value of the feu-duty, as an annuity upon the complainer's life.

7. The first precise information which the complainer can recollect that he got of the price was from Mr. Dillon. He did not see Mr. Dillon, nor hear from him on the subject of the price, so far as he can recollect, till Mr. Dillon wrote to him for the money, which he immediately sent without objection. He does not know what Mr. Hugh Crawford's belief was, farther than now appears from that gentleman's letter to Mr. Dillon. But the complainer has no reason to think that Mr. Hugh Crawford believed that he had made the purchase at the price of £74 9s. On the contrary, the complainer sees from the correspondence, that Mr. Hugh Crawford was informed by Mr. Dillon that the price was £95 9s., and that Mr. Hugh Crawford made no objection to that price or remark upon it.

8. The complainer did not see Mr. Dillon, or hear from Mr. Dillon, so far as he recollects, from the 17th of March, till after the bargain was completed. Mr. Dillon did state to the complainer, as above mentioned, that the price was £95 9s., and on the first demand the complainer sent him the money without objection.

9. The complainer has no doubt that Lord Eglinton's disposition was prepared after the 17th of March. But neither Mr. Dillon nor any other person made any communication to the complainer about the mode of preparing and executing that deed. He has no reason to doubt that it was subscribed by Lord Eglington upon the date it bears.

SCOTLAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

LACHLAN MACKINTOSH, Esq. of Raigmore,—Appellant; ALEXANDER MACKENZIE, Writer in Inverness,—Respondent [9th March, 1819].

[See McAulay v. McKenzie, 1830, 9 Shaw, 48; Harvey v. Swan, 1837, 16 ib. 249; Baillie v. Waddell, 1822, 1 ib. 368. Mackay, Pract. i. 296, 297. Henderson v. Warden, 1845, 17 Scot. Jur. 271; 6 Geo. IV. c. 23, s. 10; 1 and 2 Vict. c. 119, ss. 3, 4.]

By the common law of Scotland, as declared by an Act of Sederunt of the Court of Session, dated the 6th of March, 1783, sheriffs and judges of inferior courts are prohibited, under the pains of law for malversation in office, from acting as procurators in any cause depending before them, in their respective courts. But it seems that a prosecution can only be instituted against the offender with the concurrence of the Advocate-General, as public prosecutor; or, ex officio, by the superior court; whether a private person, who has suffered injury by the violation of the law, may proceed as for a private remedy—Quæry.

By an order of the Court of Session, dated the 6th of March, 1783, and entitled “An Act of Sederunt prohibiting inferior judges and their clerks from acting as procurators or agents before their respective Courts,” “The Lords of Council and Session considering that it is contrary to law, and subversive of the impartial administration of justice, for any judge to act as procurator or agent in any cause depending before his court; and as it is a similar abuse that any clerk of court, or his depute, having [273] trust and custody of processes and writs produced therein, and being employed in extracting of acts and decreets, should be agents or procurators in these processes; and having observed in the course of certain processes depending in this court, that such illegal and improper practices have prevailed in some of the inferior courts, and may prevail in others; the Lords therefore, to prevent such abuse in time to come, do hereby strictly prohibit and discharge all sheriff substitutes, magistrates of burghs, and other judges whatever, and the sheriff clerks, clerks to baillie courts, and other clerks of court within Scotland, and their deputies, not only from acting either directly by themselves, or indirectly by mediation of any confident persons, procurators or agents before their several courts, in any action or cause depending or to depend before them, but also from giving partial counsel or advice in any such action or causes; and that under the pains of law for malversation in office, excepting always herefrom petitions or applications for commitment. And they hereby appoint this act to be inserted in the books of Sederunt, and copies to be transmitted to each sheriff clerk, with injunctions that he affix the same in the most patent place of his office, and transmit a copy thereof to the clerk of each baillie court and other court within his jurisdiction, with the like injunctions to affix the same upon the most patent place of their respective offices, that all [274] concerned may be certiorate thereof, and that none may pretend ignorance.”

The sheriff depute of Inverness having appointed a sheriff substitute, in May, 1814, issued a commission, which, after stating the appointment of the grantor as sheriff depute, proceeds in the following terms: “And whereas I am sometimes necessarily absent, and that Thomas Gilzean, Esquire, my ordinary substitute, may happen to be necessarily absent and indisposed, or may be disqualified from his connection with the parties, or otherwise, from judging in some causes that may be brought before him; and as it is regular that a proper person should be named to act in my absence, or during the absence or indisposition of the said Thomas Gilzean as my substitute, in case of any emergency or other business that may occur as aforesaid; and I being well satisfied with the fidelity and capacity of Alexander Mackenzie *, Esquire, banker in Inverness, for exercising and discharging the trust, and that he is well affected to his Majesty's person and government: therefore witt ye me to have nominated, constituted, and appointed likeas I hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint the said Alexander Mackenzie to be one of my sheriff substitutes in the foresaid shire of Inverness, during my pleasure; and the absence, disqualification, or indisposition of the said Thomas Gilzean, with full power to him in my absence to hold courts, etc."

[275] This commission was dated the 12th May, and produced in court by Mr. Mackenzie on the 19th May, 1814, who qualified himself by taking the requisite oaths.

On the 20th and 26th of May, 1814, Mr. Mackenzie appeared as procurator for Mr. Robertson of Inches, upon the execution of a commission granted by the sheriff to the clerk of his court, to take a proof in a cause in which the appellant was a party adverse to Mr. Robertson, the client of Mr. Mackenzie.

In the course of the proceeding under the commission, the Appellant's agent applied to the commissioner, who was clerk to the Respondent, to adjourn the proof, on account of the Appellant's absence. That application was refused, owing to the influence, which, it was alleged, the Respondent had over his clerk the commissioner, and to the injury and loss of the Appellant.

He therefore presented to the second division of the Court of Session a petition and complaint founded upon the Act of Sederunt, before stated, praying that the Respondent might be found incapable of acting as sheriff substitute, and suspended from his office, and also that he should be found liable in such damages or other penalties for malversation, as the Court might think just.

The Respondent, by his answer to this petition and complaint, insisted on four objections, of which the two first only are material to be stated, as being the foundation of the judgment.

1. That the complaint was incompetent, as [276] presented without the concurrence of the procurator fiscal, or other public prosecutor.

2. That the Appellant had no title, even as a private prosecutor, to insist on such a complaint, inasmuch as he, having received no particular injury by the breach of the Act of Sederunt, had no peculiar interest to enforce the infliction of the penalties for its violation.

In support of those objections, the Respondent cited the following authorities: Hume on Crimes, vol. iii. pp. 185 and 198; Squire v. Steel, Fac. Coll. 10th Aug. 1765; Darby v. Love, 10th Feb. 1796.†

In reply to the first objection the Appellant cited the cases of Ritchie v. Siervewright, 4th Feb. [277] 1786; Murray v. Suter, 9th July, 1793 (not reported); Hawthorn v. Fraser, 14th Dec. 1799; and Seller and Thomson v. Duff and Bain, 11th Feb. 1809; in all which cases the complainers were private parties, procurators, or litigants, in the courts in which the accused persons illegally united the characters of clerk and agent, and they prosecuted exclusively on their own title, without the concurrence of any public prosecutor.

* The Respondent, who was also a writer.

† The two last were cases of prosecutions for fraudulent bankruptcies, at the instance of trustees for creditors. See Syme v. Murray, 19 January, 1810, where a complaint was instituted under the act 16 Geo. 2. c. 11. s. 26. which regulates the conduct of returning officers at elections in Scotland, and provides, that if the common clerk of a borough shall refuse to sign and seal a commission to the person elected a commissioner to serve in Parliament, by the majority of the magistrates, and town-council, or shall sign and seal a commission to any other person, he shall forfeit £500 sterling to the commissioner elect, to be recovered (s. 43. by summary complaint before the Court of Session, upon thirty days notice to the person complained of, etc.); and shall also suffer imprisonment for six months, and be disabled to hold the office, etc.

The Court at first refused to sustain the complaint, as not having the concurrence of the Advocate-General. The complaint was ultimately sustained, but only so far as related to the pecuniary penalty which was awarded to the complainer. See Burnett's Treatise on Various Branches of the Criminal Law of Scotland, p. 506. note.

With regard to the second objection, the absence of any legal interest to prosecute on the part of the appellant, the cases, Ritchie v. Sieweright, Barthorn v. Fraser, and Sellar v. Duff and Bain, were again cited for the Appellant. In all those cases the complainers were merely procurators or practitioners in the courts where the illegal combination of offices had taken place, without any pretence of peculiar interest in the observance of the Act of Sederunt, or of peculiar injury by its violation. In the case of Sellar and Thomson v. Duff and Bain, where the title was contested, the objection was founded upon the very circumstance of the complainers being procurators and not litigants, under which last character it seems to have been admitted as indisputable, that any party had a title to complain. In that case the complainers do not seem to have had that secondary interest arising from a professional connection with the clients against whom the parties accused acted as agents, as it appears from the pleadings in that case, "that they (the [278] complainers) did not state directly, that they were employed as agents in the causes in which, as they alleged, the Respondents acted as agents."

Yet, in that case, all objections to title were repelled.

The case of Murray v. Suter, decided on the 9th July, 1793 (not reported), was also cited. There the complainer, founding his application to the court on the Act of Sederunt, was a private litigant without any concurrence of a public prosecutor.

The Respondent in that case urged "that the complainer had no interest in the matter, because he was not a procurator." But the Court found the complainer entitled to damages and expenses, and besides inflicted a fine on the Respondent.

On this second point was also quoted Hume on Crimes, vol. i. p. 188.

On the 9th of March, 1815, the following judgment was pronounced in the Court below:

"The Lords having advised this petition and complaint, with the answers thereto, replies and duplies, find, that the complainer has not shewn any title to insist in this complaint, therefore they dismiss the same."

The Appellant brought the question again under the view of the Court by a reclaiming-petition, upon considering which, with answers for the Respondent, the Court adhered to the interlocutor [279] complained of, whereupon this Appeal was brought.

For the Appellants—Mr. Wetherell and Mr. Bligh. For the Respondents—the Solicitor General and Mr. W. Murray.*

For the Appellant, upon the two first points, the argument was to this effect. The law, as declared by the Act of Sederunt, seems to contemplate a civil remedy as well as a penal infliction: for the word damages is used together with the word penalties (Syme v. Murray, 1 Bl. p. 276). For the public security, both by the common law, and by the declaration of the Court, judges are prohibited to act as agents in any cause depending in their courts. This prohibition must have arisen from a well grounded apprehension of the propensity which judges infected with the zeal of agents must naturally feel to favour their clients. The characters are wholly incompatible. Suppose that in this or any other case no injury to the party could be proved, should it depend upon the accident, whether the party in the cause suffered injury, to give a character of criminality to an act which the law has positively forbidden and noted as criminal. Such a construction is contrary to the analogy of all penal laws. The object of this law is [280] to preserve purity in the administration of justice: the penalties, therefore, ought so to be directed and enforced as to deter a judge from placing himself in a situation in which he may be tempted to act partially, and violate the great duties of his office. When a judge becomes an agent in the cause, he must betray either his client or his oath. According to the construction now attempted, the law is supposed to be merely remedial, giving a private compensation to each individual suitor who might be injured, if he should, by good fortune, be able to prove the fact: and the reparation, upon this hypothesis, ought to be a payment to the party according to the amount of the injury. But here is .

* The question was decided both in the inferior and Appellate Court, upon the ground that the Appellant had no title to pursue, and could not proceed without the concurrence of the public prosecutor. The facts, therefore, and arguments upon the other points of the case, became immaterial, and are omitted.

solemn regulation of law made to secure the impartial administration of justice: ought this to be reduced in practice to a mere private remedy, by which a party injured might seek a reparation in damages at his peril? That the public prosecutor is not a necessary party, appears by the cases cited in the Court below (ante, pp. 276, 277). And although in some of these cases, procurators acting in the same court with the offender were the prosecutors, it is a libel on jurisprudence to imagine that such a law was made, not for the important and obvious purpose of preventing partiality and corruption in the seat of justice, but for the trifling or pernicious object of protecting agents and proctors against competition: that is, for the purpose of aiding a monopoly.

On the part of the Respondents it was argued—[281] 1. That the Appellant, having suffered no injury, could not have title to prosecute. 2. That if the Appellant had such title, the proceeding ought to have been in the name of the Advocate-General as public prosecutor: that the Act of Sederunt was only declaratory of a pre-existing law: that malversation was the offence contemplated by the Act of Sederunt. That in the case of Sievwright he was found guilty of malversation. Here was only one act charged of an equivocal nature, refusing to give time for the Appellant to appear at the proof under the commission. That might have been properly refused. The proceeding is of a criminal nature, and the party ought to have proceeded in the name of the Advocate-General.*

[282] The Court of Session has in some cases assumed a jurisdiction:† but the offence is of a public nature. The proof must be of malversation by acting at the same time, in the same cause, as judge and agent. In the commissions of oyer and terminer, etc. in England, practising barristers are included, and often try causes.

Reply. In such case they have nothing to do with the cause as counsel or agents.‡

* In England, all criminal proceedings are in the name of the King, but at the suit and under the direction of a private party. In cases of oppression, or a double proceeding, application may be made to the Attorney-General, and he, if he thinks fit, may direct a nolle prosequi to be entered on the roll, by which the proceedings are suspended. How far this is a discretionary power in the Attorney-General, and how far in particular crimes the undue exercise of discretion is controlled by the right of appeal, or other checks, are questions of great interest, but too large to be discussed in a note.

In Scotland, it seems to be held that no indictment can be sustained by a private party, without the concurrence of the King's Advocate. But it is said to be understood that the concurrence cannot be refused, and that the Advocate may be compelled to give it (how is not stated) in all cases where the complaint of the private party is founded on a known and relevant point of dittay, and as to which he has, primâ facie, a title to insist. It is allowed on the other hand, that the King's Advocate may refuse his concurrence in cases of an opposite description. See Burnett's Treatise on, etc. p. 306. The King's Advocate, according to this doctrine, must exercise a discretion. How it is to be controlled, or what appeal there may be against his decision, except by impeachment, quere. It is, however, more distinctly stated by the same author, that the King's Advocate cannot suspend the prosecution by a nolumus prosequi. To do so (and in proper cases to refuse his concurrence) is manifestly a denial of justice. See Burnett, p. 298.

† In the case of A. Ritchie, 29th June, 1798, upon a complaint against printers for giving a false account of proceedings in the court, concluding for damages to the complainer, and stating the offence as derogatory to the dignity of the court: it was said that the vindication of the Court belongs exclusively to the Advocate-General, or the Court itself; and the complaint was dismissed upon this among other grounds. See Burnett, p. 302.

‡ In the Court below, the case of Murray was cited on behalf of the defender: and on the part of the pursuer it was further argued, that the concurrence of the Advocate-General was not necessary, because the purpose of the proceeding was merely to enforce an Act of Sederunt published by the Court; and although this act may be merely declaratory of the former law, still it is the duty of the Court to enforce it. The judges undermentioned delivered their opinions to the following effect.

[283] Lord Redesdale.*—This is a question whether the Court of Session have done wrong in deciding [284] that there was no title in the Appellant. That Court cannot make an act criminal which is not so by the common law of Scotland. The Act of Sederunt recognizes the common law as the foundation of their Act, which Lord Glenlee.—The Act of Sederunt is applicable only to permanent judges; if it were otherwise, the inconveniency would be great. If it were applicable to occasional substitutions, what could be done in case of sudden emergencies, disqualifications of ordinary judges, etc.; for who else than a procurator so fit to be appointed? It must be a man of business; and a more proper person could not be chosen. And I believe this to be the universal practice. If he carried on business during the subsistence of such substitution, and in a process against the Complainer, then his title to complain would be undoubted; but this did not happen; and besides, I see no injury has been suffered; I am, therefore, inclined to dismiss the complaint.

Lord Robertson.—I agree, with regard to doubts on the title, with Lord Glenlee. The law of Scotland knows of no popular action against a judge. I agree also with his Lordship in thinking that the Complainer has no title; he must qualify an interest peculiar to himself: no such title, however, is alleged; he has no more than any other inhabitant of the county. And as to the case of Sellar, I have even very great doubts on the title of the Complainer, in that case. As to the merits, however, I differ from Lord Glenlee. There can be no doubt that substitution, granted merely for routine business, as signing warrants, etc. would not fall under the Act. But the substitution here complained of is of a very different nature: it is so broad, that if Mr. Gilzean were in any way incapacitated, the Defender may act; and it is not at this moment recalled or resigned. No man can act as judge and procurator in the same court; and, therefore, were the question to rest on the merits, I should be inclined to entertain the complaint; but only to the effect of giving the most lenient sentence, and should only go the length of the mere strict letter.

Lord Bannatyne.—The competency depends much on the fact. The Complainer has shown no action of his, wherein the defender acted both as judge and procurator; and there is nothing in the commission to prevent this also acting as procurator. The Court can take cognizance in the shape before us; they can do so at any time, ex officio. The Complainer has shown no title to complain; and I am, therefore, for dismissing the complaint.

Lord Justice Clerk.—On the title, I am clear that the Complainer has a good one. I am not in the least moved, as to the case of Murray, which related to statutory penalties. This Complainer only meant to enforce your Lordships' Act of Sederunt. There is no distinction as to the party complaining, whether litigant or procurator. The party here complaining has a positive interest, and is, undoubtedly, entitled to complain, and has fully more interest than a procurator. It gives me a good title to complain, if a judge shall act against me in any cause, in the same court, because of influence, etc.; and he has, therefore, as tangible a title as can be conceived. The case of Murray, alluded to, does not apply. On the merits, the question is, Has there been a violation of the Act of Sederunt? There is no doubt that the great object of the Act was to affect the existing and permanent judges. It would be an odious practice, in any process depending before a court, to permit the judge, in any case, to act as agent. The question here is, whether this substitution be within the scope of the act. Now I agree with Lord Robertson, that this is not a limited substitution, but a general one, enabling Mr. Mackenzie to act in every case, in certain circumstances, viz. absence, indisposition, or disqualification. Now this word, "disqualification," is very important in judging of the nature of the substitution; for if a permanent substitute may even now be in that predicament, in a process at his own instance, or in behalf of the numerous constituents for whom Mr. Gilzean acts; so that Mr. Mackenzie will be entitled to judge in cases, even after Mr. Gilzean's return; and I am, therefore, clear that the substitution is neither sopite nor recalled; at least, of recall there is no evidence. Is this decent? I am not prepared to say that the Complainer is not entitled to have the substitution recalled; being clearly within the made the law more public; and it is again recognized more fully in [285] one of the cases which have been cited. The Act of Sederunt prohibits inferior judges to act as procurators, or agents, before their respective courts; and considering it, as they by their act declare it to be, an abuse, "contrary to law, and subversive of the impartial administration of justice, for any judge to act as procurator, or agent, in any cause depending before his court, and having observed that such illegal and improper practices had prevailed in some of the inferior courts, and might prevail in others; to prevent such abuse in time to come, they strictly prohibit all sheriffs substitute from acting, directly or indirectly, before their several courts, in any cause depending before them."

Whether the act done by Mr. Mackenzie comes within the prohibition, is not now to be discussed here; because the Court below have only considered the question, whether the Appellant was intitled to sue. In the cases cited, the Court does seem to have acted on petition and complaint, without the concurrence of the public prosecutor. But in all those cases, the Court acted under circumstances which brought the matter before them quasi ex officio.

It is not customary, in proposing to affirm a judgment, to go, at large, into the reasons for affirmance; and, unless some Lord differs from me, I shall propose to find that the decision of the Court of Session is not wrong, finding, as I do, that the judges of the Court of Session, having the cases before them, have paid no regard to them. I agree that the appointment of a person, known [286] to be acting as agent, to be sheriff's substitute, was highly improper. It is a practice which ought not to be continued. It may lead to great inconveniences, to speak of it in the mildest terms. But as all the judges agree that if the complaint had been entertained, they should have inflicted a slight punishment, it is not worth while to reverse the judgment.

There is, however, so much in the case, that I cannot recommend to the House to give costs for Mr. Mackenzie, although, by this judgment, he is absolved.*

spirit of the act. If a special substitution be necessary, it should not be given to an agent.

However, I conceive, that if the complaint is to be entertained, the slightest possible judgment should be given.

* By the act 20 Geo. 2. c. 43. for abolishing heritable jurisdictions in Scotland, the appointment of sheriffs of counties and stewartries, heritable, or for life, and their jurisdictions, etc. was taken away from subjects, and resumed and annexed to the crown, and by sect. 29. it was enacted, that there should be but one sheriff or steward depute, in each county, etc. in Scotland, to be appointed by the King, after seven years from the date of the Act, ad vitam aut culpam; and to every such sheriff depute is given power to appoint one or more sheriffs substitute to act during his pleasure.

The sheriffs depute and their substitutes have, by the law of Scotland, very large jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, including the trial of almost every species of crime, and of the most important civil causes. See Ersk. Inst. b. i. t. 4. ss. 3, 4, et seq.

The rule, therefore, which prohibits their acting as agents, is of much greater importance than in England, where the sheriff has a very limited jurisdiction. But even here the law has provided (1 Hen. 5. c. 4.) that no under-sheriff, sheriff's clerk, receiver, or bailiff, shall practise as an attorney, in the King's courts, during the time when he is in office with any sheriff.

This statute is evaded by practising in the name of other attorneys, or by putting in sham deputies as nominal under-sheriffs; a practice which excited the indignation of Dalton. See Blac. Com. i. 345.

SCOTLAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

Major General JOHN HUGHES, and Sir HEW DALRYMPLE HAMILTON, Baronet,—Appellants: WILLIAM GORDON, Esq. of Milrig,—Respondent.
[25th March, 1819].

[Cited in Dobbie v. Duncanson, 1872, 10 Macph. 810, at p. 814; discussed in Brownlie v. Miller, 1878, 5 Rettie, 1076, at p. 1083.]

THE sale of a superiority* of a forty-shilling land, of old extent, with warrantice, does not necessarily imply a warranty of a freehold qualification.

IN an action where the summons concludes for peaceable enjoyment of lands sold, with warrantice, or damages, in case of eviction, it is in form and substance an action upon the warrantice: and unless the pursuer proves that he is evicted of something expressed, or necessarily implied, in the warrantice, he cannot recover in that form of action.

AN offer, by the defender, to meet the plaintiff in another action, if he amends his pleading, is not a waiver of the form.

A conveyance, referring to letters of a preceding treaty, but not specifying what letters, is too uncertain to incorporate the letters, and make them part of the final contract.

SUCH letters cannot be used in evidence, to explain the contract, by showing what was intended to be part of the sale and purchase, although not expressed in the conveyance.

The Appellant was proprietor of the estate of Milrig, held of the crown, and estimated a 60s. land of old extent. The Appellant entered into a treaty with Mr. Charles Stewart, writer to the signet, who acted for the Respondent for the sale [288] of Milrig; and the parties having at last come to an agreement for the sale of this estate, with the exception of the superiority of a part called the twenty-shilling land of Millside, regular instruments of obligation of feu of the part of which the superiority was to be retained, and disposition of the remaining part, were duly executed by the Appellant, and also by Sir Hew Dalrymple Hamilton and John Barnes, Esquire, now deceased, as trustees for Mrs. Hughes, whose provisions under marriage contract were secured upon the estate of Milrig. The instrument of agreement or obligation is in these words: "Know all men by these presents, that I, Lieutenant Colonel John Hughes, of Milrig, heritable proprietor of the lands and others underwritten, with the special advice and consent of Sir Hew Hamilton Dalrymple of Bargany and North Berwick, Baronet, and John Barnes of Lausdowne-place, in the county of Middlesex, Esquire, trust-disponees of me the said John Hughes, conform to disposition by me in their favour, in trust for behoof of Mrs. Hamilla Hamilton, my spouse, and the other purposes therein mentioned, dated the 22d July, 1802, upon which they stand infeft, conform to instrument of sasine, dated 1st, and registered in the general register of sasines, the 15th September thereafter; and we the said Sir Hew Dalrymple Hamilton and John Barnes, for all right which we have to the lands and others underwritten, at present or upon the decease of the said John Hughes, in virtue of the foresaid disposition and infeftment, considering that by [289] missives of sale of different dates, I the said John Hughes sold to William Gordon, Esquire, some time senior judge at Arnee in the East Indies, the forty-shilling land of Milrig, and twenty-shilling land of Millside of old extent, with the teinds and pertinents at the price of £13,125 sterling, by which missives it was agreed that I the said John Hughes should retain the superiority of the said whole lands, in which I stand publicly infeft until Michaelmas 1808, at which time I became bound to denude of the superiority thereof, excepting the twenty-shilling land of old extent of Millside, so far as regards the superiority thereof which was to remain in my person, and the property thereof was to be held feu of me and my successors: and whereas the parties hereto have of even date with these presents executed a feu right and disposition of the said whole lands in favour of the said William Gordon for payment of the feu-duties therein specified, in consideration of payment of and security for the said sum of £13,125 as the price of said lands in manner therein mentioned, and that it is proper we should grant the obligation underwritten, as to the superiority of the said forty-shilling land of Milrig: therefore we hereby bind and oblige ourselves, for our several rights and interests foresaid, and our heirs and successors, at and against the term of Michaelmas, 1808, to make, execute, and deliver to the said William Gordon, his heirs or assignees, at our expense, a formal, valid, and effectual disposition in his and their favour, of all and whole the said forty-shilling [290] land of Milrig of old extent, comprehending as parts of the same, the lands of Milrig-hill, with houses and pertinents of the same, excepting the privilege of pasturage on the common of Galston, lying within the barony of Riccarton, bailiary of Kyle-stewart and shire of Ayr, as the same are described in the public rights of said lands: which disposition shall contain procuratory of resignation, precept of sasine, clause of absolute warrandice on the part of me the said John Hughes, and from fact and deed on the part of us the said trustees, with an assignation to the clause of warrandice in the trust deed in our favour, assignation to writs and evidents, and to the feu duties and casualties of superiority and other clauses in common form; and also a clause excepting from said disposition, the feu-right of the said forty-shilling land and others, as contained in our foresaid feu disposition in favour of the said William Gordon: which disposition shall be so granted by us at the term foresaid, under the penalty of £100 sterling to be paid by us to the said William Gordon, or his foresaids, in case of our not granting the same, over and above performance."

The feu right* and disposition of the superiority are agreeable to this obligation. The disposition is in the names of the same parties, and after reciting the obligation it proceeds: "Therefore we have sold and disposed, as we do hereby, for all right we or any of us have or can pretend in the premises, sell, alienate, and dispose from us [291] our heirs and successors, to and in favour of the said William Gordon, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably all and whole the forty-shilling land of Milrig of old extent, comprehending as parts of the same the lands of Milrig-hill, with houses and pertinents of the same, excepting the privilege of pasturage on the common of Galston, together with the teinds, parsonage, and vicarage of the said lands lying within the barony of Riccarton, bailiary of Kyle-stewart, and shire of Ayr, together with all right, title, and interest, claim of right, property, and possession, as well petitory as possessory, which we or any of us, our predecessors, authors, heirs, and successors have, had, or can anyways claim or pretend thereto, in all time coming; in which lands, teinds, and others above disposed, we bind and oblige ourselves and our foresaids to infest and seise the said William Gordon."

The procuratory of resignation is conformable to this disposition.

The clause of warrandice is thus expressed: "Which lands and others above disposed, with this right and disposition of the same, and infestment to follow hereon, we bind and oblige ourselves for our several rights and interests before written, to warrant to the said William Gordon and his foresaids as follows; videlicet, I the said John Hughes oblige myself and my foresaids to warrant the same to be free of all burdens and incumbrances, and grounds of eviction whatever, at all hands and against all deadly as [292] law will; and we the said Sir Hew Dalrymple Hamilton and John Barnes, as trustees foresaid, do oblige ourselves to warrant these presents from our own facts and deeds only; and further we hereby assign and make over to the said William Gordon, and his foresaids, the clause of absolute warrandice contained in the foresaid trust disposition in our favour, excepting always from this warrandice the feu right and disposition before

* The statement of this instrument is omitted, as being immaterial to the point in question.

mentioned of the property of the said lands of Milrig and others granted by us to the said William Gordon as aforesaid."

The Respondent, in 1812, for the first time, claimed to be admitted upon the roll of freeholders for the county of Ayr, at their Michaelmas Head Court, held upon the 6th of October, 1812; and in evidence of the old extent of the lands upon which his claim of inrolment was made, he produced an extract from the records of Chancery, of a retour of the service of Alexander Nisbet, of Greenholm, as nearest lawful heir of Margaret Nisbet, his mother, inter alia, in the forty-shilling land of Milrig, therein retoured to be a forty-shilling land of old extent, expedie before the sheriff of Ayr, on the 25th of December, 1578.

By the titles and documents then produced, the Respondent's qualification, as a freeholder, was held to have been sufficiently established, and he was accordingly admitted to the roll; but at the meeting for electing a commissioner to serve in Parliament, held upon the 23d of the same month of October, an objection to the Respondent's vote [293] was stated, on the part of Sir Andrew Cathcart, of Carleton, Baronet, founded upon an allegation that the document preserved in Chancery, as the warrant of the record of the retour of the service of Alexander Nisbet, in the forty-shilling land of Milrig, in that office, was not an authentic or probative retour. This objection was repelled by the Court of Freeholders; but a petition and complaint was presented, in the name of Sir Andrew Cathcart, to the First Division of the Court of Session, praying that, upon the ground above alluded to, the Respondent should be found not to have produced proper and sufficient evidence of the old extent of his lands, and that his name should be ordered to be expunged from the roll.

Of these proceedings the Appellants were apprised, by an instrument of protest, in the name of the Respondent, which was immediately followed by the execution of a summons, in an action of warrandice against them. In this action, however, no farther proceedings were taken until after the issue of the complaint, at the instance of Sir Andrew Cathcart, which terminated in a judgment of finding "That Mr. Gordon was not entitled, in virtue of his titles produced, to be enrolled in the roll of freeholders for the shire of Ayr." This judgment appears to have proceeded upon the ground that the registration of the retour, above alluded to in the books of Chancery, was liable to challenge, and that the document exhibited by the clerks of Chancery as the warrant of registration, did not appear to be either an original retour, or a duly authenticated [294] copy of such retour. Having been thus removed from his place on the roll of freeholders, until he should be able to establish, by better evidence, the old extent of his lands, the Respondent began to move in the action which he had previously instituted against the Appellants.

The summons, in this action, proceeds upon a narrative of the transactions between the Respondent and Appellants, and particularly upon a recital of the deeds of conveyance executed in favour of the former; consisting, in the first place, of the disposition of the whole lands to be held in feu of the granters; secondly, of the obligation to convey at a certain subsequent term, the superiority of that part of the lands called Milrig and Milrig-hill; and thirdly, the disposition and conveyance of that superiority in terms of the previous obligation. This last is the deed mainly founded on, and from that deed the clause of warrandice, already quoted, is given as the basis of the action. The summons then proceeds to narrate the history of the Respondent's inrolment, and the nature and grounds of the complaint against that inrolment, which was then in dependence; and upon these premises the summons proceeds to aver, that "in the bargain between the said John Hughes and William Gordon, for the purchase of the said lands of Milrig, it was stipulated as aforesaid, that the said William Gordon was to have a freehold qualification at Michaelmas, 1808, and in terms of the obligation before recited, and disposition granted by the said John Hughes, Sir Hew Dalrymple Hamilton, and John Barnes, they, for their respective interests, [295] are liable in warrandice of the said disposition, and are bound to free and relieve the pursuer of all risk and consequences of the petition and complaint before mentioned, and of any decree or act and warrant to be pronounced in the same," etc. The summons concludes alternately, that the Appellants should maintain the pursuer in the peaceable possession of the said freehold qualification, "or otherwise, and in case of eviction of the said freehold qualification and right of voting, as aforesaid, by any decret or act, and warrant, to follow and be pronounced in the foresaid petition and complaint, the said defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £1000 sterling, as the price and value of the said freehold qualification, with the legal interest thereof, from the date of eviction, by any decret or act, and warrant, to be pronounced in the foresaid petition and complaint: as also to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £500 sterling, in name of damages, and by way of recompence for the loss sustained by the pursuer through the said eviction, and in solatium of the detriment arising from the loss of the pursuer's vote and right of electing at the said election meeting; together with the expences incurred, or to be incurred, by the pursuer, in the said petition and complaint." etc.

The following defences were stated by the Appellants:—"None of the writings founded on in the summons of this action have been produced, and until they are seen, the defenders cannot [296] know whether by their terms they afford any ground for the pursuer's conclusions. From the pursuer's own shewing, however, it would appear that he made a slump bargain of the property as well as the superiority of Milrig, and that no warrandice was undertaken by General Hughes, that the superiority afforded a freehold qualification, but only that the superiority truly belonged to him, which is not disputed, no eviction of the superiority having taken place, or even been threatened. In point of fact, General Hughes is conscious that he never meant to undertake any warrandice of a freehold qualification; and that if such a thing had been required of him in the course of the transaction, he would rather have been off from the bargain than agreed to it. If, therefore, there is any thing in the writings referred to in the summons importing such warrandice, it must have crept in per incuriam, and was not pars contractus between the parties.

"As to the other defenders, Sir Hew Hamilton and Mr. Barnes, nothing is stated in the summons that can implicate them in the alleged warrandice. They are merely said to have warranted from their own facts and deeds; and as no breach of this is alleged, they will fall to be immediately assoilzied and found entitled to their expences."

This action came before Lord Glenlee, Ordinary, and his Lordship on hearing parties appointed the case to be stated to the Court in mutual informations.

In the information for the Respondent in the [297] court below, certain letters of treaty preliminary to the conveyances were offered to prove an obligation by the Appellants to convey and warrant, not only the lands and superiority, or crown vassalage of Milrig, but absolutely a freehold qualification in the county of Ayr. The Appellants denied that these letters were admissible evidence in the case after the execution of formal instruments; and they also pleaded that if they had been admissible, they did not prove the obligation alleged by the Respondent.

The second division of the Court of Session pronounced the following interlocutor: "Upon report of Lord Glenlee, and having advised the informations for the parties, the Lords repel the defences proponed; find it relevant to diminish the price of the lands, that it was intended by the parties that the lands should entitle the purchaser to a qualification as a freeholder, affording a right to vote at elections; ordain the pursuer to give in within ten days, a pointed condescendence of the amount of diminution of price demanded by him, as well as of the damages concluded for, and reserve consideration of the conclusion for expences till the issue of the principal cause."

In consequence of this interlocutor, various proceedings* took place in the Court below, to ascertain the value of the freehold qualification in [298] dispute, and the expences incurred by the Respondent in the proceedings against him in the Freeholders' Court and Court of Session, upon the subject of his right to vote and remain upon the roll of freeholders.

Upon these points the Court pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lords

* These proceedings are not stated, because the question which gave rise to them became immaterial by the judgment of the House of Lords upon the preliminary question of right upon the terms of the contract.

having resumed consideration of the cause, and advised the condescendence and additional condescendence for the pursuer, with answers thereto, decern against the defender for payment of £538 l. 8s. 4d. sterling, as the amount of diminution of price, to which the pursuer is entitled in terms of the judgment of the Court, with legal interest of the same, from and after the 3d March 1813, as the date of eviction, also for payment of £167 l. 8s. 3d. sterling, being the amount of the expence incurred by the pursuer in maintaining his title as a freeholder against the challenge of Sir Andrew Cathcart: find the defenders liable in expences, subject to modification, and remit to the auditor to report on the account thereof when lodged; and quoad ultra assolvie the defenders from the conclusions of the libel and decern."

Against these several interlocutors an appeal was presented to the House of Lords, and on 23d March, 1819, came on to be argued.

For the Appellants—the Solicitor General and Mr. Lumsden. For the Respondents—Mr. Wetherell and Mr. Abercrombie.

[299] Two principal questions were argued.

1. Upon the question as to the admissibility of the preliminary correspondence as evidence on the part of the Respondent, Stair's Inst. Tit. Probation, Clinan v. Cooke, Scho. and Lef. Rep. vol. i. p. 22; and Wiglesworth v. Dallison, Doug. Rep. p. 206, were cited; and it was compared to the cases of latent ambiguity, where parol and external written evidence has been admitted to explain a deed.* Upon the general question, Hughes v. Gordon, decided in the Court of Session before the Second Division in the year 1811, was cited.

2. Upon the question whether the contract implied a warrandice, it was said the parties agreed to sell and to buy the lands of Milrig, both parties understanding that the 40s. land had the quality of affording Mr. Gordon a title to be inrolled as a freeholder, and both understanding it on grounds equally known to both, viz. the actual enrolment and the title-deeds.

For the Appellants the arguments were thus stated:—

There is no reason to doubt, that de facto the crown-vassal in the 40s. land of Milrig had been [300] a freeholder in virtue of his right to these lands, from the very commencement of such freehold rights. The lands had afforded a freehold qualification during the possession by the Appellant General Hughes, since he actually stood enrolled on these lands. It continued for three years and more after the sale and disposition to the Respondent, and till after the Respondent too was enrolled, when an objection was stated. The objection was not that the lands were not truly 10s. lands of old extent, and therefore substantially sufficient to confer title to a vote. But it was this, that the extract of the retour of the lands of Milrig, which purported to be taken from a writing held to be a retour about the end of the 16th century, had now for the first time been discovered to have been taken from a writing of that period, but which was not a regular retour. In this way, the existing evidence of the old extent of Milrig which had supported the vote on these lands from time immemorial, happened on the fourth year of the Respondent's possession of these lands, to be destroyed by an investigation, which the dilatory and imprudent conduct of the Respondent, in waiting for years, till the eve of a general election, before he claimed enrolment, had occasioned.

It cannot constitute a case of eviction or of warrandice, either express or implied, for it is clear that there was no eviction of any subject whatever by any person; and it is equally clear, that the mere fact of parties believing a subject to have any quality, would not constitute warrandice, even although it never had such quality at all; [301] otherwise actions of warrandice would be infinite; for there always are prevalent opinions as to the qualities of subjects sold which turn out to be erroneous. Far less, however, could a claim of warrandice arise, when the subject did possess that

* On this point, see Baumont v. Field, 1 Barnwell and Alderson's Reports, 207, which was a case of letters written upon a previous treaty, and admitted to explain a deed.

The deed in that case purported to convey coal mines by a certain description; and there were no mines corresponding to the description. So in this case, if the disposition had professed to convey, or the warrandice had included a freehold qualification by an erroneous or mistaken description, the letters might have been held admissible.

quality as believed by both parties, and by a subsequent accident, which neither could foresee, was afterwards found to want evidence to support the claim. This was a case of periculum rei venditae et traditae. The subject was sold by the Appellant to the Respondent, with a supposed quality, without any express warrantice of this quality: and nothing was said or done by the Appellants, to which the belief of the Respondent that the subject was so qualified can be attributed. After three years, an incidental discovery is made, and the quality perishes. This seems no more the ground of claim against the seller, than if a volcano had burst out from under the lands, or if they had sunk into a gulph. Though these catastrophes had been prepared by the operation of centuries, yet no claim would on that account have existed against the seller, who never could be construed to warrant the duration of the subject sold, in all its value against innumerable accidents. It may be asked where the claim could stop? The date of the retour was about the end of the 16th century. Since that time the lands may have passed through twenty hands, by similar bargains. With whom is the responsibility to rest? Prescription cannot operate; it never does operate in cases of eviction and warrantice, except from the date of the eviction or breach of war-[302]-ranchise. The claim then must run back to the date of the retour, and be handed from purchaser to purchaser, till it reaches that period. Supposing the lands to have been sold by A. B. in 1599, and that A. B. had heirs at this day, would they be liable in warrantice? Yet on what principle could the burden be laid on any intermediate possessor? Another case may be put:—Suppose the lands had been sold as a forty-shilling land while both the parties understood that there was no vote on them. Suppose then, that a retour had by accident been found, could the Appellant, General Hughes, have brought a claim of any kind against the Respondent? Surely not. The answer would have been, that this was an accession rei venditae et traditae, to which the buyer was fully entitled; and if the Appellant, General Hughes, had pretended to push his claim, he would have been told, that the lands might have passed through many hands while this capacity of accidental improvement existed, and that he must blame his own bad fortune or negligence that the lucky accident did not happen in his time. But the very same argument applies in the converse case. The retour has accidentally been found to be irregular while the estate is held by the Respondent. It must equally follow, that the Respondent must bear this accidental diminution of value, as enjoy an accidental increase. Cujus est commodum ejus debet esse incommodum.

For the Respondent were cited the cases of Wilson v. the Creditors of Auchinleck, Nov. 11, 1764, Dict. of Decis. vol. iv. p. 210; (in which [303] the purchasers at a judicial sale were allowed a restitution of one fourth of the price of the teinds; the whole of which they had bought and paid for with the lands; it having been discovered after the sale that one fourth of the teinds did not belong to the bankrupt, but to the crown:;) M'Lean v. M'Neil, Fac. Coll. June 28, 1757; (in which it was found relevant to diminish the price of lands, that it was intended by the parties that the lands should entitle the purchaser to a qualification as a freeholder having right to vote at elections*;) and Edwards v. M'Leay, Cowper's Rep. p. 308.

* The facts of this case were thus stated by the appellant's counsel from the Sessions papers. Two parcels of lands were sold to M'Neil by minute expressly describing each of them as separately a two merk land of old extent, and over and above this, it was not only the understanding of the parties, but distinctly expressed between them, that the lands did afford a vote in the county, and were bought with a particular view to that quality. In truth, however, the lands taken together, were only a two and a half merk land, and for that reason, did not afford a vote. It was a long time before M'Neil, the buyer, made up his titles. In doing that he found out the fact, and it did not appear possible that the error could have been innocent on the part of the seller. Having found this out, M'Neil appears to have resisted payment of the price, and M'Lean's heir brought an action against him. M'Neil pleaded alternately, that he was entitled either to rescind the sale or have a deduction from the price; and he aided this plea by very strong allegations, and proofs of wilful deceit in M'Lean. M'Lean's heir, the pursuer, attempted to defend himself, on the plea, that the lands being or not being of four merks of old extent, and affording or not affording a vote, was not in law a valuable or estimable quality. The first interlocutor by Lord Drumore, Ordinary, upon the merits, is dated Feb. 22, 1754. In it the Lord Ordinary finds "the allegation made by the defender, that it was actum et pactatum betwixt him and the deceased Lochbuy and his interdictors, at the time of executing the minute of sale, that they should dispose to the defender such an estate as would entitle him to vote for a member of Parliament in that county, neither competent to be proven by the interdictor's oath, nor relevant to resolve the sale or abate the price, in respect the defender does not qualify any damage he sustains by the want of such vote; and allows the defender's procurator to see the writs produced for instructing that the incumbences are purged."

This interlocutor was adhered to by refusing a petition for McNeil, the defender. The defender presented a second reclaiming petition, which was remitted to the Lord Ordinary, (Lord Kames, Lord Drumore having died.) It appears that the pursuer, at advising the last reclaiming petition, had made an offer of taking back the lands. To which the defender's counsel had stated, they were not instructed to make an answer at that time. With this the cause went to the Lord Ordinary. Before the Lord Ordinary the defender's counsel appear to have signified their acceptance of the pursuer's offer; but by this time the pursuer had changed his mind, and refused to adhere to his offer. Upon this the defender again petitioned the Court against the former interlocutor, in respect the pursuer had refused to take back his lands, and because the Lord Ordinary had refused to judge in that matter. This petition was answered. In the answers the pursuer pleaded res judicata, and maintained that he had eight interlocutors in his favour, and that the cause was finally decided. Upon this petition and answers an interlocutor was pronounced, which is the interlocutor quoted in the report as a final one. It is in these words: "The Lords find it relevant to diminish the price of the lands; that it was intended by the parties that the lands should entitle the purchaser to a qualification as a freeholder having right to vote at elections." But this interlocutor was not final. On the contrary, a petition was presented for McLean's heir of this date. The petition was answered. This case was not decided upon this petition and answers; but memorials were ordered upon a point, whether a retour in 1609 shewed the value of the lands to have been four marks. The Appellants have not been able to discover the final judgment. But there appear to have been memorials given in. That for McNeil is dated Jan. 5, 1758, and that for McLean, Feb. 6, 1758.—The following passages in the papers will shew the nature of the facts and pleadings in the case.—In the answers Aug. 5, 1757, by the defender, McNeil, are the following passages:—"Want of qualification implies a fraud on the part of the seller, as he must have known the defect at the time of the bargain; and as this defect existed from the very beginning it could not arise from the purchase, nor could be supplied with regard to the subjects sold."

"The last observation in the petition, that in fact the lands of Ardlussa and Knockintavel, are part of the barony of Moy, which, by an old retour in 1609, is valued at eighty merks of old extent, and that if this old extent was divided, a proportion of four merks would belong to the lands of Ardlussa and Knockintavel, which, as the law stood at the time of the purchase, would entitle to a vote, is clearly founded upon a wilful mistake as to the import of this retour. Though it is true that in the valent, it is said, 'Quod omnes et singulæ superscriptæ terræ, etc. tempore pacis valuerunt octogentas mercas,' yet when the particular description of the lands in the retour is adverted to, those in question are thus described: 'Terris duarum mercatorum terrarum et dimidiata terrarum de Ardlussa et Knockintavel in insula de juray;' so that here the particular proportion of the old extent belonging to these lands is expressly described and specified in the retour."

In the memorial for McNeil, Feb. 6, 1758, are the following passages: "In the sequel it shall be made appear that this false description could not possibly have proceeded from error and mistake."

After saying that the lands are falsely described, it proceeds: "For the Defender is now in condition to aver, that from the examination made of all the title-deeds produced for Lochbuy, conceived in favour of his predecessors, from the earliest period down to this day, this description is not to be found in any one of them. They were neither described in any of these title-deeds, as a four merk land, nor as of any old extent whatever. On the contrary, your Lordships will observe, from what is now called the retour 1699, and from another retour in 1615, that they are described to be but a two and a half merk land, without the least mention of old extent:" "and therefore the defender must be pardoned to insist that when the aforesaid false description was for the first time assumed in this minute of sale, res ipsa loquitur, these false colours were hung out purposely, and of design, to deceive and impose upon the defender, and to induce him to give so much a higher price, upon the supposition that, being truly of that extent, they entitled to the qualification of a freehold in the county.

[305] The objection to the form of proceeding as stated by Lord Robertson, is that the present [306] action rests entirely upon the warranty. Whether the objection to

"And that this must have been the case will further appear to your Lordships, from the disposition granted by John M'Lean of Lochbuy to Lauchlan M'Lean his son, no farther back than the 18th of Jan. 1733, of the whole lands and barony of Lochbuy, which was but four years prior to the minute of sale, in which disposition the lands of Ardlussa and Knockintavel are especially described as a two and a half merk land, without the addition of old extent. And it is from hence submitted to your Lordships, what possible excuse can be offered for so material a variation in the description of these lands assumed by the said John and Lauchlan M'Lean in the minute of sale, 1737?

"But neither is this all. It further appears, that the same Lauchlan M'Lean in the year 1742, which was but five years posterior to the minute of sale, did execute a disposition to these very lands to himself in life-rent, and to Hector M'Lean his son in fee, under the description of the two and a half merk land of Ardlussa and Knockintavel, without the addition of old extent: and the after titles to these lands are made up under this last description. So that, from first to last, except in this single instance of the aforesaid minute of sale, these lands had never received, in any one of the title-deeds, any other description, but that of a two and a half merk land, without the addition of the words of old extent. How then this description came to be varied in the minute of sale, and these lands to be therein set forth and described as a four merk land of old extent, will require some better apology than has yet been attempted, to induce a belief that this was not done of design and intention to increase the value and price of the lands at the sale."

From these passages, and from the interlocutors coupled with the defective report, it was contended to be quite clear, 1mo. That there was a deficiency of a subject expressly mentioned in the minute of sale, i.e. conveyed and warranted in the minute of sale, viz. the old extent of the lands: and that it was in consequence of this deficiency the lands did not afford a vote. 2do. That there were strong allegations and apparent evidence of wilful deceit by the seller. 3tio. That after all it does not appear that the claim of McNeil was ultimately sustained.

In the court below, and slightly also in the arguments upon the Appeal, a point of Scotch pleading was discussed, viz. whether the actio quanti minoris, i.e. for compensation or reparation in damages, on account of a latent insufficiency or defect of the subject of purchase can be sustained, except in cases of fraud.

For the Defender upon this point, the cases of Hannay, 26th Jan. 1785, and Hughes v. Gordon, 1811, were cited. For the Pursuer, the following authorities were cited: Stair, i. 9. 10. b. i. 14. 1.; Bank, i. 9. 2. i. 11-15; Ersk. iii. 3. 10, as explained by iii. 3. 9.; 23d June, 1757, Macneil v. Maclean; 26th Jan. 1785, Hannay v. Creditors of Bargally; 13th Feb. 1782, Lloyds v. Paterson; 23d Jan. 1801, Gray v. Hamilton. It was also argued, that the Appellant, the Defender in the Court of Session, had waived the objection to the informality of the pleading, by a passage in his information, by which he submitted, that "If the Court should be of opinion that the Pursuer was intitled, without any amendment of his libel, to change entirely the grounds of his action, and to substitute an action quanti minoris, for an action of warraudice, the Defender was ready to meet him."

See the argument and the opinions of the judges, Fac. Coll. June 15, 1815.

the form of proceeding has been [307] waived by the defender's answer to the information, is a question to be considered. If that [308] were decided in the affirmative, a further question arises, viz. whether there is in the disposition a sufficient reference to incorporate the letters, and enable the Respondent to proceed upon them. The letters undoubtedly import, that in the contemplation of the parties, the property carried a freehold qualification. That could hardly be otherwise; for the vender was then a freeholder entered and standing upon the roll.

Upon the question as to the form of action, it is necessary to attend to the words of the conclusion of the summons: "or otherwise, and in case of eviction, etc. to pay the price, etc. and damages of £500." The satisfaction in value is claimed distinctly for eviction, and the damages also for injury sustained by eviction.

The information for General Hughes objects to the form of action. The Respondent is thereby challenged to amend his pleading in order to raise the question; but he has made no amendment.

At the conclusion of the arguments (March 25, 1819), Lord Redesdale delivered his opinion to the following effect:

The first interlocutor finds it relevant to diminish [309] the price of the lands: that it was intended, by the parties, that the lands should entitle the purchaser to a qualification as a freeholder, affording a right to vote at elections. The second interlocutor decerns, that the defender (Appellant) is to pay £—— as the amount of diminution of price, to which the pursuer (the Respondent) is entitled, with interest, expenses, and costs. The proceedings in this case were founded on a transaction between General Hughes and Mr. Gordon for purchase. After much correspondence, they came to an agreement, and conveyances were executed in pursuance of the agreement. The form of action is unquestionably of warrandice. The summons, reciting the agreement, states that it was carried into execution, by conveyances, (for the sum of £——) of the lands of Milrig, etc. with absolute warrandice, on which the pursuer was infest. The obligation proceeds upon the narrative, that it was agreed Hughes should retain the superiority until Michaelmas, 1808, etc. Two dispositions were made, because the lands were immediately conveyed; but as to the superiority, part was to remain with the Appellant, and other part was to be conveyed to Mr. Gordon; and it was understood that the superiority would convey the right of voting. The procuratory of resignation is consonant to the previous disposition, and the clause of warrandice is thus expressed: "Which lands, and others above disposed, with the right and disposition of the same, and infestment to follow thereon, we bind and oblige ourselves, for our several rights and interests before written, to warrant to the said William Gordon, and his [310] foresaids, as follows, videlicet, 1. the said John Hughes, oblige myself and my foresaids to warrant the same to be free of all burdens and incumbrances, and grounds of eviction whatever, at all hands, and against all deadly as law will: and we, the said Sir Hew Dalrymple Hamilton and John Barnes, as trustees foresaid, do oblige ourselves to warrant these presents from our own facts and deeds only; and further, we hereby assign and make over to the said William Gordon, and his foresaids, the clause of absolute warrandice, contained in the foresaid trust disposition, in our favour; excepting always from this warrandice the feu right and disposition before-mentioned of the property of the said lands of Milrig, and others, granted by us to the said William Gordon, as aforesaid." The summons proceeds to state that Gordon was infest; and that an extract of the retour was delivered among the title deeds. The right of voting was not made out by Mr. Gordon, and his name was expunged from the roll. He had called on Hughes to appear and defend him from eviction. The summons concludes that defenders are liable in warrandice, etc.; that the value of the freehold qualification is £1000, and concludes also for damages, all which is required, in consequence of the warrandice of the disposition being incurred. The summons demands that the defender should maintain the pursuer in peaceable possession, or otherwise; and in case of eviction, should be decerned to make payment of £—— by way of compensation. I have stated this summons of warrandice at length; because it is important to be considered [311] whether this is to be taken as an action principally on warrandice, or of two descriptions, on warrandice, and for damages. It appears to me, following the opinion of one of the judges in the Court below, that the action rests on the warrandice; and the question is, whether any thing has been evicted. It is admitted, that the Respondent has the superiority; and the complaint is, that he has no vote. But the warrandice is not of the vote; and you cannot go beyond the disposition. It is said, indeed, that the disposition has reference to the missives on which it is founded; but, although it refers to the missives, it does not specify what missives. The question now is upon the disposition of the superiority, which expresses only a conveyance of the superiority. The obligation is the foundation of the warrandice in the disposition, and in that, there is no reference to the missives. But suppose the missives were referred to in the obligation, the introduction of the mere words "missives" would not give a construction to the deed, although it might give a right to have the deed reformed, or of action upon the case, on the ground of fraud, or misrepresentation, if that could be made out. As to the correspondence, if it were admissible, there is the proposal of sale: the answer requiring particulars, and whether there was a freehold qualification, etc. the reply, that it has a vote, and undoubtedly here is a representation; but it is not clear that this was the subject of final agreement. For after this, it appears there was an end of the treaty upon the terms proposed. Afterwards, [312] a new proposal, as to price, is made by the Respondent's agent, which is accepted, on the terms that Gordon should take the lands as they stood. These letters I have stated to show how dangerous it would be to admit, in actions of this kind, such evidence. How does it appear, if Hughes had been called on to warrant the vote, that he would not have said as he did, with respect to the admeasurement of the lands; I will not warrant, you must take it as it stands. It is highly dangerous to admit such evidence to explain a deed, unless there is fraud or misrepresentation to afford a ground. The question is, therefore, whether upon a deed, which does not express warranty of the vote, it can be held that the Appellant is bound. The action proceeds upon the supposed eviction of something contained in the warranty. Nothing, as to the right of voting, is contained therein: nor is it necessarily, incident to the subject thereby disposed. Before the statute of 1681, the right was confined to a forty-shilling land of old extent; and where that is the ground of claim the statute of 16 Geo. 2. requires proof by retour of old extent, of a date prior to the statute, 1681. On the part of Respondent, it is contended that, by reference to the missives, the deed contains the grant of a right of voting; but the authorities cited from the laws of Scotland, and of England, do not, in any degree, sustain the argument. As to the case of Wigglesworth v. Dalison (Doug. 196), where by the custom of the country a way-going crop was allowed to the tenant for years, that was an action of trespass, which was met by a plea of title [313] and custom; and there may be a question, whether that decision is right in all its parts. The Court held, that a general custom, applicable to lands, gave a construction to the deed. The real state of the case is, that where custom warrants a way-going crop, unless the tenant has the way-going crop, he has not, in effect, the land for twenty-one years. When a transaction is concluded by solemn deed, that settles the right between the parties; and unless there be misrepresentation, knowingly made by one of the parties, the legal and technical import of the deed must prevail. As to the case of Clinan v. Cooke (1 Scho. and Lefr. Rep. p. 22), rightly understood, it is an authority against the Respondent. If this had been the case of a lease executed, it must have stood according to the terms expressed, unless reformed for fraud or misrepresentation. There is nothing here to connect the deed with the correspondence.

The form of action being on a warrandice, the question is, whether the thing described in the warrandice is evicted. As to the conclusion, with the claim of damages, it cannot warrant a total departure from all forms of action.

As to the waiver alleged, the expression is, If you amend, I shall be ready to meet, etc.; but this, I think, is no waiver. Lord Robertson says, the action appears to rest entirely upon the warrandice. If the Respondent wished to have the right of voting warranted, he should have taken care to have had it so expressed in the disposition. The summons contains no conclusion for damages, but in respect of the eviction of the thing war-[314]-ranted. The judgment is upon an action quantum minoris, if it can be sustained in such a case; not a judgment on the warrandice. It is founded upon the supposed previous contract between the parties. The case of Edwards v. McLeay, which was cited from Cooper's Reports, was decided on the ground of a misrepresentation, or else the deed could not have been affected. It is important to preserve the forms of actions. But if he is advised that he has grounds to maintain such action, the judgment here is not to preclude Mr. Gordon from insisting upon his claim, in a right form of action.

Judgment reversed, without prejudice to any relief which in any other form of action the Respondent may be entitled to.

Note. In the case of Clinan v. Cooke, (which was decided by Lord Redesdale, when he was Lord Chancellor of Ireland) the Defendant, by public advertisement, had offered lands to let for three lives, or thirty-one years. A treaty took place upon the footing of this advertisement: and, finally, the agent for the Defendant signed a contract for a lease of the lands to the Plaintiffs: but the term for which the lease was to be made was not specified in the agreement, and as it contained no reference to the advertisement, parol evidence to connect the agreement with the advertisement was rejected; and the bill, which was for a specific performance of the contract, was dismissed, upon the ground, that the term for which the lease was to be made was unascertained by the agreement.

SCOTLAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

WILLIAM MACDONALD,—Appellant: Mrs. ELIZABETH MACDONALD, otherwise LILLIE, and JOHN LILLIE, of Forres, her Husband, for his interest.

Respondents [20th May, 1819.]

[Discussed in Campbell v. Clason 1838, 1 Dunlop 270, at pp. 276, 278, 280–282.]

A LAW agent continuing to act for his client, held responsible for a loss caused by his neglect, although twenty-five years had elapsed since the transaction: notwithstanding a correspondence respecting the loss, in which the client acquiesced without remonstrance: and after a settlement of accounts with the Representatives of the client, and a discharge given by them before they had discovered the facts.

Macdonald of Finlarig, the father of the Respondent, Mrs. Lillie, employed in the management of his affairs William Macdonald, of St. Martin's, father of the Appellant, and writer to the signet.

Towards the end of the year 1787, Finlarig wrote to W. Macdonald, expressing his wish that some of his money then lying at a bankers should be laid out on security at five per cent. to his (W. Macdonald's) satisfaction. In April 1788, Macdonald was applied to by another of his clients, Colonel Charles Campbell, of Barbreck, by letter, in the following words:

[316] "I have been so harassed and plagued with applications for and from my son Charles, that I have at last agreed to his purchasing Captain Campbell Ederline's company, which, with my former advances this season raising men, and to enable him to prepare for the voyage, will at least cost £1600. So unexpected a demand I did not expect, and consequently will oblige me to borrow some money. I do not like the idea of giving any person security if it can be avoided: but I have no objection to lodge a bond of Captain Hector M'Niel's to me for £1000 in the hands of the person who will let me have that sum, as an additional security with my own bond."

The letter then noticed some other difficulties in which Colonel Campbell was involved from advances he had been obliged to make, observing that, on the whole, these were "dreadful drains," and he concluded thus:

"I beseech you to get this £1000 business settled without loss of time, and let me hear from you in course of post."

Upon this application, Macdonald accommodated his client, Colonel Campbell, with £1000 of his other client Finlarig's money, taking as a principal security for that sum the bond of Colonel Campbell, with an assignment to that of Captain Hector M'Niel, as a collateral security, both conceived in favour of Finlarig as the lender; and on the 19th of May, 1788, Macdonald wrote thus to Finlarig: "I have lent another £1000 of your money at this time, on very good [317] security, to Colonel Charles Campbell of Barbreck."

The security intended by this expression, appears from an entry in Macdonald's books to Finlarig's account, of which a copy by way of account current was sent to Finlarig in December, 1788, having this article:—

"To cash lent Colonel Charles Campbell of Barbreck, on your account, on bond and assignation to Captain Hector M'Niel of Ugadale's bond for £1000."

It appeared afterwards that Macdonald, the agent of Finlarig, did not complete the right of his principal to Captain M'Niel's bond, by giving intimation of the assignment to M'Niel, the obligor and debtor, according to the law and practice of Scotland.

In May, 1789, Colonel Campbell and Captain Hector M'Niel granted their joint bonds to three different persons for £1000 sterling each: and of the same date, Colonel Campbell granted a bond of relief or indemnity to Captain M'Niel, on the recital of these three bonds, stating that the money was received by Colonel Campbell, and wholly applied to his use; and that Captain M'Niel had become bound in the said securities at his, Colonel Campbell's desire, and for his account, and therefore engaging to indemnify Captain M'Niel, or to pay the money to him, that he might relieve himself of the said engagement. All these transactions were conducted by Macdonald.

On the 2d of January, 1792, Macdonald, in a letter addressed to Colonel Campbell, [318] uses the following expressions. "I had a letter lately from my namesake William Macdonald, who lent you £1000 some years ago, upon your own bond simply, containing an assignation to a bond of Captain Hector's for the like sum; and he mentions his intention of sending me the bond, as he wants money to, etc. I have been thinking of the affair you mention as to Mr. Calland's securities, and as I hear of a Mr. Turing lately from India, who has plenty of money, which it seems he is desirous to lend, might you not try Calland, who, I believe, is connected with him, and see if he would give the money on a conveyance? What say you to this plan, as people here are perpetually at searches of records, the moment you mention heritable security, and that is to be avoided on all occasions."

In April, 1792, Colonel Campbell died in a state of insolvency, and his estates were brought to a judicial sale. Captain M'Niel being obliged to pay all the three bonds above mentioned, received from the creditors therein assignments qua cautioner, or surety, of their respective debts, for the purpose of enabling him to operate his relief against the estate of Colonel Campbell. On these and the bond of indemnity he was ranked as a creditor, and took a dividend with the other creditors when the estates of Colonel Campbell were sold.

On the same occasion Macdonald, who continued to enjoy the confidence of Finlarig, and the management of his affairs, got him ranked as a creditor on the estate of Colonel Campbell, [319] by virtue of the Colonel's bond for £1000, but made no claim on M'Niel.

Pending the action for a sale of Colonel Campbell's estate, and the division of the purchase-money, Macdonald advised Finlarig, from time to time, of what was going forward, representing the Colonel's insolvency as a matter of surprise to himself and every one else, by taking no notice of the collateral security by the assignment of M'Niel's bond.

Colonel Campbell's death and insolvency had been announced to Finlarig by Macdonald in the following letter:—"The hurry and confusion I have been thrown in by the death of my book-keeper and principal clerk, the one after the other within six months, has engrossed my attention so much, that I am not able to answer letters regularly of late, and prevented me writing you earlier of the death of Colonel Charles Campbell, to whom £1000 of your money had been lent several years ago, when he was in as good credit as any man, possessed of a land estate better than £2000 sterling of yearly rent; but since his death, it turns out that he was greatly in debt, owing to an expensive and extravagant family, and various projects of improvements; for he was a man of no expensive turn himself. However, after a full examination into matters, it is the general opinion, when the estate is sold, there will be no short coming in payment of the creditors, though the interest will not be drawn regularly, at least while the widow lives. This is so far uncomfortable; but as I lent your money on all occasions as I would my own, [320] misfortune cannot be avoided at times, though it seldom happens; and even in this instance, I don't look on it by any means as desperate, now that matters are pretty well understood."

Finlarig wrote an answer to this letter in the following words: *

"Dear Sir, I have been favoured with yours in course of post. I observe what you say concerning Colonel Campbell; it is not very agreeable, but it might be worse."

On April 25th, 1800, Mr. Macdonald transmitted to Finlarig a copy of his account, accompanied with a letter, in which he says:—"I have judged it proper to send a duplicate, as then made up for your examination, having got a frank from Lord Perth for that purpose, and shall be glad to hear from you when convenient, that you find the account right. You'll observe, that you have just now £2100 lent on the two bonds by the Perthshire trustees, of whom I am one myself, along with Lord Perth, and several others, so that no accident can befall any part of it; and this, besides the debt due to you, as formerly mentioned, by the estate of the late Colonel Charles Campbell, the recovery of which, or some part of it, must be a distant period before dividends are made to the creditors, till the widow dies."

In answer to this letter, Finlarig wrote in the following terms:—"Dear Sir, I was duly favoured with yours of the 25th ultimo, [321] covering my account; which I have examined, and find perfectly right; and I have great reason to be very thankful to you for the great trouble you have been at, and so many transactions which I see by the account, till you got my little matters put out of all danger. Those transactions show very plainly, that I was not forgot, for which I return my most cordial thanks; at the same time I see likewise, that there is nothing charged on your part for trouble, which is more than I have any right to look for; and therefore wishes that you charge me whatever you see proper; for I have it not in my power to make you any recompense any other way. I have been more obliged to you than all the rest of Adam's posterity; and it was a lucky introduction for me, that first brought us together. I observe, that as this is a bad year, although the balance in my favour be but very small, that you allow me to draw on you as usual. May God keep you in good health and long life, in the head of your own affairs; and much satisfaction may you have of your family and your fortune, is my prayer towards you," etc.

In the month of April, 1802, Mr. Macdonald transmitted to Finlarig an affidavit to be made by him, relative to the debt due from the estate of Colonel Campbell, in order to be produced in the process of ranking, sale, and division above-mentioned. In his letter inclosing this paper, Mr. Macdonald says—"Dear Sir, I send you the inclosed affidavit to be made before a justice of the peace, and I fancy you need not go farther [322] than my cousin Tullochgriban to do it, as he will readily oblige you or me so far. You and he will have each page to sign with your names, immediately below the writings; and mention, when you send back the paper, after signing, the place and date of signing, and the shire, so as to be filled up by the same hand. This is a desperate debt, as I formerly mentioned to you, but it is right to take all that can be got. I never was so much deceived by mankind as by Colonel Campbell, who had a large estate; but his debts have turned out immense in England and Scotland."

Finlarig returned the affidavit, executed, in a letter to Mr. Macdonald, of the following tenor:—"Finlarig, 15th April, 1802. Dear Sir, I received yours, inclosing the affidavit, and I hope that matters is done to your mind. Your cousin Tullochgriban is just such another justice as myself; although appointed for two counties, we never qualified either of us. I have not been well since I was at Elgin, with fever and ague, and have not been out of the house for eighteen days; therefore was obliged to get the justice of the peace to my own house, so that you may date it at Finlarig, 11th instant, in the county of Moray or Elgin, and the justice is for the same county, and Inverness; take your choice. I am afraid I must call on you for money at Whitsunday and Martinmas both. Those years have ruined us. This is a terrible climate; we could not get a yoke a plough for three days past, with frost and snow; it will kill [323] all our lambs; it bids badly for a crop or a good harvest, as they say that the harvest will be like the spring. The justice of the peace is James Grant, Ballintom, in case you should want his designation. I hope all is according to your directions; and with best respects to yourself and family, I remain," etc.

* It appeared from all the letters of Finlarig that he was a very illiterate man.

In the month of April, 1803, Mr. Macdonald sent Finlarig for execution, a discharge for a dividend from Colonel Campbell's estate: in the letter accompanying which, Mr Macdonald says—"I now send you a discharge for a dividend from Colonel Charles Campbell's estate, upon that unlucky debt he owed to you upon bond; and there will be another dividend of less amount very soon, but no more till the death of his widow, when the sum she liferents will also be divided among the creditors, etc. This same sum, small as it is, I had once little hopes of recovering; the Colonel's failure from affluent circumstances being to so great an amount as astonished every body."

In his letter returning this discharge, Finlarig says:—"I find by the dividend, that Campbell must have died much involved; and from seeing the bond being landed security, I see it hardly possible to guard against a man that is in good credit, when he is inclined to be a villain," etc.

In the month of November, 1803, Mr. Macdonald transmitted to Finlarig a discharge for another dividend inclosed in a letter, of which the following is an extract: "I am favoured with yours of the 12th current, and was just prepar-[324]-ing to write you with the inclosed papers for your signing, when your letter came to hand. This second dividend of Colonel Campbell's estate, (and God knows when the next will take place,) will, small as it is, enable me, with £50 of interest I have to draw in January next for you, to pay the £100 you are to draw for, which do when you please. I have lent this term £400 for you, made up of interest with the former dividend from Colonel Campbell, as I manage for you as I do for myself; and therefore don't draw for more than this £100 you mention, till next Martinmas, if you can avoid it, because I'll have no money of yours till then; but for all that, if you are in need, I'll honour your bills."

Finlarig returned the discharge, executed, in a letter to Mr. Macdonald, in which he says,—"I am favoured with yours, inclosing the instrument and discharge, which I have executed, as near as I can, according to your instructions. The witnesses are both my servants, and lives in my family at Finlarig, and signed this day the witnesses and myself. I will draw no more than the £100 from you, I hope, for a year. I am always sensible of your good offices towards me, since I had the honour of your acquaintance, and I am always sensible that you do every thing for my interest," etc.

The dividends received from Campbell's estates, and paid over to Finlarig, amounted to £304 1s. 3d. He died in the year 1806, leaving an only child, the Respondent, Mrs. Lillie.

[325] In the year 1807, Mr. Macdonald, the Appellant's father, having rendered a state of his accounts, and in the year 1811, a farther and final account, to the representatives of Finlarig, Mrs. Lillie, in a letter of July 20th, 1811, wrote to Mr. Macdonald in the following terms:—"My uncle, Mr. Grant, at Muirtown, was favoured with your letter of the 11th instant, inclosing an account current between you and my curators, commencing the credit side in your favour on 20th March, 1807, and ending on the 11th July current; commencing the debit side against you 26th February, 1807, and ended on the said 11th July current; on which there arises a balance due by you to me and my late curators, of £51 15s. 9½d. This account has been perused by myself, Mr. Lillie, and Mr. Grant for himself, and acting as factor for my other curators, and is, as well as all other accounts rendered by you of your intromissions with my father's concerns, found to be perfectly accurate and satisfactory to all concerned; not only so, but the liberal and friendly manner in which you have conducted this business in general, by departing from claims so competent to yourself, merits, as I trust it will have, my most ample acknowledgements and gratitude upon all future occasions. I have therefore, this day, drawn upon you, with the consent of my husband, for the above balance of £51 15s. 9½d. in favour of John Gordon, Esq. Forres, at three days' sight, which we have no doubt will be duly honoured by you, and will of course be in full of all you are resting and owing either on account of your intromissions with my father's estate [326] during his life-time, or since his death with mine, as his only child and executor."

After the death of Finlarig, and after all the correspondence and transactions before stated (see p. 17), the account current, which Macdonald had transmitted to Finlarig in 1788, being found among his papers; the entry in it respecting Captain McNeil's bond suggested an inquiry why, instead of resorting to the insolvent estate of Colonel Campbell, and taking the small dividends which it afforded, Macdonald had not recovered the money from M'Niel, a person in affluent circumstances.

Upon this subject, a correspondence * took place between Macdonald and the friends of Mrs. Lillie, in consequence of which a demand was made on Captain M'Niel; but he founded on the want of intimation of the assignment, as entitling him to plead compensation (a set off) on the three bonds for borrowed money granted in 1789, which he as surety had been obliged to discharge, and Colonel Campbell's bond of indemnity; and he pleaded also compensation on another debt, alleged to have been due to him from Campbell, on a transaction previous to the date of the bond assigned.

* As to the latter ground of set-off, it appeared that by a personal bond dated in Dec. 1776, Colonel Campbell of Barbreck, and Captain John M'Niel the younger of Ugadale, upon a recital that they had borrowed and received from Niel M'Niel, Esq. of Ugadale, the sum of £1100 ster-[327]-ling, became bound jointly and severally to repay the said sum to the said Niel M'Niel, of Ugadale, or failing him by decease, to Captain Hector M'Niel of the Marines, his second son, and his heirs, etc. Captain Hector M'Niel, the substitute in this bond, is the same person who became the debtor in that which was assigned as security to Finlarig. The right to the sum secured by this bond, devolved, as it was alleged in the pleadings, upon Captain H. M'Niel. But, notwithstanding this apparent claim, H. M'Niel had, in 1788, paid three years' interest upon his bond to Colonel Campbell; and in the process of ranking of Colonel Campbell's creditors, no claim upon this bond for £1100 was made by or on behalf of Captain H. M'Niel.

Under these circumstances, in the year 1813, the Respondents brought their action in the Court of Session against Macdonald for payment of the £1000 and interest, so far as payment had not been recovered from the estate of Colonel Campbell; founding on his gross and culpable negligence in not having intimated the assignment of Captain M'Niel's bond; and in order (as it was said) to give Mr. Macdonald an opportunity of proving, if he could, that there had been intimation, the Respondents made Captain M'Niel a party to the action. Macdonald, one of the defenders in this action, died shortly after its commencement; whereupon the Appellant, his son, became a party as his representative.

By an interlocutor pronounced on the 25th of June, 1811, the Lord Ordinary, before whom [328] the cause came, assozied Captain M'Niel, but repelled the defences pleaded for the Appellant, and decerned against him according to the conclusion of the libel.

The Appellant having given in a representation against this interlocutor, to which answers were made for the Respondents, the Lord Ordinary, on the 17th January, 1815, pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lord Ordinary having considered this representation, with the answers thereto, and whole process of consent of the pursuer, restricts the principal sum decerned for to the sum libelled of £1000 sterling, deducting therefrom the sum of £218 17s. 8d. sterling paid to account, on the 13th of April, 1803, and £55 1s. 0½d. sterling paid to account on the 30th of November, 1803; and further ordains the pursuers on receiving payment of the sums decerned for to assign over to the defender their claim to be ranked on the estate of Barbreck, that he may operate his relief, but quoad ultra refuses the desire of the representation, and adheres to the interlocutor represented against."

A representation against this last interlocutor was refused by the Lord Ordinary without an answer.

The Appellant then presented his petition to the Court in the Second Division, reclaiming against the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, to which answers being made for the Respondents, the following interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lords having advised this petition with the answers, refuse the petition, and adhere to the [329] interlocutor complained of in so far as respects the principal sum, and two partial payments therein specified, but consent to find interest only due from the 15th day of May, 1791, and to that extent alter the interlocutor complained of and decern; find the defender liable in expences; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit to the auditor to tax the same and report."

* The only letter in this correspondence which appears to be material, is mentioned by the Chancellor, in his observations, post, 382, and an extract from it is printed at the end of this case.

To this interlocutor the Lords adhered, by refusing a second petition for the Appellant on answers made:

And finally, they awarded costs to the Respondents, to the amount of £140 19s. 2d.

From these several interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary, and Lords of Session, the Appellant appealed to the House of Lords.

For the Appellant—the Solicitor General (Sir R. Gifford) and Mr. J. A. Murray. For the Respondents—Mr. C. Warren and Mr. W. Adam.

On the part of the Appellants, it was argued that the agency was gratuitous—that the neglect was not gross—that intimation ought to be presumed—that it would have been useless if made—as M'Niel might have pleaded compensation upon the old bond—that the client's claim was barred by acquiescence and prescription; and that of his representatives by discharge—and both by length of time.

[330] The gratuitous agency was denied on the part of the Respondents, and argued to be immaterial; and it was insisted that the responsibility continued, notwithstanding time and apparent acquiescence; for the client was ignorant both of the fact and the law; and the agent, continuing to act for the client and his family, kept them uninformed, contrary to his duty. The fact was discovered by the representatives, after they had given the discharge. If M'Neil had any counterclaim, he would not have paid interest.

On behalf of the Appellant the following authorities were cited:—Ersk. 3. 7. 29. on the extinction of obligations by taciturnity; Ersk. 4. 4. 109. The Lord Chancellor, in the course, and at the conclusion, of the argument, made the following observations:—when Campbell's insolvency became known, it did not appear that M'Donald the writer mentioned the assignation in the whole course of the correspondence—the form of the assignation was to M'Donald the lender (Finlarig), and to M'Donald the writer, which was said to be the common form—in the summons, the pursuers state that they did not discover the fact of the assignation until after the letter of discharge: there was no clear evidence that the bond was in the hands of Finlarig—Colonel Campbell's bond contained a recital of the assignation—and Finlarig ought to have had, not only Colonel Campbell's bond, but also the bond recited to be assigned—it did not appear why M'Donald the writer made no claim against M'Niel—if the intimation had been given, he was liable—if M'Niel had a prior demand upon Campbell, how [332] did it happen that M'Donald, being the law agent of both, took it as a security, knowing a fact which would make it ineffectual—if there was no prior debt, then there was nothing to prevent the claim against M'Niel. Suppose M'Niel had a prior claim, unknown to both the writer and the lender: if he suppressed that fact, knowing of the transaction of loan and security, he could not claim compensation. It is unaccountable that the security was not made complete by intimation. For when the writer recommended the security, he had received a letter from Campbell, which showed the hazard of lending the money on his personal responsibility.

But if the bond had been duly assigned, and duly intimated, would there have been any necessity to wait for the winding up of Campbell's affairs, before suing upon the bond of M'Niel?

In the oath of verity, in the process of ranking, M'Donald recites the assignment, "This deponent," etc. Appendix to paper, 6th April, pp. 18, and 19. After this he cannot say he considered the security as good for nothing.

The printed cases have not stated letters written in 1813, which are material. In one of those (see end of the case), M'Donald the writer states the bond only to have been deposited. From this representation, it appears improbable that there could have been intimation of assignation. Paper, 12th June, 1815, p. 11.

[333] Lord Redesdale observed, that when M'Niel became a creditor, it was not likely he would leave a bond in the hands of his debtor.

The Lord Chancellor moved the Judgment. (May 20, 1819.)

The proceedings in this case were instituted in 1814, and as they refer to transactions commencing in 1788, the case deserves great attention. It is a claim made against an agent, for compensation on account of negligence in providing for the interest of his client. It is admitted that Mr. M'Donald was highly respectable in his profession. I should be unwilling to act on any principle adverse to the doctrines of presumption or prescription. If this is to be represented as a cause of action arising in 1788, and there was nothing to keep it alive, it would be too dangerous to inquire into it. But, unless I mistake the nature of the case, there certainly was negligence; and the ground of the complaint is not taken away by lapse of time, or the nature of the transactions which have since taken place.

The word negligence, I do not use in a sense reproachful to the memory of Mr. M'Donald the writer.

In 1788, M'Donald the father (Finlarig) employed M'Donald the writer to place out his money on good securities. Colonel Campbell was a man in suspicious circumstances, as we may understand from the advice against real securities, on account of the evidence which it would furnish upon record. The fact that he wanted £1000 is a proof that he was not in easy circumstances. Colonel [334] Campbell was obligee in a bond from M'Niel, and M'Donald the writer gets an assignment of this bond, as an additional security. There is no doubt that the bond was assigned: it must be inferred that M'Donald the father knew that his money was lent on a bond. That might have been an objection in England, though not in Scotland.* The policy of the law requires that we should hold that Macdonald the writer knew that intimation was necessary, and that the security was imperfect without it. By a letter, written in January, 1792, from Macdonald the writer to Campbell, it appears that Macdonald the father intended to call up the money; or that Macdonald the writer, knowing the risk of Campbell's insolvency, desired it. In that letter, he says, "I had a letter lately from my namesake, who lent you £1000 some years ago, upon your own bond simply, containing an assignation to a bond of Captain Hector's, for the like sum, and he mentions his intention of sending me the bond, as he wants the money," etc.

There has been much argument as to the question in whose possession the bonds were; but it is not material. It is fully ascertained that, at a subsequent period, the bonds must have been in the possession of Macdonald the writer. At this time, Macdonald the writer was negotiating securities from Colonel Campbell; and then, not confiding in the circumstances of Campbell, occurs [335] the expression as to heritable securities. It is not easy to understand the expression, as to securities of record, in any but one way. The accounts sent in (the first, the second, and the third, being further parts of the same account,) may be said to have been in the possession of Macdonald the father, from 2d April, 1792, up to the year 1811. There is, in these accounts, an item thus: "By three years' interest from bond and assignation." This is said to be an intimation to the father; but from the complexion of the accounts, and the other transactions, it is just to say that Macdonald the writer was, in the amplest sense, the man of business of Macdonald the father, and bound to advise and act for him. Colonel Campbell died in 1792, in a state of embarrassment. Immediately following that event, there is a letter from Macdonald the writer, intimating that his affairs might be retrieved.

Macdonald the writer still continued to be the man of business for the father, and afterwards for the representatives. If the bond of M'Niel had been intimated, the insolvency of Campbell would not have prevented their putting it in suit. But no demand was made upon it; and in the correspondence it is remarkable, that in all the letters between Macdonald the father, and Macdonald the writer, no mention is made relative to the bond supposed to be assigned, or the intimation of it, or the reason why it was not made effectual, if completed. To meet this observation, it is said that if there be taciturnity, courts do not inquire; and, undoubtedly, though nothing is more important than to hold professional men to accuracy, yet, on the other hand, they ought not to be made to account, twenty-five years after a transaction, if the circumstances of the particular case make it unreasonable; but circumstances are to be considered. Whether the father knew the law of intimation, is doubtful; but the writer must have known it, and ought to have acted upon it. This is the taciturnity, not of Macdonald the father, but of Macdonald the writer. The representatives, when they find the papers as to the bond and assignment, call upon Macdonald; and, looking at the letters, it is difficult to read them, and suppose he had lost his memory. He could not have forgotten so far the transaction as to call that a deposit, which, in the accounts, he had called an assignment. This case, therefore, by its circumstances, is taken out of the principles of presumption and prescription, which ought to protect professional men. On these grounds, and a fair view of the case, as a jurymen, it is my opinion that the bond was not intimated; and, by reason of non-intimation, the debt was lost from the estate. Either the want of intimation caused the loss, or, if it was intimated, and the doctrine of set-off had applied, Colonel Campbell might have been called upon forthwith to pay, and, at that time, could have paid; because he afterwards raises £3000 on different bonds. That transaction could never have furnished a defence against a bond duly intimated.

Professional men must be strictly held to such accuracy as to give security to their employers. [337] Lapse of time, under circumstances, may be an excuse; but the former principle preponderates here; and as the safety of clients ought not to be discussed at the expense of their representatives, this case ought to be affirmed with £80 costs.

Lord Redesdale.—Macdonald the writer recommended the security of his own client, Campbell, with collateral securities. It is clear that no intimation was given, because of the transaction in 1789, where M'Niel became security for Campbell to the amount of £3000. If M'Niel had been debtor to Campbell in £1000, that transaction would have taken place in a different form. When Campbell died, and his affairs were in a state of insolvency, Macdonald does not give notice immediately; but in December following, stating the circumstances, and the necessity of going upon the estate of Campbell, he does not mention a word of the demand against M'Niel. If Macdonald had not been then conscious that no demand could be made, he would have spoken of the claim on him. His memory was then full; because it was but a few years after the transaction, and then he must have known whether he had given intimation. The letter of 1813 clearly proves that there was no intimation.* There was [338] no necessity to wait for winding up the affairs of Campbell's estate. These transactions could arise from this circumstance only, that there had been no intimation. The negligence is clear. As to length of time, the letter of 1813 holds out hope as against McNiel. There was no negligence in Finlarig, or his representatives. He was a person of ignorance, trusting to his legal adviser, and the representatives acted as soon as they had information.

* Referred to by the Lord Chancellor. ante, p. 332. It is a letter from M'Donald the writer to Mr. Lillie, dated March 26, 1813. It contains the following passages:

"I can now, however, tell you that Captain M'Niel was not bound as cautioner along with Colonel Charles Campbell; for, at that time, the Colonel was in great credit, and in possession of a large estate; but the Colonel gave him a bond of the Captain's for £1000 by way of deposit, as additional security, with his own bond for the £1000 of Finlarig's money lent him; and upon the Colonel's death, it was found that he was so much involved in transactions with Captain M'Niel that it is difficult to say what may be recovered from Captain M'Niel, or how far he may be liable.

Judgment affirmed.

SCOTLAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

CASE OF THE QUEENSBERRY LEASES.

[12th July, 1819.]

[See H. Dow, 90, and V. Dow, 293.]

POWER of an heir of tailzie in respect of leasing.

In what respects an heir of tailzie is absolute owner of the estate, and in what respects he is bound to administer for the benefit of his successors under the entail.

The word "dispone," in the prohibitory clause of a Scotch entail, has the same meaning and operation as the word "alienate."

Those words prohibit long leases, as alienations inconsistent with a due administration of the estate.

A lease for 57 years is a long lease within the meaning of the prohibition.

Words prohibiting alienation affect a lease by which the grantor of the lease, the heir of entail in possession, does not reserve to the succeeding heir of entail the same benefit as to himself, as, by reserving a given rent to the grantor during his life, or for the first years of the term, and a smaller rent after his decease, or for the remainder of the term.

Grassum (a fine taken upon granting a lease), is anticipated rent.

Therefore, a lease made upon a grassum paid to the grantor, is an alienation pro tanto of the rent.

A power in an entail to make leases "without diminution of the rental, at the least at the just avail for the time," means, at the fair value at the time of leasing, not the last rent, which may have been paid a century before.

"Rental," in that clause of the entail, is the same in construction as "rent."

The heir in possession taking a grassum effects a diminution of the rental or rent, and does not take the just avail for the time.

It is a diminution of the rent if grassum was taken upon a preceding lease; and such lease being surrendered before its expiration, a new lease is granted at the old rent.

[340] Leases granted upon such terms are void, as between the heirs of the entail.

Whether leases granted for 31 years, or so many years as the Court of Session or House of Lords shall deem to be within the power of the heir of entail, are void as uncertain, and not according to a due administration of an entailed estate. Quære.

Leases made by the heir of entail in possession, for nineteen years, with cove-until the process of ranking and division, among the Colonel's creditors, is deliberately examined into, which must take time, as there is no access, at present, to that part of the process, which is most material to be looked into, it being borrowed up by one of the agents for creditors, who has either mislaid it, or lent it to some other of the agents, and requires time to be got at. At any rate, there are further dividends to be made, of which Mrs. Lillie draws her share; which is all I can say on the subject at present."

nant to renew annually during his life, are not void, as being a transgression of the power to lease for the setter's life, or nineteen years.

Numerous leases granted by the heir of entail for his own benefit, and to the prejudice of the succeeding heir of entail, operate as a fraud upon the entail.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR *.

My Lords: This is unquestionably the most weighty and important cause, which, in the course of my professional life, either at the bar or in a judicial situation, I have ever had occasion to consider: important in its [341] consequences

* These were appeals arising out of various actions of declarator and reduction, in which the trustees of the late Duke of Queensberry, the present Duke of Buccleugh and Queensberry, the Earl of Wemyss and March, and certain lessees of the late Duke of Queensberry, were parties. The cases turned upon the construction of two entails; the one called the March and Neidpath, the other, the Queensberry entail: and the principal questions arising and discussed in the cause were,—1st. Whether, in the prohibitory clause of an entail, the word "dispone" was equivalent to the word alienate, and had the same effect to prevent alienation? 2d. Whether long leases, and of what endurance, were alienations? 3d. Whether taking grassum was a breach of the prohibition to alienate? 4th. What was the true construction of a power given to the heir of tailzie in possession to make leases "without diminution of the rental, at the least at the just avail for the time;" whether it meant the last preceding rent taken, or the fair value at the time of leasing; and whether taking a grassum was a breach of that condition annexed to the power of leasing? 5th. Whether leases for 31 years, or if the Court of Session or House of Lords should hold such leases to be void as too long, then for such period as those Courts should approve, were good leases, i.e. whether the Court would restrict the endurance, and define the ish for the parties? 6th. Whether leases for nineteen years, with obligations to renew for the same period annually during the life of the grantor, were prohibited, as being for the setter's lifetime and nineteen years? 7th. Whether leases at the same rent, substituted for and upon the surrender of former leases, which had been made with grassum, could be sustained? And finally, Whether leases of the several descriptions before stated, granted by the heir of entail in possession to the amount of many hundred, were to be considered as frauds upon the successors in the entail.

The appeal was before the House of Lords in the year 1817, and on the 10th of July was remitted, with special directions, for the reconsideration of the Court of Session. After judgment upon the remit, the cause now came for the final decision of the House of Lords.

The nature of the several actions in the Court below, the parties to them, the terms of the respective entails, the several matters in issue, the arguments urged before the original and appellate jurisdictions, so far as they are material to understand the question, appear in the following observations made in moving the judgment on this appeal. More exact information (if desired) upon these points, may be found in the printed cases; and a general outline of the pleadings, and the facts and questions, may also be found in the observations of the Lord Chancellor in moving the remit upon the former appeal.—MS. 9 July 1817. Dow's Rep. vol. 5. p. 297.

No part of the arguments are given in this report, because the principal topics of argument are noticed in the Chancellor's speech in moving judgment, and from their extreme length, it would not be possible, within moderate bounds, to do justice to the great ability of the advocates who pleaded the cause at the bar of the House.

The several cases were argued at the bar of the House of Lords upon the original hearing by Mr. (now Vice Chancellor) Leach, Mr. Jeffrey, Sir S. Romilly, Mr. Cranstoun, and Mr. Moncrieff, on the 3d, 5th, 7th, 10th, 13th, 14th, 17th, and 18th of February 1817; and after the judgment of the Court of Session upon the remit, by the Lord Advocate (Machonochie), the Solicitor General (Gifford), Sir S. Romilly, Cranstoun, Moncrieff, and J. Murray, on the 13th, 15th, 17th, 20th, 22d, and 27th of April 1818.

as a question of great value to those who are directly interested in it; but in that [342] point of view, it sinks, as it seems to me, into absolute insignificance, when it is considered, with reference to the effect, which the judgment in this cause, whatever it may happen to be, must have upon the interest of landed proprietors of Scotland.

In order to render the question intelligible, it becomes necessary to enter into a statement of the law of Scotland as referrible to the facts and circumstances of this case,—the law of Scotland, not as it is understood in interpretation, but as it is to be found in acts of Parliament; for the question between these parties arises upon what is the true intent and meaning of an act passed in Scotland in 1685, which is their act respecting tailzies. Tailzies existed long before that period, but the present case is to be considered upon the true construction of that act of Parliament, as attaching upon the tailzies of the March and Noidpath estates, and the Queensberry estate.

Before and since the passing of that act, it has been the subject of much controversy, what is the law of Scotland as to the interpretation of tailzies. They have been treated as matters strictissimi juris, as not to be construed by intention, but only on what you find embodied (to use their phrase) in expression; and those principles have certainly, before and since the act, been applied to tailzied instruments.

[343] That act of Parliament is in these words:

“Our Sovereign Lord, with advice and consent of his Estates of Parliament, statutes and declares, that it shall be lawful to his Majesty's subjects to tailzie their lands and estates, and to substitute heirs in their tailzies, with such provisions and conditions as they shall think fit, and to affect the said tailzies with irritant and resolute clauses, whereby it shall not be lawful to the heirs of tailzie to sell annaizie or dispose* the said lands, or any part thereof, or contract debt, or do any other deed whereby the samen may be apprysed, adjudged or evicted from the others substitute in the tailzie, or the succession frustrate or interrupted, declaring all such deeds to be in themselves null and void, and that the next heir of tailzie may immediately, upon contravention, pursue declarators thereof, and serve himself heir to him who died last infeft in the fee, and did not contravene, without necessity anywise to represent the contravener. It is always declared, that such tailzies shall only be allowed in which the aforesaid irritant and resolute clauses are insert in the procuratories of resignation, charters, precepts and instruments of seisin, and the original tailzie once produced before the Lords of Session judicially, who are hereby ordained to interpose their authority thereto, and that record be made in a particular register-book, to be kept for that effect, wherein shall be recorded the names of the maker of the tailzie, and of the heirs of tailzie, and the general designations of the lordships and baronies, and the provisions and conditions contained in the tailzie, with the foresaid irritant and resolute clauses subjoined thereto, to remain in the said register ad perpetuum rei memoriam; and for which record there shall be paid to the clerk of register and his deputies, the same dues as is paid for the registration of seisins; and which provi[344]sions and irritant clauses shall be repeated in all the subsequent conveyances of the said tailzied estate to any of the heirs of tailzie; and being so insert, his Majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, declares the samen to be real and effectual, not only against the contraveners and their heirs, but also against their creditors, comprisers, adjudgers, and other singular successors whatsoever, whether by legal or conventional titles. It is always hereby declared, that if the said provisions and irritant clauses shall not be repeated in the rights and conveyances, whereby any of the heirs of tailzie shall brook or enjoy the tailzied estate, the said omission shall import a contravention of the irritant and resolute clauses against the person and his heirs who shall omit to insert the same, whereby the said estate shall ipso facto fall, accresce, and be devolved to the next heir of tailzie, but shall not militate against creditors, and other singular successors who shall happen to have contracted bonâ fide with the person who stood infeft in the said estate, without the saids irritant and resolute clauses in the body of his right.”

* Here the Lord Chancellor noticed the arguments upon the construction of the words sell, alienate and dispose, which occur afterwards, p. 360.

And then there is a saving of his Majesty's confiscations or fines.

Without entering at present into other considerations relative to this act, it appears that authorizing certain entails, it requires, in order to make them good, at least against claims of third persons, that they should have prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses; and it has always been held, that clauses of each of these kinds are necessary to give the effect to those tailzies which this act of Parliament intends should be given.

In construction this also seems to have been settled, that you cannot entail unless there is an express prohibition; you cannot entail by implication. That appears to have been intentionally prevented by some of the expressions used in the act of Parliament. If [345] there be no prohibition to sell, annailzie and dispone, a prohibition to make any deed by which persons might be evicted has been held insufficient. And so it has been decided in the case of other implications, that the prohibitions from which they appear to arise by necessary consequence would not deprive the heirs of tailzie of the power over the estate as to matters not expressly prohibited. Unless there is a prohibition of each sort, the heir of tailzie is free to take advantage of the omission. Where, for instance, the prohibition is not to alter the succession: nothing in the world could more clearly interrupt the succession than the sale of the estate: and yet a prohibition to interrupt the succession would not prevent a sale by the heir. I conceive also, that if the clause de non alienando fail, the acts prohibited not being stated again in the irritant clauses as acts that are prohibited, they are not effectually prohibited. If the clauses are not complete, the frame of the tailzie would not be sufficient to protect those who are to take under it: and indeed in some decisions, this sort of construction has been carried to a length, which I confess has surprised me very much; but a Judge must take care that the surprise which affects his mind, shall not affect the law as settled by decisions. Nothing surprised me more (to mention one among many) than the Duntreath case*, in which it was held by this House, contrary to the opinion of the Court below, that where there were prohibitions against the heirs of tailzie, yet, as the first taker under the disposition was known to the law of Scotland as the institute, [346] and not as the heir, he was not affected by the prohibitory or other clauses, notwithstanding the person who had framed the tailzie, the donor of the gift, had called that very individual, in many many places in his tailzie, an heir of tailzie. In considering the two deeds of entail upon which this question arises, attention must be paid to what may be represented as the difference between the prima facie and obvious meaning of those instruments, and what may be contended to be their legal construction.

The entail of the March of Neidpath estate was effected by a deed bearing date the 12th of October 1693, but not recorded till the year 1781. It appears from the leases, that the late Duke of Queensberry had possessed the estate from the year 1731 to the year 1781, before this entail was recorded, as the statute requires it should be, yet the late Duke raised a very considerable sum of money upon the estate soon after he succeeded to the Queensberry estate in 1772.

This deed of entail was made upon the marriage of Lord William Douglas with Lady Jane Hay, stating that in contemplation of the marriage, "William Duke of Queensberry, in virtue of the power and faculty reserved to him by the infettments of the lordship of Neidpath be thir presents binds and obliges him, and his heirs and successors whatsoever, upon his own proper charges and expenses, to duly and lawfully infeft and sease the said Lord William Douglas, and his heirs male and of tailzie after mentioned, in the lordship of Neidpath, containing and comprehending the several lands, baronies (and so forth), particularly and generally after mentioned, to be holden from his [347] Grace and his foresaids, of his immediate superiors thereof, sicklike and as freely as he holds the same himself, and that he is to do this by resignation in favour of the said William Lord Douglas his son, and the heirs-male to be procreat betwixt him and "the said Lady Jane Hay his promised spouse; which failing, to the heirs male of his body to be procreat in any other lawful marriage;"—(I call your attention to the words, that he is to do it by resignation, without stopping to state my reason at present:)"—which failing, to the other heirs of tailzie after specified, according to the order underwritten, under the express provisions, reservations, limitations and conditions hereafter rehearsed, and no otherwise; and for making the aforesaid resignation, the said William Duke of Queensberry and Lord William Douglas make (certain persons) their very lawful and irrevocable procurators for them, and in their names to resign, surrender, overgive and deliver, as they be thir presents resign, surrender, overgive and deliver, all and haill the lordship of Neidpath."

The tailzie then, at great length, mentions the particulars which form that lordship, among which are, "All and haill the tenandry of the Holy Cross Kirk of Peebles; and moreover all and sundry the lands and barony of Newlands, the lands and barony of Linton respectively, with their pertinentis called Kirkwird and Lochwird; and further, the lands, baronies and others under written." The particulars comprehended under those words, lordships, baronies and others under-written, are distinguished in this tailzie as what are called warrandice lands.

Then the entail goes on to state who are the heirs [348] of entail, and the substitutes, and then there is a reservation in the following words: "Reserving always to the said William Duke of Queensberry his liferent of the haill lands, baronies, lordship and others above rehearst, except as to those parts thereof particularly after specified, which are hereby allocate to the said Lord William Douglas for his present maintenance, and to the said Lady Jane Hay for her liferent, as the same shall happen to fall out, and during the existence thereof respectivè:" then follows this clause, "notwithstanding the right of fee of the said haill lordship and warrandice lands: specified be hereby conveyed and established in favours of the said William Lord Douglas and his foresaids, and of the other heirs of tailzie above mentioned, yet it shall be always lawful to, and entirely in the power and liberty of the said William Duke of Queensberry, by himself alone, at any time during his life, without consent of the said Lord William Douglas his son, and his heirs above mentioned, or of any other of the heirs of tailzie a-specified, hereby appointed to succeed in the lands, baronies, lordship and others a-written, to sell, alienate and dispose the lands of Newlands and Linton, and also the tenantry of Holy Cross Kirk of Peebles, comprehending all and sundry the particular lands, annualrents, and so forth, that is, the lands of Newlands, Linton, and Holy Cross Kirk of Peebles, and all and haill the foresaid tenandry of the said Holy Cross Kirk of Peebles, comprehending the lands, etc. in favour of any other person or persons he shall think fit, and likewise to burden the said lands and others immediately [349] above rehearst," (that is, those three parcels of land,) "with such debts or sums of money as his Grace shall appoint, either by bonds of provision or any other rights or obligations, albeit the same be only personal rights containing no clause of infeftment; and likewise reserving power and liberty to the said William Duke of Queensberry during his lifetime, to set tacks of the haill lands, baronies and others immediately above rehearst, for payment of such yearly duties, and for such space and endurance as he shall think just, and to set tacks of the remanent lands and others above rehearst, except these which are allocated hereby to the said Lord William for his present maintenance, and to the said Lady Jane for her liferent from and during the time that her said liferent shall exist, and that for such duties as he shall think fit, and to continue during all the days of his lifetime;"—(I read these words, because in the prima facie, or if I may so state it, the English meaning, we should infer from this sort of positive provision, that the general words of disposition which the author of this entail had made as against himself, would tie up his hands from doing those acts, unless he had reserved to himself permission to do those acts which I mention, because it will be necessary to go into a great deal of discussion on points of this nature;)—"and likewise to burden the said lands, and set tacks thereof in manner above written; all which rights to be granted by the said William Duke of Queensberry, in the respective cases above-mentioned, are hereby declared to be good, valid, legal and effectual, and with the burden whereof the lands and estate a-men-[350]tioned, in the cases above rehearst, is hereby disposed to the said Lord William Douglas"—(I lay a stress on the words "disposed," and "disposed to," and small variations of that kind, not from a sense of any intrinsic difference in the phrases "dispose," "dispose to," "dispose of," etc. but on account of the observations which I find in the printed cases,)—"to the said Lord William Douglas, and his heirs-male foresaids in fee, and to the other heirs of tailzie a-written, and that not only against the said Lord William Douglas, and the heirs of tailzie respectivè above specified, but also against all singular successors, whether legal or conventional, who shall have right to the lands, baronies and others above disponed in all time coming."

Then the heirs of tailzie are bound to confirm the deeds of William Duke of Queensberry, with respect to these excepted lands of Lintoun and Newlands; and then follows this clause, which appears to me not to be altogether immaterial with a view to observations which I shall have to make by and by: "and in like manner it is hereby expressly provided and declared, and to be provided and contained in the resignations, charters and infeftments, and all the subsequent rights to follow thereupon, that all and sundry the foresaids lands and baronies of Newlands and Lintoun, and tenandries of the Holy Cross Kirk of Peebles, comprehending as said is, with the teinds, patronages, offices, jurisdictions and others particularly and generally above mentioned, pertaining thereto and comprehendit therein, shall be redeemable, and under reversion by the said [351] William Duke of Queensberry himself, at any time of his life, from the said Lord William Douglas and his heirs-male, and the other heirs of tailzie above mentioned, by payment making to them, or consignment to their behoof, of ane twenty-merk piece of gold, or £15 Scots, as the value thereof, and that upon any day the said Duke should think fit during his said lifetime, upon the premonition of six days of before to be made by him to the said Lord William Douglas and his foresaids, at the mercat-cross of Peebles, in pre- of ane notar and two witnesses," and so on: which provision and condition of reversion above written, and for the using of the which order of redemption, the extract hereof, or of the charter, or instruments of resignation or seisin to follow hereupon, is hereby declared to be as valid, effectual and sufficient, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as if ane particuler letter of reversion were made, subscribed and delivered, be the said Lord William Douglas and his foresaids, to the said William Duke of Queensberry, apart for that effect, with all solemnities requisite, whereanent for him and his foresaids he has dispensed, and hereby dispenses for ever: declaring always, likeas it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that in case the said William Duke of Queensberry shall not, during his lifetime, exerce the foresaid faculty, by using ane order of redemption, otherwise disposing of the lands and others contained in the foresaid provision of reversion: that in that case, the said haill lands and lordship shall entirely pertain and belong to the said Lord William and the heirs of tailzie a-men-[352]-tioned, upon the provisions, and with the burden of the clauses irritant and resolute under written."

Then follow the prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses upon which so much of difficulty has arisen in the present case: (those clauses are not the same in the entail of March and Neidpath, as they are in the entail of Queensberry.) "It shall noways be leisome and lawful to the said Lord William Douglas and the heirs male of his body, nor to the other heirs of tailzie respectively above-mentioned, nor any of them, to sell, alienate, wadset or dispose any of the lands, etc. above rehearsed, as well those to be resigned in favours of the said Lord William, in fee, as these reserved to be disposed by the said Duke of Queensberry, in manner foresaid:"—(observe here, that speaking before of the lands which were to be disposed by the Duke of Queensberry, in the manner stated in former clause, he is to have the power of disposing: the word "dispose" being the self-same word as the word in the prohibitory clause, and mentioned in the statute as one of the words to be used in the prohibitory clause. The word "dispose," in the sense in which it is here used primâ facie, at least means the same as to "dispose of;" for the power of disposing, before rehearsed, is a power to dispose of:—) "or any part thereof; nor to grant infeftments of liferents, nor annualrents, forth of the same: nor to contract debts, nor do any other fact or deed whatsoever, whereby the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, may be adjudged, apprized or otherwise evicted from them, or any of them: nor by any other manner of way whatsoever, to alter or infringe the order and course [353] of succession." So that this prohibitory clause certainly contained every thing that is required.

Then follow the irritant and resolute clauses, and upon them no objection has been made which has given rise to any argument; but then there follows this permissive clause: "It is hereby provided and declared, that notwithstanding of the irritant and resolute clauses above mentioned, it shall be lawful and competent to the heirs of tailzie a-specified, and their foresaids, after the decease of the said

William Duke of Queensberry, to set tacks of the said lands and estate during their own lifetimes, or the lifetimes of the receivers thereof, the same being always set without evident diminution of the rental." Upon this clause, it is said on the one side, that it is a permissive clause; but that according to the construction of Scotch tailzies, the author permitting these tacks, has not prohibited other tacks to be made, unless in addition to what he permits, he states what he prohibits, and therefore they say that this clause cannot prevent the heirs of tailzie from making leases other than those which under this clause they are permitted to make, for they say there is nothing in this tailzie prohibiting their making leases other than they are here permitted to make. On the other hand it is argued, that the obvious meaning of this (I refer to the prima facie, or the English meaning), is, that giving this permission is a ground for saying that all other leases except those which you are here permitted to make, must be understood some how or other to be prohibited to be made, and that the general words which occur in the prohibitory clause, namely, "that he shall neither sell, alienate, wadset, or dispoⁿe," [354] must in all, or some of them, contain a prohibition against leasing, and that it was necessary, in order to make such leases as here permitted, to take them out of the prohibition which is included in these terms, some or one of them, by inserting in the tailzie this permissive clause. In answer to that it has been said, "to sell," means to make sale; "alienate" does not apply to leases, which are personal rights of possession for a time, and although they are made quasi real by the act 1449, it is not in that sense which means an alienation; and so again they said with respect to "wadset" and "dispoⁿe." In the Queensberry entail, we are delivered in some measure from the difficulty which arises from those opposite arguments which I have been just hinting at, by what has already been done in the Wakefield case; in which a lease was made for ninety-seven years of a part of this estate, and it was insisted, that that was a good lease under the instrument which I have now been stating. But it was found in that case by the House of Lords, and I believe indeed by the Court below, that making a ninety-nine years lease was prohibited by the word alienate; and though the word alienate has one peculiar strict sense, namely, the local transfer of dominion of property, it was insisted, it might be construed, by looking at the language of various acts of Parliament and of various instruments; and that whatever might become of a lease of ordinary endurance, that is such a lease as was necessary for the administration of the estate, yet that a tack of ninety-nine years was included under the word alienate.

The deed then goes on to state, "that liferent provisions shall be in full contentation and satisfaction to the wives of the heirs of tailzie in possession of [355] all right of terree." Then it proceeds to impose the obligation on the heirs of tailzie to place no debt upon the estate; and then follows the clause empowering them to lease, with the peculiar expression which occurs also in the Queensberry entail,—"without evident diminution of the rental; and likewise, that it shall be lawful and competent to the said heirs of tailzie to grant suitable and competent liferent provisions in favour of their wives, not exceeding the sum of five thousand merks of yearly free rent of the said estate, and to grant provisions in favour of their children, not exceeding two years free rent of the same." What is to be considered an evident diminution of the rental in the case of the Queensberry entail, has been a great subject of controversy. On the one side, "without evident diminution of the rental" has been represented to mean, that you shall increase the rental if you can, by taking what is the just avail at the time; on the other hand, it is said, it means this, you shall let without diminution of the rental; but as circumstances may arise, in which you cannot get the former rent, you shall then get the just avail at the time.

There is then a clause which occurs in many English entails, and which generally occurs in the entails of Scotland, "that in case the said estate shall, be virtue of this present tailzie, descend and fall to one heir female, the said eldest heir female shall succeed thereto in haill, without division, and so forth successivè, and that they shall be holden to marry one nobleman, or gentleman of quality of the surname of Douglas: at the least, who, and the heirs above mentioned, shall be holden and [356] obliged, as in like manner the haill heirs of tailzie and provision above specified shall be holden and obliged, to assume, take on and use the said surname, and carry the arms of the family of Queensberry, with the proper distinction; and that, in case they shall either not assume the said surname or arms, or make any addition thereto, or at any time desist to use the same, the person so contravening shall ipso facto amit and lose their right, and shall incur all the clauses irritant and resolute above mentioned." Then, "there is reserved to the said William Duke of Queensberry and Lord William Douglas, full power and liberty, during their joint lifetimes allenarly, to alter and innovate the taillie, both as to the substitute heirs, after the heirs male of Lord William's body, and other conditions and clauses above mentioned, as they both shall think fit, but with this express declaration, that if no alteration be made be them during their joint lives, this reservation shall import no power to Lord William to alter the same after the Duke of Queensberry's decease."

Then follows this: "And in regard that the right of the lands and lordship of Neidpath, hereby appointed to be resigned in favours of the said Lord William Douglas, and his foresaids, (besides the saids lands and baronies of Newlands and Lintoun, and tenandry of the Holy Cross Kirk of Peebles, which the said Lord Duke has reserved power to redeem, burden, or dispose upon, in manner above written,) were, by the former infeftments of 1687, redeemable by payment of a twenty-merk piece of gold, conform to the provision of reversion [357] therein specified; and the Duke of Queensberry had otherways power to dispose thereupon, or burden the same, or set tacks thereof, as he thought fit; yet, being resolved now, that the same shall be free to the said Lord William Douglas his son, and his foresaid, from all debts and burdens; therefore the said William Duke of Queensberry has, in contemplation of the marriage, consented to renounce, and by thir presents renounces, quit claims, and simpliciter discharges and overgives, the reservations and clauses contained in the said former infeftment, in so far as concerns the haill lands, baronies and others of the lordship of Neidpath, except the said baronies of Newlands and Lintoun, and tenandry of the Holy Cross Kirk of Peebles, comprehending as said is, and that in favours of the said Lord William Douglas, and the heirs male to be procreate betwixt him and the said Lady Jane Hay; which failing, to the said Lord William his heirs male to be procreate be him in any other lawful marriage." He also renounces the clauses, reservations and reversion contained in the foresaid infeftments, namely, that clause whereby the Duke of Queensberry had power to sell and wadset, or grant infeftments of annualrent, and all other rights irredeemable or under reversion, and to burden the lands with debts; as also that clause whereby his Grace had power to set tacks; and also that clause whereby is reserved to the said Lord Duke of Queensberry power to hold courts, and to use all jurisdictions, and to dispose upon the fines; and likewise "he renounces and discharges in favour of Lord William [358] and the heirs of his body, in so far only as may be extended to the lands particularly a-written, hereby appointed to be resigned in favours of Lord William, and which are not excepted nor reserved to be disposed upon by the Lord Duke of Queensberry, the reversion or provision of redemption contained in the foresaid infeftment or charter of 1687, and all right of redemption competent to him be virtue thereof; which renunciation and discharge of reversion William Duke of Queensberry binds and obliges himself to warrant to Lord William Douglas and his foresaids, at all hands, and against all deadly.—And that the said Lord William Douglas may have a present maintenance for himself and the said Lady Jane Hay, his promised spouse, and their family, during their father's lifetime; therefore the said William Duke of Queensberry gives, grants and dispones to the said Lord William Douglas and his foresaids, the castle, tower," and so on, "and that for the term payable at Martinmas 1693, for the half-year preceding, and in all time thereafter;" and then it gives him power of raising actions, and warrants him against all stipends payable to the ministers of the parish, and from payment of all cess and other public burdens. (I call your attention to the words, "cess, stipends and public burdens," because you will find there is a great contest between the parties with respect to cess, stipends and public burdens, which, if chargeable on the rental, operate as a diminution of the rental.)

Then there is an obligation to infest the Lady Hay during her lifetime, which is not material to [359] be stated; and a clause for provision for daughters, and another clause as to minister's stipends, which will deserve some consideration; but there then follows another clause, which it appears to me right to notice: "And further, that the said William Duke of Queensberry gives, grants, assigns and dispones to Lord William Douglas, the rents which might be due from the lands at the time of the death of the Duke of Queensberry, but which had not been received by him." One of the words used in making this grant of the rents, and not of the lands out of which they arose, is the word "dispose;" and describing the rents he had himself not collected, he says, he grants and dispones such rents, viz. "such as he should not otherways assign or dispose thereupon," he gives them to Lord William, to be collected after his death.

Such is the charter upon which the questions arise with respect to the entail of Neidpath or March.

The entail of Queensberry was made upon the 26th of December 1705, and registered in the Register of Tailzies on the 21st of February 1724, and in the books of Session on the 17th of June 1724. That tailzie is introduced by these words: "Be it known to all men by these presents, Us, James Duke of Queensberry, etc. heritable proprietor of the lands, lordships, baronies, heritable offices and others after specified, with the pertinent: Forasmuch as we having considered the state and condition of James Earl of Drumlanrig, our eldest lawful son, are fully convinced of his weakness of mind, and unfitness to manage our estate, or represent us in our dignities and in our said estate, [360] and being well resolved to leave no place for any question concerning the said James Earl of Drumlanrig, his condition and capacity, after our decease, for preventing all process or arbitrament on that subject, or on the succession to our honours and estate, and also for preventing the snares that may be laid for the said James Earl of Drumlanrig, to the visible prejudice of our estate and family: Therefore, and for the other weighty causes and good considerations us moving, We have thought fit (with and under the reservations, conditions, provisions, limitations, restrictions, clauses, prohibitory, irritant and resolute underwritten, allenarly, and no otherways) to be bound and obliged to sell,"—(here the word sell is certainly used not in the common sense of the word, because this is a gratuitous donation.)—"annailzie and dispose,"—(observe that the word annailzie is in this sentence coupled with dispose)—"heritably and irredeemably,"—(that is one way of disposing)—"to and in favours of ourself in life-rent during all the days of our lifetime, and to Lord Charles Douglas, our second lawful son, and the heirs male lawfully to be procreated of his body, in fee;"—(then it goes through the illustrious family by name, limiting estates to a great many persons, and the heirs of their bodies;)—"reserving always to us our life-rent-right of the said earldom, whole lands, baronies and others above written: as also reserving the life-rent-right of such of the said lands and baronies as Mary Duchess of Queensberry is provided to,"—(viz. the said lands and barony of Sanguhar, comprehending the lands and others contained in her [361] rights and infeftments thereof.)—"as also it is hereby specially provided and declared, that the said Lord Charles Douglas and his heirs male, and the other heirs of tailzie above specified, shall be bound to make payment of all the debts that shall happen to be due by us, and perform all the deeds prestable by us the time of our decease;" and then it is further stated, "that notwithstanding the right of fee of the said whole earldom, lands, baronies and others above specified, be devolved and secured by this personal disposition and tailzie in favours of the said Charles Lord Douglas and his foresaids, and the other heirs of tailzie above mentioned: yet it shall be lawful for us to contract debts which shall affect the said Lord Charles Douglas and the heirs of tailzie, and the foresaid tailzied estate, in the same manner as if they were consenting with us in the several bonds, contracts, obligations, dispositions or other writs whatsoever, to be granted by us, or as if they were served heirs to us in our lands and estate: as also to sell, annailzie and dispose,"—(this is in the reserving clause; and observe how the word annailzie again occurs)—"as also to sell, annailzie and dispose the said lands and others above and after mentioned, in whole or in part, redeemably or irredeemably, for whatsoever cause, or in whatsoever manner of way; and to revoke, alter or innovate this present disposition and tailzie, and order of succession, in whole or in part, and generally to do all other things;" and so on.

Then follows the prohibitory clause, "that it shall not be lawful to the said Lord Charles Douglas, and [362] the heirs male of his body, nor to the other heirs of tailzie above mentioned, or any of them, to sell, wadset or dispose" (omitting the word "alienate") any of the foresaid earldom, lands, baronies, offices, jurisdictions, patronages, and others foresaid, nor any part of the same, nor to grant infeftments of liferent or annual rent out of the same, nor to contract debts, nor do any other fact or deed whereby the same, or any part thereof, may be adjudged, apprised or anywise evicted from them, or any of them."

I pause here to observe, that even some of the judicial opinions, the soundness of which you have now the difficult duty of examining, turn upon the circumstance, that the word "alienate" is omitted in this prohibitory clause; and although in the Wakefield case, by force of that generic term, a lease of ninety-seven years was prohibited, it is held that the word "dispone" will not have the same effect. Some of the learned Judges were of opinion, that they would have the same effect; but they differed very much upon that point. I therefore call your attention to the circumstance, that the word "alienate" is not in the prohibitory clause in the Queensberry entail.

Then follow these words, "except in so far as they are empowered, in manner after mentioned, nor to violate or alter the order of succession foresaid, any manner of way whatsoever:" that is, they are not to "wadset, sell or dispone, nor to contract debts, nor do any other fact or deed, except so far as they are empowered in manner after mentioned, nor to violate or alter the order [363] of succession in any manner whatsoever." Upon these words again arises much argument about permission and about exception. In an English instrument, we should say that a power to make leases being found in the clause of exception, was a ground for arguing, that unless it had been included in the clause of exception, it would be taken to be included by implication in the general words of the prohibition or restriction; but they say, that is a principle not applicable to the law of Scotland. The prohibitory clause farther provides, "that the heirs and descendants of their bodies, so succeeding, shall be obliged in all time coming, upon their succession, to assume, and use, and bear the surname of Douglas, and the title, designation and arms of the family of Queensberry, as their own proper surname, title, designation, and arms." Then follows another clause, which is material: "and the said heirs female shall also be obliged to marry a nobleman or gentleman of the name of Douglas, at least, who shall assume, use and bear the said name and arms of the said family of Queensberry; and if married, the said heirs female and the heirs of their bodies succeeding in manner foresaid, shall assume, use and bear the said name and arms of the said family of Queensberry;" and they are to take the surname of Douglas, with the arms, &c. of the family.

Then follows this: "and that the said Lord Charles Douglas, nor the other heirs of tailzie above specified, shall not set tacks nor rentals of the said lands for any longer space than the setter's lifetime, or for nineteen years."—(One great point [364] of dispute between the parties here is, whether certain leases, the particulars of which I shall mention hereafter, are leases for longer than the setter's life or nineteen years, and if they are, whether they are prohibited under the word "dispone," and the other words here used:)—"and that without diminution of the rental, at the least, at the just avail for the time." In the course of this cause, much discussion and most able reasons for the opinions on both sides have been stated, with respect to what these words, "without diminution of rental," mean. Those who take one side say, that it means no more than this, that if the land was let at the time of granting the new lease, for £3, and it is let again for £3, that is no diminution of the rental; others say, that if you let it for £3 when you might let it for £300, there is a diminution of the rental within the meaning of these Scotch entails; that if instead of letting it for more than £3 you take a sum of money equal to the difference of value between £3 and £300, true it is, in one sense, you do not let it with diminution of rental, because the rent is still £3; yet that the operation of the law of Scotland upon the fact of your commuting the difference in rental between £3 and £300 for a sum of money put into your own pocket, is such, that though you have reserved to the persons to take after you a rent of £3, it is demonstrable, that by the operation of such a law, £3 is a diminished rental. How justly either of those propositions are stated, it is not for me to enter into now, when I am merely stating the facts of the case.

Then follow the words, "nor doe no other fact [365] or deed, civil or criminal, directly or indirectly, by treason or otherwise, in any sort, whereby the said tailzied lands and estate, or any part thereof, may be affected,"—(it is further contended, that what has been done by the late Duke of Queensberry was prohibited by these words,)—"apprised, adjudged, forefaulted, or any manner of way evicted from the said heirs of tailzie, or this present tailzie, in order of succession, thereby prejudged, hurt or changed."

Then follow these words, (which are important words for our consideration, if the law of Scotland operates upon the rent of £3 in such manner as it has been argued :) "neither shall the said Lord Charles Douglas, nor any of the said heirs of tailzie, suffer the duties of ward, marriage, and relief, either simple or taxed, nor the feu, blanch and teind duties, nor any other public burdens or duties whatsoever, payable forth of the said tailzied lands and estate, to run on unsatisfied, so as therefor the lands and others foresaids may be evicted, apprised or adjudged from them, for any of the said casualties or superiority, and public burdens *."

Then, after making the irritant and resolute clauses, and also directing that the heirs and parties succeeding should denude on existence of a nearer [366] heir, there follow provisions to spouses of male or female heirs, and provisions for daughters and younger children, and reserving the question, how far we are at liberty to look into such circumstances with regard to such entail; and not forgetting the principles of interpretation, as applied to entails, it has always struck me, that those clauses would be very material clauses to be considered: "And notwithstanding of the premisses, it is hereby provided and declared, and shall be provided and declared by the infestment to follow hereupon, and whole subsequent conveyances of the said tailzied land and estate, that it shall be lawful to, and in the power of the said Lord Charles Douglas, and of the other heirs of tailzie above specified, whether male or female, to provide and infest their lawful spouses in competent liferent provisions, of a part of the said lands and estates, not exceeding the sum of £1000 sterling of yearly rent: and if there shall happen to be two liferent provisions upon the said estate, then and in that case the second liferent provision, during the existence of the first, shall not exceed £800 sterling;"—(so that if there were two, there might be provisions for spouses, to the amount of £1800 a year, affecting the estate at the same time:)—"and if there shall happen to be a third liferent provision upon the said estate, then the same shall not exceed £500 sterling, during the existence of the other two liferent provisions:" (so that there might be £2300 required for these jointures.)

Then there is this clause: "And also it is hereby further provided and declared, and shall be declared by the infestments to follow hereupon, and [367] all the subsequent conveyances of the said estate, that it shall be lawful to, and in the power of the said Lord Charles Douglas, or any of the said heirs of tailzie, to burden the said estate with any sum not exceeding the sum of fourscore thousand pounds Scots, for providing of their daughters or younger children." So that there might be three-and-twenty hundred pounds a year charged upon and issuing out of the rent of this estate by way of jointure, and likewise this sum of money for children, amounting to between six and seven thousand pounds. These are considerable burdens upon an estate, if it can be dealt with in the manner in which it is contended it can be by such tacks as have been made; but still we must take into our consideration, that whatever may be the effect of reasoning of that kind, the question at last results to this, what according to the general rule of interpretation as fixed by decision on Scots tailzies, you are at liberty to reason from such circumstances as those to which I have been alluding.

During some part of the time which has elapsed since these tailzies were made, these estates of March and Neidpath undoubtedly (and the estate of Queensberry too) have been let on leases for such terms and upon such grasssums as I shall have occasion to mention; and it is a circumstance unquestionably of considerable weight, that leases of that nature were made by persons who stood connected with the heirs of tailzie, and holding judicial situations, from which it is fairly enough inferred, that they must have been acting upon their notions of what was the law of Scotland at the time.

* Here the Lord Chancellor entered into a discussion as to the effect of taking grasssum upon the rent, the operation of law upon the transaction, and the consequence of the principle established in the Scotch courts by their final decision as to teind-duties, and the mode in which grasssum is to be taken into calculation in the estimate of rent for the payment of those duties. The discussion is omitted here, because it is afterwards resumed to the same effect. See post.

When the late Duke of Queensberry came into [368] possession, he seems to have done acts of which I shall say no more, than that his Grace appears to me to have intended to make as much of the estate as the powers he had would enable him to make, and no court of justice has a right to say that there was any thing wrong in that intention. The leases of Easter Harestanes and of Whiteside, the set of leases which have been called "alternate leases," and the leases sought to be affected at the suit of the Duke of Buccleuch, particularly the lease of a farm called Hallscar, are the most material to be considered. There are some other leases of minor note, which I shall not trouble you with in the detail of the facts and circumstances. They may be very easily disposed of, when you have determined what is your judicial opinion as to the others.

Case of Harestanes.—The lease of Easter Harestanes was granted under the Neidpath entail, in which it is declared, that the heirs of tailzie are not to sell, alienate, wadset or dispose, nor to grant infefments of liferent, nor annualrent. There is no prohibition of any sort against granting leases; but the deed contains a permissive clause, by which "It is expressly provided and declared, that notwithstanding of the irritant and resolute clauses above mentioned, it shall be lawful and competent for the heirs of tailzie above specified, and their foresaids, after the decease of the said William Duke of Queensberry, to set tacks or rentals of the said lands and estate during their own lifetimes, or the lifetimes of the receivers thereof, the same being always set without evident diminution of the rental." The late Duke had granted a lease to Alexander Welsh of the lands of Easter [369] Harestanes for fifty-seven years. The entry of the tenant was at the term of Whitsunday 1791: the rent payable was £74 ls. sterling; and it was further stipulated, that the tenant should pay the sum of £300 of grassum, or entry money. In consequence of proceedings (in the Wakefield case) which had taken place before the Court with respect to a lease for ninety-seven years, under the same entail, Welsh brought an action of declarator against the late Duke of Queensberry, the late Francis Earl of Wemyss, and the late Francis Charteris Lord Elcho, his eldest son, as the next heirs of entail, setting forth, that as some doubts had arisen with regard to the validity of the lease, he had brought the action, to have it found and declared, that it was a valid and sufficient title in his person for all the years of its endurance then to run. The action having come before Lord Woodhouselee, the defenders were assolizied by an interlocutor of the 25th of June 1808; this lease for fifty-seven years, as the lease for ninety-seven years, being, in the judgment of the Court, prohibited by the prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses contained in the entail of the Neidpath estate.

Lord Wemyss and Lord Elcho having both died, an action of transference was raised, and the suit was, to use our expression, revived. On the 6th of December 1809, the Lord Ordinary having considered the memorials for the parties, and whole cause, repels the reasons of declarator, assolizies from the conclusions of the libel, and decerns; that is, again stating his opinion that the lease was bad; "but he reserved to the pursuer, (that is the tenant,) [370] his recourse upon the warrandice in his tack against the Duke of Queensberry and his representatives, in the event that the said tack should be set aside, as ultra vires of the granter, in a regular process brought for that effect." The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the lease was good for nothing, regard being had to the nature of the entail: but that the late Duke of Queensberry having entered into a warranty, his assets were answerable to the tenant for such damages as would compensate him for the loss of his tack: and as those assets will be equally affected by his warrandice as to all the tacks, it becomes a question of very great value as between the parties in the cause; but the value is trifling, compared with the extreme importance of the case, as establishing a rule for the administration of property.

After this decision the late Earl of Wemyss brought an action of declarator against the late Duke of Queensberry: in which he stated, that William Duke of Queensberry, in the year 1731, made up his titles under this entail, but notwithstanding the limitation therein contained of the powers of the heir of entail in setting tacks, he had set or granted tacks or leases of different parts or parcels of the said lands and estates, to endure for a longer term or period than his own lifetime, or the lifetime of the receivers thereof: and that the said tacks or leases had been granted, upon payment by the tenants of fines or grassums, and with diminution of the rental: he then alleged that he was the heir of entail, and entitled to succeed to the lands and estates on failure of the Duke of Queensberry, and the heirs-male of his body; that the tacks or leases had been granted [371] to the manifest prejudice of his eventual right and interest as heir of entail, and therefore he prayed that the Duke, and all those tenants whom he names, should be convened before the Lords of Council, and that it should be found and declared by their decree, that it was not competent to, nor in the power of the said William Duke of Queensberry, to set or grant any tacks or leases of any part of the entailed estates to endure for a longer period than his own lifetime, or the lifetime of the tenants receivers thereof, except in terms of, and under the provisions of the act for encouraging the improvement of lands in Scotland held under settlements of strict entail, nor to grant any tack of the lands and estate in consideration of fines or grassums, and thereby diminish the rental; and that all such tacks and leases so granted, either for a longer period than prescribed by the entail, (unless they are in the terms of the act of Parliament,) or upon the payment of grassums by the tenants, are void and null, and should be of no effect as against the heir of entail.

This action was remitted to the previous process of declarator at the instance of Welsh, depending before Lord Woodhouselee. A representation having been given in for Welsh against Lord Woodhouselee's interlocutor, there was another interlocutor pronounced: "Having heard parties procurators upon what is stated in the representation, the Lord Ordinary recalls the interlocutor complained of; and in respect the action of declarator at the instance of the Earl of Wemyss against the Duke of Queensberry and others his tenants is now remitted to the present process, [372] conjoins the processes;" then there is the usual direction in that respect.

The Duke of Queensberry died soon afterwards. There was an action of transference against his representatives; and on the 12th of November 1812, the case having been then reported, the following interlocutor was pronounced by the First Division of the Court. "Upon the report of the Lord President in place of Lord Woodhouselee, and having advised the informations for the parties, the Lords sustain the defences in the process of declarator at the instance of Alexander Welsh against the Earl of Wemyss and others, substitutes under the deed of entail; and assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the libel, and decern;" that is, the whole Court then concur with the Lord Ordinary, and hold that this lease for such a rent and such a grassum, and such a term, was not a good lease. Then they "remit to Lord Hermand to hear parties on the conclusions of the libel for damages, and to do therein as he shall see just." And with respect to the process of declarator at the instance of the Earl of Wemyss against the late Duke of Queensberry, and John Anderson and others, tenants of the tailzied lands and estate of Queensberry and others, they also remit the said process to Lord Hermand as Ordinary, in place of Lord Woodhouselee, to hear parties on the conclusions of the same as applicable to the cases of the several defenders, and to do therein as he shall see just. The interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session pronounces, that Welsh cannot sustain his lease against the persons who are [373] the heirs of entail; but the interlocutor on the declarator of the Earl of Wemyss against the subtenants, leaves the heirs of entail to proceed, in order to determine whether they can substantiate their declarator, against each and every of those tenants mentioned in that declarator; those tenants having leases which were of the same nature as those sought to be affected by that action of declarator.

The case of Easter Harestanes includes two questions, the first, Whether a fifty-seven years lease is an alienation? you have decided that a ninety-seven years lease is an alienation;—and there are some decisions that leases between fifty-seven and ninety-seven are alienations:—another question is, What is the effect of the grassum which was taken in this case of Easter Harestanes? that is a question common to that and the other cases: with respect to the duration of the lease— the fifty-seven years furnishes a question peculiar to that case.

Case of Whiteside. The next case which was before the Judges of the First Division, was the case of the lease of Whiteside, and with respect to that lease, it was a lease for the life of the tenant. The rent was not less than the rent which was payable under the former lease, but it was insisted that this was a lease made for a grassum, and that therefore it ought to be reduced. The fact that it was made for a grassum, is a finding clear in the case. This farm had been let, together with two other farms; they were afterwards divided in the manner stated in these cases. There is no doubt that Whiteside, which is mentioned as having been let for the same rent, was let upon a grassum; and that the rent in this lease was affected by the [374] amount of the cess, and rogue and bridge money, with which it was not let by the former lease.

There was a special interlocutor, first of Lord Hermand, then of the Lords of Session, with respect to this lease; and in order that the case may be fully comprehended and properly decided, it is necessary that the interlocutors should be read: "Having advised the condescendence and answers, in the process of reduction at the instance of the Earl of Wemyss and March against William Murray, and whole processes, conjoins this process with the declaratory action between the parties depending before the Lord Ordinary, in so far as the declarator is applicable to the present case: Finds it stated in the condescendence, and not denied in the answers, that the whole farms, whereof the leases are now under reduction, were formerly let by the late Duke of Queensberry for fifty-seven years; and, with an exception stated by the defender of the lands of Flemington and Crook, under burden of grassums, the interest of which bore a considerable proportion to the yearly rent: Finds it admitted in the answers, that in or about the year 1807, many of the tenants holding leases for fifty-seven years, renounced their leases, and took new ones for periods equal to the terms unexpired of the old ones, but without paying any grassums for their new leases; and that soon afterwards, the tenants of all the farms to which the present discussion relates, whether they had got new leases of the nature above mentioned, or had continued to possess on their fifty-seven years leases, executed renunciations, and accepted [375] of the existing leases, for which they paid no grassums; as also, that when the tenants renounced their former leases, and took the present ones, contracts were entered into betwixt them and the Duke's commissioner Mr. Tait, as stated in the condescendence: Finds, that although it be stated by the respondent, that, depending on a contingency not explained, but said not to have existed, these contracts never were acted upon, yet they afford evidence to show, that the new leases were, with the exception of the term of endurance, a surrogatum or substitute for those which had been renounced: Finds, that the rents payable under these renounced leases, must, of necessity, have been, from the inconvenience and loss arising to the tenants from the advance of money, a consideration of the doubts of the powers of the lessor, held out in the contracts and other circumstances, have suffered a greater reduction than the amount of the interest of the sums paid in name of grassum: Finds, that the entail founded on by the parties in this cause, contains a clause by which it is expressly provided and declared, that notwithstanding of the irritant and resolute clauses above mentioned, it shall be lawful and competent to the heirs of tailzie therein specified, and their foresaids, after the death of the said William Duke of Queensberry, to set tacks of the lands and estate during their own lifetimes, or the lifetimes of the receivers thereof, the same being always set without evident diminution of the rental: Finds, that the rent payable under the renounced leases, diminished as it [376] was by the payment of grassums, cannot be considered as constituting a fair rental, such as is implied in the above clause: Finds, that the lease under reduction, though it might be supported by the first part of that clause, as granted for the lifetime of the receiver, is cut down by the concluding part of it being set with evident diminution of the rental." Then he repels the defences.

When this came before the Court, they pronounced this interlocutor: "They find, that the entail in question contains a strict prohibition against alienation; but a permission to grant tacks of the said lands and estate during their own lifetimes, or the lifetimes of the receivers thereof, the same being always set without evident diminution of the rental: Find, that in the year 1769, the petitioner's father obtained a tack of Whiteside for nineteen years, at a rent of £109, for which he paid a fine or grassum of £132 18s. 10d.: Find, that in the year 1775, the petitioner's father obtained from William Duke of Queensberry a tack of the farm of Fingland for twenty-five years, at the rate of £50 10s., for which he paid a grassum of £480: Find, that in the year 1788, he renounced this lease, of which twelve years were to run, and obtained a new lease, for fifty-seven years, of the said farm of Fingland, and also of the farms of Whiteside and Flemington, at the rent of £260 16s. 4d., being the amount of the old rents payable under the former tacks, with the addition of the cess, and rogue and bridge money, amounting to £11 odds, for which he paid [377] a grassum of £400, which was declared to be for Whiteside and Fingland only: Find, that in the year 1807, the petitioner's father renounced the said tacks and took new tacks to himself and sons for their lifetimes, at the rents payable under the tacks renounced: Find, that this current tack must be held merely as a substitute for the former ones, and subject to any objections, on the ground of grassum, diminution of rental, or otherwise, which were competent against the tacks renounced: Find, that in estimating the rents of Whiteside and Fingland, the value of the fines or grassums paid at the commencement of the former tacks ought to have been added to the annual-rent: Find, that this was not done, and that the new rent was made the same as the old rent, plus the cess and bridge money: Find, that this was not equal to the value of the grassums taken, and therefore that the said last tack of Whiteside and Fingland was set with evident diminution of the rent, and in violation of the said clause in the entail: Further find, that the conversion of part of the new rent into a fine or grassum of £100 was to the manifest prejudice of the succeeding heirs of entail, and operated as an alienation pro tanto of the uses and profits of the estate; therefore, although the said tacks in point of endurance do fall within the permission of the entail above referred to, find that they are struck at by the clause prohibiting alienation, as well as by the condition in the said permissive clause against evident diminution of the rent; therefore, in the process of declarator, repel the defences; and in [378] the process of reduction, repel the defences, sustain the reasons of reduction, and reduce, decern and declare accordingly." And there was an additional interlocutor with respect to the lease of Flemington, which it is not necessary I should state to your Lordships. The principle therefore laid down in the declaration is, that this lease operates against the prohibition of alienation, and also amounts to an evident diminution of rental.

Case of alternative leases.—With respect to Neidpath, there was a third case as to the alternative leases. I will state enough to show what is meant by that term. There was a farm called Edstoun. In the year 1731, when the Duke of Queensberry succeeded to the estate, it was rented at the sum of £83 10s. In 1756, the rent was raised to £85 12s. In 1769, it was let for nineteen years to Alexander Horsburgh and John Saltoun, at a rent of £149, with a grassum of £193 7s. 4d. When that lease expired, a gentleman of the name of Symington obtained a lease for fifty-seven years from Whitsunday 1792; the rent stipulated upon that occasion was £155 7s., and the grassum £300. In 1807, Robert Symington renounced his lease, and obtained a new one,—which is the lease sought to be set aside,—“for the space of thirty-one years, and from and after the term of Whitsunday 1807, which is hereby declared to have been the term of the said Robert Symington's entry, notwithstanding the date hereof; declaring always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that in case it shall be found that the said William Duke of Queensberry is prevented by the entail of his [379] Grace's estate of March, from granting a lease of the aforesaid subjects for the above-mentioned term of thirty-one years, then, and in that case, this lease is granted for, and shall subsist, and be understood to have been granted for, the term of twenty-nine years, twenty-seven years, twenty-five years, twenty-one years, or nineteen years, from the said term of Whitsunday 1807, whichever of the said several terms of years, from the said term of Whitsunday 1807, (short of the aforesaid period of thirty-one years), the Court of Session or House of Lords shall find to be the longest period of those above specified, for which the said Duke had power to grant a valid lease of the aforesaid subjects.”

In the narrative of this lease, it appears to be a lease the duration of which is to depend upon the decision, when it is obtained, of the Court of Session or the House of Lords, whether it is to be a lease for twenty-nine years, twenty-seven years, twenty-five years, twenty-one years, or nineteen years. Now, according to the law of Scotland, there must be what they call an ish (that is a determination) to a lease: But no man living can tell what it is to be in this lease, until the Court of Session or the House of Lords have said in that or some other case what it may be. This is a lease, which one party says cannot be exposed to challenge, on account of a grassum being taken: the other party says it can, and ought to be affected upon that ground. The Court of Session held at first, that the limit of the Duke's power was nineteen years; but they say the whole transaction is affected by that general fraud which affects the in-[380]strument; and that therefore, though the lease might be a good lease, notwithstanding the determination of it is uncertain, for some period stated in it, yet it is affected by the general fraud.

These are the cases which appear to me necessary to be stated. I pass over the minor cases.

Points and arguments in the three cases.—1. Harestanes.—The points with respect to these three sets of leases, may be thus shortly stated. First with respect to Easter Harestanes; the lessees and the representatives of the late Duke of Queensberry contend, that the Duke had power to grant such a lease; that the decided cases prove the power of granting such leases; that the entail, according to its legal construction, does not prohibit granting leases for fifty-seven years, and that, whatever may be the case with respect to a lease for ninety-seven years, a lease for fifty-seven years cannot be objected to; they say, that the rent being equal to the last rent reserved, is equal to that which the law requires; and being equal to that which the law requires, that grassum is not prohibited by entail, or by any implication, or by any fair understanding of the words in the entail. It was further insisted, that the lease was within the meaning of the statute of 1449, and that the act is in complete force at the present day; though leases are not in the law of Scotland conveyances, but mere incumbrances on the fee or property, and only so made by the statute, inasmuch as the lessees cannot be ejected during their terms while they pay their rents. The words of the act are, "It is ordained for the safety and favour of the poor people that labour the ground, that they, and all others that have taken, or shall take lands in time to come [381] from lords, and have terms and years thereof, that suppose the lords sell or annaillie the lands, the takers shall remain with the tack until the issue of their terms, whose hands soever the lands come to, for sicklike mail (that is the same rent) they took them for." And they say, that by virtue of this statute, the tenant of Harestanes paying a grassum, is entitled to his lease.

Upon this statute, the effect of the word annaillie must be considered. We have decided, that a lease for ninety-seven years is void as an alienation. The present question is, how far that may apply as an authority to a lease for fifty-seven years.

The successor in the tailzie contended, that a lease of this endurance is prohibited by the entail; that any leases of extraordinary endurance are prohibited; that with respect to the statute of 1449, it authorizes only such leases as may be lawfully made, not such as contravene the prohibitions of an entail; that the lease is bad on various grounds, all of which they proceed to state, if made for a grassum. They contend, that the practice did not sanction such leases; and that practice, if proved to exist, could not sanction such leases.

2. Whiteside.—With respect to Whiteside lease, the argument on one side was, that such a lease does not fall under the prohibition to alienate, because deeds of entail are by the settled rules of interpretation in the Scotch law strictissimi juris, and a prohibition to alienate, according to such rules of interpretation, does not extend to leasing, and when the entail is so interpreted, does not extend to a lease of ordinary endurance, though granted in consideration of [382] grassum; that the lease being granted for a term, and at the rent permitted by the entail, the grassum worked no injury. They further contended, that a man who is permitted to let without diminution of the rental, if he lets without diminution of rental, does no injury to the person who is to take after him, because, if he takes no grassum, the person to take after him cannot complain; and if he takes a grassum, he still takes that which he may take, and that there cannot be a complaint if the lease is granted for that length with a grassum; that the rentals of Whiteside and Fingland were not, in the sense of the deed, diminished by the grassum being taken, and that therefore the lease cannot be said to be set with a diminution of the rental; and further, they insisted that neither the Duke nor the tenants were guilty of any fraud in this matter; that in his own particular dealing, the Duke was not, by the general and comprehensive deed he entered into with all his tenants, guilty of fraud upon the entail, if what fraud upon the entail can be defined. Then they rely upon the practice; they say all landed proprietors do, and for a very long period have let with grassum. As to the words, "without diminution of rental," they must be construed, they say, with reference to former leases, or leases immediately preceding; that it was so with respect to church and crown lands; that it has been so to a vast extent with respect to a vast number of estates; that it appears by a long series of decisions, that such a prohibition to let with a diminution of the rental, did not prohibit the letting with grassums. They further insist, that if there was any irritancy, that irritancy might be purged.

[383] The heir of entail, on the other hand, says, that the lease is comprehended under the prohibitions of the entail; that the construction which is put upon the word rental on the other side, is not the proper construction; that grassum is anticipated rent, within the meaning of the deed of entail, and that it is so when taken upon surrender of former leases; that such dealing with the estate 's within the meaning of the words diminution of rental; that upon a lease, twelve years of which were unexpired, if the tenant renounces the lease, and takes another lease, extending the term twelve years, that the grassum taken for the first lease must have some operation.

The tenant contends, that whatever may be the case as between the Duke of Queensberry's representatives as standing in his place, according to all the principles of law which ought to affect his case, he is the tenant, and ought to be considered as a third party; that he is a purchaser, that he is contracting onerously, that he is entitled by virtue of the statute of 1449, and he prays that, whether his lease is a good lease or not, the Court will not consider what the case of any other persons may be, because he happens to have a good recourse against the assets of the late Duke of Queensberry. Then he insists, that all the prohibitions must be embodied in expression, that there is no prohibition embodied in expression, and that the irritancy (if any) may be purged.

3. Alternative leases.—With respect to the alternative leases, as far as the points made on each side arise out of the facts of the case, they insist that those leases are bad, on the same grounds as all the other leases that are to be affected by a grassum; and they say it is impos-[334]-sible that the law can be such, that when a lease is executed, neither the heir nor any body else who is to succeed him, can tell whether the lease is for thirty years, twenty-nine years, twenty-seven years, twenty-five years, twenty-one years, or nineteen years.

These include all the points with respect to the Neidpath estate.

Queensberry leases.—With respect to the Duke of Buccleuch's case: That came before the other Division of the Court of Session, and the two Courts differ altogether in their views of the law on this most important question.

The Duke of Buccleuch's leases relate to the entail of the estate of Queensberry; and without going through all the particulars of the leases which have been granted upon that estate, they may be represented generally as being leases granted for long periods, grassums being taken upon those leases, and first leases granted to tenants in those tacks which were current, or to strangers under the burden of the current tacks, and with obligations in both cases, to grant a new lease annually for nineteen years during the Duke's life. With respect to that species of lease, they say, that it is not only affected by the circumstance of grassums having been taken, but that it is to be considered as a lease for more than the Duke's life or nineteen years; they say it is a lease for the Duke's life and nineteen years; to which it is answered, that is not a lease for more than the lifetime of the setter or for nineteen years, because, in order to make the lease good, there must be possession, and that the possession is a possession which at the death of the Duke of Queensberry must [385] be referred to the lease then actually existing; and in truth and in fact they say, whatever it may be, in semblance and appearance, it is nothing but a lease for the life of the person or for nineteen years.

There is a second class of leases, where the current leases had actually expired.

There is a third class of leases granted without an obligation of renewal, but where the leases renounced were not near their natural expiry; and there were other leases which were not granted till the previous leases had expired, but on which grassums were taken. The validity of those leases was not only discussed in the general case of the Duke of Buccleuch, but also in the case of one of the tenants. With respect to the tenant's right, he insisted likewise upon the circumstance, that he was an onerous purchaser.

In this case, the Second Division of the Court of Session declared the particular lease before them was good, and that the leases in general were good; and in this state of things, the cause came before this House, when you were pleased to make a remit, which has brought before you the collective opinion of both Divisions of the Court of Session, by which it appears that there is great diversity of opinion among the Judges.

One of the defences of the Duke of Buccleuch, in one of those actions, stated that "the deceased Duke of Queensberry succeeded to the estate of Queensberry in the year 1778, as an heir of entail under the foresaid deed of tailzie, and made up titles accordingly under the conditions therein contained: but after entering on the possession of the estate, he [386] did not, as the leases gradually expired, let the lands at the just avail for the time, in terms of the entail, but granted leases for nineteen years below the true value, and in consideration of large grassums received; and after having continued this system for a period of eighteen or nineteen years, during which time he had consequently drawn a grassum for the letting of every farm on the estate, not satisfied with the slower mode of again exacting grassums as the leases might periodically fall, he, from the desire of speedily raising a large sum of money to add to his great wealth, and with the view of defeating the prohibitions contained in the said deed of tailzie, thought fit, about the year 1796, when the whole estate was under current leases, which had been granted by himself, to form a device, without waiting for the expiry of these leases, of letting anew the whole estate, both for his own lifetime and for nineteen years after his decease, and also in diminution of the rental, contrary to the conditions of the entail;" and then it proceeds to state what the Duke of Queensberry had done in pursuance of that device, contending that it was a fraudulent use of his power, and that there might be a fraudulent use of the power of the heir of entail, although what he did in the execution of this power might be within the letter of the power under which he professed to act. Then they say, "that these were not proper leases, but complex contracts, conveying away the lands for a term of years, partly for yearly rent, but in great part for a grassum or price payable to the Duke himself, because they were granted for [387] a space longer than the setter's lifetime or nineteen years; the obligation of renewal being part of the contract, and elongating the term of possession for which the lands were let; and because the leases were not let for the just avail, but for a rent known and intended to be inadequate, and for less than that avail; and because they were let with diminution of the rental actually existing previous to letting them, the Duke having previously, by grassums, received an additional rent for the lands beyond that stipulated in these leases."

Upon the remit, two orders were made by this House, one with respect to the tenant, and the other with respect to the general cause; which latter (Dom. Proc. July 10, 1817) was, "that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to review generally the interlocutor complained of in the said appeal: and in reviewing the same, the Court is to have especial regard to the fact, that this action of declarator is brought by the executors and trust-disponees of the late Duke of Queensberry, as such, against the heir of tailzie, seeking thereby to establish, unconditionally, all and each of the numerous tacks mentioned in the summons, and granted by the said Duke, in the manner and under the circumstances mentioned in the pleadings, and is not instituted by any of the persons to whom such tacks are granted, nor are any such persons parties thereto: that the Court do reconsider the defences of the appellant, and especially whether, in a question between such parties, the leases so granted ought or ought not to be considered as granted in execution of such device, [388] as is alleged in the said defences: and if so granted, whether the same ought to be considered as granted in fraud of the entail, and are not such as ought on that account, or any other account appearing in the pleadings, to be held invalid, or not to be sustained at the instance of the pursuers, as representing the Duke: and in reviewing the interlocutor complained of, the Court do particularly also reconsider what is the legal effect of the word 'dispone,' contained in the deed of tailzie of the 26th December 1705, with reference to tacks of lands comprised in the said deed; and further, do consider what is the effect, with reference to such tacks, of all other parts of the said deeds which relate to tacks, having regard to the endurance of such tacks, and to the fact of grassums being or not being paid upon the granting thereof, or paid upon the granting of former leases: and all other the terms and conditions upon which such tacks were made: and to the effect of such grassums, terms and conditions, in reducing the amount of the clear rent receivable by the heir of tailzie: and to all the circumstances under which the appellant has alleged, and it shall appear that the late Duke of Queensberry granted all such tacks." And then this was addressed to the Second Division,—“that the Court to which this remit is made, do require the opinion of the Judges of the other Division in the matters and questions of law in this case in writing; which Judges of the other Division are so to give, and communicate the same; and after so reviewing the said interlocutor complained of, the said Court do and decern in this cause as may be just.”

[389] There are in print the opinions of all the Judges which have been taken in consequence of this remit. Upon these opinions I will make only this observation: I am either bound to suppose, that the question about the Duke of Queensberry's declarator, as contradistinguished from the proceedings of declarators in general, by the circumstances which are stated in this case, was not a question understood, or that it was a question thought of so little importance, as certainly not to produce information enough from those opinions, to enable those who thought that question of any weight, to look at them, to resolve any doubts they might feel.

There was no ground to attribute to me, that I felt a notion that an action of declarator was not the form in which the representatives of the late Duke of Queensberry could proceed in the Court of Session, in order to have it declared that these leases were good. I knew that was the species of action which would be brought in the Court of Session; but the remit was made in the Duke of Buccleuch's case; and the reason of making the remit in that form was, that in the proceedings of the trustees of the Duke of Queensberry against the Duke of Buccleuch, they not only sought to have these leases substantiated, but to be protected from all claims of damages, on the ground that they were good. Much of the contest in this case went on this ground, that whatever might be the effect of granting one such lease on the payment of a grassum, yet there might be such a conduct on the part of the heir of entail in possession, such a comprehensive and vast dealing, buying up the leases of tenants, making them renounce their leases, and letting all the lands [390] upon such a general system, as to amount to fraud, and although it might be the most difficult thing in the world with respect to tenant A. or tenant B. or tenant C. to say it was a fraud on the entail, yet that there might be such a thing as a fraud upon the entail nobody in the course of that matter disputed. The question under these circumstances was, whether those who were the representatives of the late Duke of Queensberry had a right to interpose to have all those leases declared good instruments, although it might be very fit to know how far the lease of A. or B. or C. or D. was or was not connected with that system of fraudulent management, and whether, notwithstanding that system of fraudulent management, you could prevent a particular tenant having a declarator, if he was entitled to it in an action of declarator, that his lease was a good lease.

In the case of the Roxburghe feus,* where the heir of entail having a power to feu such part of the lands as he should think fit, provided his grants were not made in diminution of the rental, etc. and the heir feued all the lands, taxing the casualties, the House of Lords decided, that this was making such a use of the power of entail, as a court of Justice would not permit. As between the Duke and his tenant, if there were no other parties in the cause, you might decide in favour of the leases: but here there might be one principle, it was argued throughout, on which to contend against the Duke of Queensberry, yet a principle that would not enable you to contend against all his tenants, or most of his tenants.

[391] When the Court of Session was asked, by the terms of the remit, whether the action was an action which he could have maintained, if it was made out that there was in the leases that device, and that fraud upon the entail which the Duke of Buccleuch insisted made part of the system of the Duke of Queensberry, I had not the least idea that it would be considered as a remit, desiring to be informed, whether a man could in the ordinary case proceed by action of declarator. The particular circumstances that led to that particular remit, were of some such sort as I have been alluding to; and I must say, that the remit in its nature has not been well understood, and that it has not received the answer which was expected.

* Ker v. Roxburghe, Dom. Proc. 18 Dec. 1813. MSS. and 2 Dow. 119

The majority of the Judges seem to have been of opinion, that these leases were good; that grassums could not affect them. And with respect to the word "dispose," the majority of them were of opinion, that the word "dispose" would have the same effect as the word "alienate."

After these proceedings, from this interlocutor, (this case embracing the general consideration, and the additional circumstance that there is an onerous purchaser,) the appeal now comes back to this House. The several points which seem to have been stated in the Courts below, and discussed, involving the merits of the question upon this remit, were, with very little alteration, the same points on both sides as before submitted to the Court.

In the March and Neidpath entail, the clause about setting tacks is a permissive clause, that is, "notwithstanding the irritant and resolute clauses [392] above mentioned, it shall be lawful and competent for the heirs of tailzie above specified, and their foresaids, after the decease of the said William Duke of Queensberry, to set tacks or rentals of the said lands and estate during their own lifetimes, or the lifetimes of the receivers thereof, the same being always set without evident diminution of the rental."

In the Buccleuch entail, the question arises upon the prohibitory clause, that is to say, the clause against disposing in any manner of way whatsoever, "except so far as they are empowered in manner after mentioned." The clause then which relates to tacks and rentals, is a clause that they shall not do so and so, it is therefore a prohibitory clause in the terms of it, but still seems to be in some degree permissive also, by the words "except so far as they are empowered in manner after mentioned."

To the March and Neidpath entail, there is subjoined a paper which has this denomination: "Rental of the lands, teinds and others, lying within the sheriffdom of Peebles and Selkirk respectivè, which did pertain to John Earl of Tweeddale, and John Lord Yester his son, and were sold and disposed by them to William Duke of Queensberry in liferent, and to Lord William Douglas, his second lawful son, and their heirs of tailzie therein mentioned, in fee, conform to the disposition thereof of the date the 19th day of October last," and which has particular relation to this present rental. Then they state what the lands are let at. There is, first in the parish of Lyne, I think they call it, the sum or rent of £5840 Scots; then follows this, "Paid out of this in sti-[393]-pend to the minister of Lyne, £466 13s. 4d. Item, deduced for the teinds of Scroggs, £66 13s. 4d." the sum of the deduction so much; and then follow the words, "remains of neat rent, £5306." They then proceed to state the rent in Peebles parish, where the sum of rent is £2428 6s. 8d.; "paid out of this of tack-duty to the parson, £66 13s. 4d.; to the vicar, so much;" there then rests of neat rent £2348 6s. 8d. It is not necessary to particularize the whole; but it goes through the several items of property which yield rent, stating the sum of rent, and stating what remains of neat rent, and then it concludes summing up the whole foregoing rental contained in the preceding four pages, which extends to the sum of £17,002 13s. 10 pennies Scots, which I take to be the amount, not of what is called the rack-rents, but of the rents, making the deductions which give the quantum of the revenues.

According to the law of Scotland at the time when this tailzie was executed, in calculating the teinds, the estimate was made by looking only at the rent reserved, and no benefit was given in that valuation to those who were entitled to the teinds with respect to any grassums that had been taken: but at a period long subsequent to this, the Court of Session having reconsidered the statutes, with reference to this matter of teinds, put a construction upon the words * "the rents of lands constantly paying;" [394] and held, that under these words they were entitled to say that a grassum was worth so much with reference to the calculation of rent, and that, instead of estimating the teinds by the rent reserved, they would take a proportion of the grassum, though the land did not constantly pay that grassum, and consider as the rent not the rent which the land constantly paid, but the rent which they thought in justice they ought to consider it as paying as between the persons entitled to the teinds and the land-holder.

This was a very just alteration as to any question between the parties entitled to these different species of property; but how the Court of Session, after their predecessors, for nearly a century together, had said that the statute afforded the rule, and the words were what they were to go by, could give a construction which the words do not bear, in order to reach the justice of the case, is a difficult question, which ought to have been discussed upon the remit, but has been altogether neglected. I am not saying, that because this has been done in a question between the person entitled to the teinds and the owner, that therefore it is applicable to heirs of tailzie and onerous purchasers; that is another question; but the question is material for this reason, that this alteration of the law, by necessary consequence reduces the clear rents of the March and Neidpath and Queensberry estates in a very serious degree.

As to the question, what is the effect of the statutes of 1449 and 1685 taken together, with respect to a tack for fifty-seven years; supposing, for argument's sake, that the March and Neidpath entail must be considered as prohibiting a tack of fifty-seven years [395] as an alienation, does the statute of 1449 * afford any objection to the conclusion of law? My clear opinion is, that it does not. Whether entails before that are to be considered as odious or not, or whether the statute of 1685 is or is not to be considered as purging them of all odious qualities, it is extremely clear, that if the statute of 1685 authorizes the entail, and if the entail, by force of that statute, prohibits a tack of fifty-seven years as an alienation, it is impossible to say the statute of 1449 can prevent the effect of the statute of 1685.

We have been told again and again, that we are to proceed on the matter upon that system of interpretation that he who runs and can read may fix instantly the interpretation; yet, notwithstanding all these dicta, and the representations of the great character of the heir of tailzie, most assuredly I may say, as to these decisions about estate tail, that those who have run and read, have felt very different convictions, and entertained very different feelings with respect to the interpretation to be put on what they have so read. Looking at the opinions of the Court of Session, it is very difficult to reconcile their opinions in a matter in which no two men who run and read it is said can differ.

It was stated at the bar, on the hearing of this case, that the present proceeding was not to be looked upon as a claim for damages against an heir of entail, or his representatives, on account of his having contravened the prohibition; that it was not [396] to be looked upon as a claim for sums of money, or rather as a repetition of rents unduly anticipated; but that it was to be considered as a case of a right granted to a third party, for valuable consideration, if effectual; and which could only be made effectual by the combined operation of the different clauses which the statute of 1685 requires in entails—that it was a claim founded in contravention, (which is important to be observed) and where therefore the operation with respect to the smallest part of the estate, if it could not afterwards be purged on account of circumstances, would extend to the whole estate: In such a case, where it was insisted that the generality or universality of the acts of the late Duke, constituted a species of dealing with the entail which (whatever name he might give to that dealing, or however he might characterize it) might with respect to him be looked at in a point of view in which it might not be capable of being represented to the mind in a question between tenant A. and tenant B. and others, and where the defences of the Duke of Buccleuch were defences founded on the allegation of devices which the law would not sustain, and where the summons demands (as it does in this case) not merely to have a judgment that these leases were good, but to have it declared by the Court, that, free of all molestation or interruption whatever on the part of the heirs of tailzie, the executors might take the personal estate of the late Duke of Queensberry, and dispose of it as they thought proper; and where the distinctions were drawn between tenants claiming as purchasers, and all this device, as it was called, on the part of the Duke: Before we proceeded to decide [397] on a Scotch case of such a nature, it was surely expedient to know what the Scotch Courts thought of the case so represented; and for this purpose the case was remitted.

If I am to look at the opinions of the Judges, in consequence of this remit, as amounting to this, that a court of justice is not to change the law, (and God forbid they should change it!); if I am to look at what I read in those opinions, as pointing out, that although the Duke of Queensberry has made deeds to the amount of three or four hundred, although he has made tacks, and taken large grassums, and procuring the tacks to be renounced, has let the lands again, and so covered the whole estate with these tacks, if I am to look at those opinions as declaring that he has not thereby exceeded his power, that he has only done what it was lawful for him to do, it is very difficult to imagine in what cases those who make claims against him can say, that what it was lawful for him to do he has fraudulently done.

We have, in our own law, cases, where men acting according to their powers, may abuse them as to the objects of the powers. These are difficult cases to decide, and the Judges should take care they are not misled by the idea, that because powers may be abused, there has been in the cases put abuses of the powers. A noble Lord,* in one of the cases of this kind, had a power of appointing a certain sum of money among his younger children under a settlement. He made an appointment to one of those children, who was at that time at death's door in a consumption. What was the object of this appointment? It was, that if the child died, the [398] father should take out administration to that child, and claim the estate himself. That was according to the letter of the power; but the Court said that should not be, because it was substantially an appointment to himself, and not to that child.

The Judges differ very much upon the point. Some of them are quite clear this was a device, and that it cannot be sustained; others being of opinion that this was nothing more, in a great variety of instances, than a legal exercise of that power which the Duke had a right to exercise.

This remit has been treated as if those who had the honour of advising this House had really doubted whether the law of Scotland would permit such a thing in general cases, as bringing an action of declarator by the representatives of the deceased, to have the acts of the deceased cleared from all doubt, and difficulty, and controversy. Certainly your Lordships did not mean to express any such doubt.

In looking at the memorials which were presented when this judgment was to be applied in the Court of Session, I find what passed in this House treated in those memorials in a manner of which I know no example, and of which I trust I shall never see another instance. Your Lordships are in the habit, for the sake of assisting persons in doing justice to the suitors in the Court of Session, of endeavouring to put into the possession of those who are the agents of the parties all the doubts and difficulties which have occurred to your minds upon the subject. It is accorded as an assistance to those who are afterwards to discuss the points below; but it never was intended, that when such notes are handed out to those who are to deal with the case below, they are to use them as [399] if they were printed pamphlets, and to make observations upon them in the style, and tone, and temper, in which some of these memorials treat (and I think not very accurately either) what was stated in this House. No man entertains a higher respect than I do for the learning, talents and character of the persons whose names are subjoined to those memorials; but that is not a mode in which I can see a member of this House dealt with, without saying, I hope I shall see no other instance of it. The President of the Court of Session, upon this subject, says, "I shall first consider the chief arguments on which this proposition is disputed by the executors, and that in such a lofty tone of scorn, and such a cry of danger to established principles, as almost to frighten one from daring to think otherwise."

It is supposed, that those who advise your Lordships, have very little notion of the difference between an English entail and a Scotch tailzie, because I observed there seemed to be this difference between persons claiming under a Scotch entail, and persons claiming under an English entail; that leases of short duration, under a Scotch entail, have been sustained against prohibitions, and that that possibly might arise from the circumstance, that a person making an entail might be presumed not to mean to prevent ordinary leases being granted of the estate; although if the term "alienation" applies to leases at all, it is difficult to say why it is not to apply to those of short as well as those of long duration. A lease of short duration was by the Scotch Judges held good; whereas our Judges have held leases made by a tenant in tail as voidable, not as void. Upon reconsidering that question, I am at [400] a loss to know on what else the difference depends, in the law of Scotland, between long and short leases. We have been told we are overturning the law of Scotland,—that we are beating down established principles and rules which have been established for ages. I shall consider it an injustice done to the country, if in any decisions of mine an attempt to change the law of that country can be found; but it may happen that persons may have very different opinions as to what is the law of a country.

In applying the word "alienation" in the Neidpath case, in construction, I am perfectly satisfied that whatever distinction there may be, (if there be a distinction) as to the effect of the word "alienation," that word in all time has prohibited a long lease in Scotland. I formed that opinion upon the ground that the term was not now to be applied for the first time as prohibiting such a lease. If the law of Scotland be thoroughly investigated, it will be found there was no period when it was not an alienation. Holding that a long lease was an alienation, the next question is, Upon what principle,—for this is what I want to have sifted and examined—upon what principle is it to be said a short lease is not an alienation? The text books, and the authorities which decided the Wakefield case,* show that a long lease is an alienation; and it is now supposed, because they have said a long lease is an alienation, and have not said a short lease is an alienation, that it is to be concluded that a short lease is not an alienation; but I must find some principle on which the distinction has been made.—Now those who [401] contended for what is called strict interpretation in the law of Scotland with respect to entails, (and rightly, for I do not venture to trench on that principle of construction), say that alienation means something quite different from allocation; that alienation is the actual conveyance of a real right; that allocation is a personal contract for the use of the property, which by the statute of 1419, with respect to Scotland, is made a species of real right. But alienation, whether long or short, in essence, nature and quality, is exactly the same. A lease of nineteen years, and a lease of thirty-one years, do not differ as to their essential qualities and attributes. The one is no more an alienation, nor less, primâ facie, than the other. The one is no more and no less, primâ facie, an allocation. How long is too long for a lease, or how short is right, is quite a different question. If a short tack be sustainable according to the law of Scotland, which I take it to be unquestionably, and which (whether I can account for the principle on which it is so or not) I never will disturb (I think I can account for it upon a principle satisfactory to my mind) I wish to see what is the principle upon which other persons have seen the difference between a short tack and a long one.

It is said, and I agree it has great weight—what sort of a situation will you put all persons into, if you give a general sense to such words as "alienation" or "disponing?"—Perhaps it is a little too late to discuss that, after the general sense has been given, as far as leases are concerned. But it has been often asked, (and the papers in this cause go a great way to controvert the Wakefield case, but being settled we shall be bound by it.) How are we [402] to know what this lease is to be?—How are we to know which is a long, and which is a short lease? I never could bring myself to have any difficulty about that; and for this reason: If a lease was prohibited in any of these terms, you must travel with all the difficulties till you find the description of the tack. How is it with respect to death-bed?† How is it with respect to inhibition,‡ and other cases in which a distinction has been taken between leases of one character and the other, with regard to which the assertion occurs, that such and such leases are not to be endured?—It is quite obvious, that whenever a question arises, where, notwithstanding inhibition—notwithstanding death-bed—notwithstanding prohibition, leases have been made which A. says are prohibitory, and B. says are not, a Court of Justice must deal with them, and say whether they are so or not.

We have had these arguments at our bar, as if they were the most unfortunate people as to landlords; and yet, if you look at their tacks, they seem so to deal with their landlords, as we have been told, if we were to insist on landlords dealing with their property, we should place them in the situation of not knowing what they should do, or forbear to do. You are not to place persons under the harrow of those difficulties, if the instrument has not placed them there; nor are you to be astute to find, that the instrument has a meaning to subject them to such difficulties; but if, in the true legal construction, they are exposed to them, they must submit. The instrument under which they claim is [403] the law by which they must abide. It comes, therefore, round again to the same question, if long leases be alienation, what is the principle on which short leases are allowed? That principle must be ascertained, with a view to see whether the same principle does or does not in any manner, and to what extent, apply to that which is certainly the great question in this cause, and which perhaps may be stated fairly to be the only question in this cause. What is the effect of leasing, and in that sense alienating, provided the lease be long, and falls under the term alienation? What is the effect of that principle, or any other you can discover out of the fact of taking grassums on leases too short to be alienations; but nevertheless where, though in one sense there is no diminution of the rental, it must be admitted, on the other hand, there is a diminution of what might have been the profit?

There are some points upon which I agree with some of the Judges—in some cases with a majority of the Judges—and I have the mortification to differ from a majority of the Judges in others. There is one very important part of this case, which is pronounced, I think, as the judgment of them all, in the interlocutor of the First Division of the Court—that is, with respect to those leases (I lay grassum out of the question for the present) in which the late Duke of Queensberry, having power to set for lifetime or nineteen years, set for nineteen years with a covenant to renew. It is contended that was a lease he could not make within the meaning of the charter, as it amounts to a lease for the life of the receiver, and eighteen years after. If so, it appears to me to be a [404] lease prohibited;—but I go so far with those who lay down the principles of strict interpretation of entails as to say, I have no doubt the Duke might, without covenant, from time to time take a renunciation, the effect of which would have been the same. Then the question is, does the obligation to do so, make any difference in a question between him and the heir of tailzie?—I think not; for this reason, that whenever the Duke happened to die, the possession of the tenant must have been under the lease that actually existed. With respect to the covenant for another lease, it is a mere personal contract, upon which it appears to me there could be no possession. According to the manner in which these tailzies are constructed, that is not to be denominated a lease or a tack for the whole of that period; entering into an obligation which does not fix itself by way of lease on the heirs of tailzie, would not affect the legal or equitable right ultra that of the person who grants the lease, and his power to grant. So it was decided in this House, in that case of Leslie v. Orme, where upon the main question a lease for four nineteen years was sustained; yet with respect to a reversionary lease, where there could be no possession during the life of the heir of tailzie, the House held it to be bad.

Whether taking the teinds affects the transaction, is a distinct point: taking a grassum cannot affect it in any other way than in a higher degree. There can be no doubt, that, generally speaking, a man would give more of grassum, if grassum can be legally taken for a lease of this sort, with such a covenant, than for a lease without; but in that point of view the question by which the lease is to be affected, is not upon the duration of the lease, for as a lease it has [405] a duration for nineteen years only—it is not upon the effect of the covenant, for the covenant does not bind the heir of tailzie; but it is upon the effect of receiving that sum of money, which they contend, on the other hand, ought to be considered as rent, and not as grassum. Upon that part of the case, therefore, (omitting now the question of grassum) notwithstanding the effect which this sort of covenant has, and an effect which I should strongly conjecture was intended throughout these transactions; yet I am not at liberty to act upon any thing beyond the legal effects of its character; and if it is not prohibited by the charter, I trust this House never will make law, where they are acting in that department of their functions which belongs to interpreting law, and not making it.

The tailzie of the March and Neidpath estates has been adjudged * to prohibit long leases. The word "alienate" occurs in the Buccleuch case in different parts of it, but here also I take it to be clear law which never must be departed from—I mean, unless it is authorized by decisions—that when the statute of 1685 has required prohibitory clauses, irritant clauses, and resolute clauses, those who state there is an effectual prohibition against onerous purchasers, must find the terms in which the prohibition is conveyed in all those clauses. Now it is quite clear that the word "alienate" is not in some of the clauses in the Buccleuch case; and that introduces another question in this case, likewise of considerable importance. Those who have had this charter to inter-[406]pret, may have given a sense to the word "dispone," which I cannot give to it; and if that sense of the word "dispone," which in my conscience I think belongs to it according to its meaning in the law of Scotland, is adopted by the House, it will affect not only this case of the Duke of Buccleuch, but some others which have reached judgment in the Courts below, and some of which are now before the House on appeal. But whatever may be the effect, it is our duty to give it the sense which belongs to it.

Upon the question as to the word "dispone," according to its sense in the law of Scotland, whether it is equivalent to the word "alienate,"—I have again and again read this case and all the former cases—I have again and again taxed myself to the duty of considering what is the meaning of this word "dispone," as it has been understood in text writers, in charters, in writs, in statutes; and in many of them, I am of opinion, that the word "dispone" is as effectual to prevent a lease of a hundred years, as the word "alienate" is.—That is my opinion. It would be pedantry in me to read all the doctrines which led me to express that opinion which I, for one, entertained on the word "dispone;" and I have the satisfaction to see, that the Judges below were not so much disturbed by that opinion, as they were by our notions of alienation in other cases.

The word "dispone" does not apply to leases as to duration, it only applies to leases in respect of grassums; and therefore it clears the way to the consideration, what is the effect of a grassum? because, if you held that the word "dispone" would not authorize such a decision as the word "alienate" [407] would authorize, it would have been difficult to get at the interpretation.

When this case was argued here before the remit, there was no argument at the bar, nor any thing in the papers, which induced the raising, much less the discussion, of a question, whether an heir of tailzie, where there was no prohibition, could diminish the rent? Whether he could let below the last coming rent? I now see (and that makes this case of infinitely greater importance than I understood it to be then) that it is introduced as a question by no means determined, although the notion that an heir of tailzie had no such power, was founded upon the opinions of great and eminent lawyers, and those who now quarrel with that doctrine were the persons who brought those opinions here for the assistance of this House. I think there is one judgment (Wakfield case, post, 417) at least, in which some Judges of great eminence in Scotland have gone the length of saying, that if the rent was lessened, particularly, if much below what it was, (and see what a state of law you are getting into, much and little, long and short), that they should hold that to be fraudulent. From this it appears, how very dangerous it is to determine any thing not before us for judgment; and it becomes necessary to consider, if it be the law, that a tenant in tailzie cannot let below the rent, independent of actual terms of prohibition, on what principle that is said to be law. It cannot be the law on strict construction, because there is nothing on which to put it; and therefore it must arise out of some principle, of which we ought to satisfy ourselves.

* In the Wakfield case, D. P. 1813, MS. and 2 Dow, 90 and 206, et seq.

[408] In these papers, much is also said about what are supposed to have been treated as implied prohibitions. I cannot charge myself as the first to denominate the cases of the Mansion-house, of Policies of illusory rent, and other cases, as implied prohibitions. I expressed a doubt as to the proposition which was so broadly stated in argument, that a tenant of tailzie was "absolute monarch*" of his estate in every particular where he was not bound by express prohibition. I now venture to observe as to the law respecting the Mansion-house and the Policies, that if they are not implied prohibitions, I may take the liberty of stating them to be something like limitations of the powers of an absolute monarch. What is the principle here which binds a tenant in tailzie, although restricted by no words in the charter. When the act of 1685 gives a man power to comprehend in tailzie all he chooses to comprehend in that tailzie, and where he does comprehend the Mansion and the Policies, and where the prohibition does not strike at the Mansion-house and the Policies—what is the principle, I say, on which it has been held, both below and in this House, (particularly in the Roxburghe case—a case which may not form any precedent to decide this, but in that case in effect, if those feus had been held good, it was reducing the mansion-house of Roxburghe to the state of a stone quarry) that such a dealing as to the Mansion-house and policies was illegal, though not expressly prohibited. Such is the effect of the decisions, though I am not able to [409] satisfy myself on principle, why tacks of these Mansion-houses and Policies ought not, by the statute of 1449, to be made good, as against the future heirs of tailzie. I wish those who put it upon that ground, would tell us, why the act of 1685, if it authorizes an entail in terms which comprehend them, being subsequent to 1449, will not, upon the face of what is embodied in the expression, just as much affect the Mansion-house and Policies as other subjects. We must endeavour to ascertain what is the principle of the exception before the present appeal is decided.

So as to the cases of illusory rent, if I am to look at the statute of 1449, and what some of the Judges have said on that statute, I find it extremely difficult to say what is an illusory rent. There has been an attempt to determine what is illusory, but our decisions do not supply the principle upon which we can determine that to be illusory, provided we read the statute of 1449, as giving the power by which the effective lease is granted. When, therefore, this is stated to be an implied prohibition, and to be an implied prohibition destroying all the effect of strict interpretation, I ask those who say that nothing is out of the power of an heir of tailzie, except what is put out of his power by the intention and meaning of the entail, embodied in actual expression, to show how they account satisfactorily for the cases to which I have alluded. They may account for them very satisfactorily, for aught I know, upon the doctrine which lays this down as a general rule, without any exception whatever; and yet, on the other hand, I have been quite unable to discover what is the principle [410] which takes it out of that rule, unless it be some important principle arising out of the presumed intention of the author of the tailzie, that this shall not be done, whatever may be the apparent import of the expressions which he has used in his tailzie.

The great and important question remains, and undoubtedly it is a great and important question in every view that can be taken of it, if the doctrine with respect to grassums is allowed. If taking grassums is not to be considered as "evident diminution of rental," which are the words to be construed, we see what may be done with respect to estates tail in Scotland. We may indeed be surprised at what has not been done with such estates. On the other hand, if you do hold that taking grassums is, in the sense in which I speak of it, prohibited, you deny legal effect to acts which have been sanctioned by practice, and defeat the provision and the means of providing for wives and children; but, much as such consequences might be deplored, we cannot, with a view of avoiding them, venture, in judicial decision, to declare that to be the law which is not so. Those evils must be remedied, if necessary.

* An expression frequently used in the argument for the appellant, as to the powers of an heir of tailzie, so far as he is not expressly restricted by the prohibitory, etc. clauses of the entail.

by the Legislature. The question, therefore, comes round to this, What is the effect of grassums with respect to such leases as have been granted under these entails, having due regard to the principles of interpretation, as affecting the construction of these deeds; having due regard also to what has hitherto been done in practice, and to what has hitherto been established by decision?

It has been intimated to me, that the teinds in one of these estates were valued about the year 1720; [411] it does not appear to me in the view I take of this case, to be a circumstance that varies the principle on which we are to decide this case; because, one of those entails being made in 1705, and the other considerably before 1700, the circumstance of an after valuation of the teinds, would not shut out the consideration of any construction the Court of Session put upon that entail, either upon the interpretation of these deeds of entail, or any other deeds of entail. I have not forgotten that there may be, as contended, a very great difference between the rules of construction, as they may be applied to lands generally, and proprietors of teinds, and as they may be applied to heirs of entail: the rules have come very often under consideration, and I should be very sorry indeed if, in the result, we should not duly consider them.

With respect to the meaning of the word dispose, I found my opinion, not only on what I conceive to be the legal sense of the word, as contradistinguished from that strict and peculiar sense which belongs to an instrument known to the Scotch law by the name of disposition, but on looking at the meaning of the words dispose, and dispose of, in the two deeds of entail under our consideration, and all the parts and clauses of both the deeds, containing the words "dispose," and "dispose of," and "dispose upon," and "dispose thereupon," and so on.

I understand there has been a decision (Elliot v. Pott, March 10, 1814) of the Court of Session subsequent to this, by which a different construction has been put upon the word. There was a great difference of opinion upon it, and that with respect to setting tacks. In the case of The Earl of [412] Elgin v. Wellwood, now pending, on appeal,* the same point came under discussion. In that case, upon the 9th of October 1807, a proposition was made in a letter, the terms of which are as follow:—"On the part of the Earl of Elgin, I hereby offer to enter into a lease with you for 999 years from Martinmas next, of the farms of Wankirelu and Greenhill, possessed by Thomas Purves, excepting that part thereof lying on the north side of the road from North Queensferry to Torryburn of Craigs;"—the rent is a peculiar sort of rent, three bolls of oatmeal per acre, besides "a grassum of £12,000 sterling, bearing interest from Martinmas next, but the grassum not to be payable during your lifetime."—The grassum, therefore, was to be paid at a subsequent period.—"It is understood, that Lord Elgin is in the mean time to find security for that sum to the satisfaction of Mr. Thomas Adair, writer to the signet;"—and then there is a provision with respect to the quantity of acres:—"and it is further understood, that by your acceptance of this offer, you agree to enter into a lease with Lord Elgin for the same period of years, at the same rent, and for a grassum in proportion to the extent to be fixed, according to the grassum now offered, of all the land lying to the west of Pitliver House, and belonging to you, which you are at liberty to let for that period of years, in terms of the entail of your estate, but this only in case his Lordship should incline to enter into such a lease."

The power of leasing under the tailzie, in that case is expressed in these words: "and with this power and faculty, as it is hereby expressly pro-[413]-vided and declared, notwithstanding of the restrictions before written, with regard to the setting tacks, that the said Robert Wellwood, my son, and each of the heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate, shall have full power to set tacks of the same, excepting the house, offices, houses and gardens of Pitliver, and one hundred acres of ground next adjacent, and contiguous to the said manor-place, for such space of time as they shall think fit, provided that the same shall never be set at a smaller yearly rent than three bolls of oatmeal, at eight stone weight per boll, for each acre so to be set, and proportionably for any smaller quantity; and which rent or tack-duty shall always be payable in kind, and never be converted into money: Declaring, that in case the said Robert Wellwood, my son, or any of the said heirs of tailzie, shall set tacks of the said estate for any longer space than nineteen years, or in terms of the act of Parliament before mentioned, except in the terms of the clause immediately before written, then such tacks shall be in themselves null and void;" and there were the usual resolute and irritant clauses. The general power was, "to set tacks or rentals of any part of the estate, except that they were not to do that (except in the terms after mentioned) for a longer space than nineteen years certain, or for the life of the setters, or in the terms of the power given to the proprietors of entailed estates in Scotland: and that none of the tacks or rentals shall be set with diminution of the rental, except the same be done without collusion, and by way of public roup, to the highest bidder;" a material passage in this case, as having [414] some application to the entails now under your Lordships consideration.

* Since decided against the appellant. D. P. cases of 1820, post

The Court below were of opinion that this tack for 999 years is a good tack: and the question to be discussed, whenever that cause comes for decision, will be of two kinds; first, with respect to grassum, upon which I observe, in the note I have taken, the counsel at the bar stated, not one word was said in the Court below; the next question will be, Whether a 999 years estate is really a tack? whether it is in Scotch law a tack? The Court were of opinion, it was a tack, under this power to set such tacks as the heir of tailzie thought proper, that this 999 years could be sustained. It was argued at the bar, that it was no such thing as a tack: and you will have to decide whether 999 years is to be considered as a tack under this power and faculty: and if it is, what is the effect of the grassum? I have thought it my duty to mention that case. Though it is a case subsequently decided, it contains the opinion of the Court of Session. It has so much of authority, (though subsequent to the case before your Lordships), as belongs to a case that is under appeal.

The Harestanes lease has been reduced and declared to be null, by the First Division of the Court of Session, upon two grounds, first, upon the ground of its duration: secondly, upon the ground of the grassum. If it is a bad lease on the ground of duration, it would not be necessary, in that case, to show whether it was a good or a bad lease on the ground of grassum: but if you hold it to be a good lease, notwithstanding it was for a duration of fifty-seven years, then it will become material to consider what [415] is the effect of the grassums. That consideration may be as well blended with the consideration of what belongs to the Whiteside case, as taken separately. With respect to a fifty-seven years lease being an alienation, in the Wakefield case it was decided in this House that a long lease was an alienation, confirming the opinion of the Court of Session, notwithstanding the practice in Scotland of granting such leases to a very great extent.

On looking at the grounds of the opinion, that a ninety-seven years lease was an alienation, and was not a tack, it appears the Court held, that according to the law of Scotland, except so far as the effect of the statute of 1449 is to be considered, a lease, though quite different from an infeftment, a disposition, and so on, and quite different from an alienation understood in the special sense of alienation, that is, a transfer of property, that a lease, although it is in truth nothing more, either in the law of England or in the law of Scotland, than a personal contract for the possession of land not transferred to another, and converted only into a real right, so far as the statute of 1449 does convert it into a real right: yet they were of opinion, not on any speculations of theirs, but on doctrine as it was to be found in their books, in their statutes and instruments, that a long lease was an alienation: and, when you look at what is to be found with regard to particular heads of law in the law of Scotland, (though I am not now stating this to afford a direct inference with respect to what should be the construction of a tailzie,) you will find that, with respect to forfeiture,* for instance, a long [416] lease is stated to be an alienation,—that with respect to forfeiture, if there is a grassum,† it is stated to be an alienation. So again with respect to deathbed‡,—so in respect to crown lands§, and church lands||, they have laid down in the language of their law, that a long lease is an alienation; and they give a reason for that, upon which many of the Judges proceed in their opinion in the Waketfield case. The reason which they give in the case of forfeiture that a long lease is an alienation, is because it is not of ordinary endurance, and because it is not a necessary and proper administration of the estate. Whether you are to apply this principle to deeds of entail or not is another matter. Great stress is laid on the difficulties which persons would be placed under, if you were to construe powers of leasing with reference to what is a necessary and fit and proper administration, I find the law has distinctly pointed out a variety of cases in which you cannot escape from that principle of construction. So it is in the cases which I have mentioned. In other cases also, they have held leases void, unless they were adapted to the necessary and proper administration of the estate, as, if they were too long, for that is the instance which they particularly point out, and therefore wherever a question arises whether the lease is too long, or in other respects such as to fall within the reach of that principle which would aim at its destruction, it must [417] necessarily become matter of judicial investigation, whether it is a lease of that description or not.

Sir Hays Campbell, upon the first advising and decision of the Waketfield case, says, "Long leases are alienations, and leases of ordinary endurance are not alienations. My opinion is just that of all your Lordships. All of us know, first, that a lease may be granted by an heir, which is not an alienation; and, secondly, that a lease may be granted which is really, substantially and truly an alienation. Now it is unnecessary for me to bring under your Lordships view, examples of the two extremes, because they must be obvious: for leases for one year or two years, or in Craig's time for ten years, or in the present day for nineteen years, are not alienations. But, on the other hand, will any man say with candour, or is it possible for a lawyer to maintain, that a lease for a thousand years or ten thousand years, for something much below the present rent, is not an alienation?" The difficulty commences when we come to inquire what is long and what is short, and what is too long and what is too short; and we find on this grave authority (for undoubtedly that of Sir Hays Campbell must be taken to be a grave authority, he being Lord President of the Court at that time, and having great occasion to consider these subjects), a judicial opinion, that nineteen years is not too long to be a lease, and not an alienation. This doctrine of Sir Hays Campbell led me on a former occasion to say, "upon what particular ground they found that he (the tenant) was to have a lease for nineteen years, I am not able to learn from the papers before us. I take for [418] granted, they must have gone in some measure upon a notion, that as upon a species of præsumpta voluntas a tenant in tail may make a lease for nineteen years, (whether with grassum is another question), the Duke of Queensberry could make a lease for nineteen years; and it is the law of Scotland, as I understand it, upon this head of præsumpta voluntas, that a nineteen years lease being considered (whether tacks of longer endurance can or cannot be said so to be) to be an act of necessary and ordinary administration, necessary for the cultivation of the land, that such a lease is good. The Court seems to hold that doctrine somewhat upon the principle which the courts of law in England have applied to leases granted by tenants in tail before the statute* about their leases, but with this difference, the Courts in Scotland I understand held the nineteen years lease to be good, as of the ordinary endurance; upon the grounds of policy and husbandlike management of the estate, the Judges in England would not hold a lease made by a tenant in tail for a term that endured beyond his life to be ipso facto void, but they would hold it voidable, if the heir of entail chose to have it voided;" and upon this sort of expression falling from me, it has been supposed that I had totally forgotten the difference between the heir of tailzie in Scotland and the heir of entail in England.

That an heir of tailzie in Scotland differs from an heir of entail in England in some respects, could not be unknown to me. An heir of entail in England has an estate that may endure for ever; an heir of [419] tailzie in Scotland is the absolute liar of the estate. Undoubtedly the whole fee is in him for the time. Those who may take after the heir of entail in England are considered as being remainder-men, having part of that fee which is vested only between the English heir of entail and the remainder-man. But since the whole fee, after the heir of tailzie is served heir of tailzie, is in that heir of tailzie for the time being, I ask, how it is that a lease beyond nineteen years is bad, and a lease of nineteen years good? It appeared to me impossible to decide, with any sort of justice, that there was any thing in the word nineteen that would make that lease rational, or that there was any thing in the words fifty-seven, or in the words twenty-seven, that would make the lease irrational. In every text writer, and in all the decisions in which it is stated that a long lease is an alienation, it is put on the ground that it is a dealing with the estate which is not for the proper and necessary management of the estate; but when they repudiate the longer leases as not being necessary for the proper management of the estate, and when they do that in the case of estates tail as well as other estates, to be sure I was led to think, that when they gave that reason for the destruction of long leases, they meant to say, that the short leases they sustained were to be sustained, because that reason which destroyed long leases did not apply to short leases. That is the only rule which I can find; and I was perhaps misled by the manner in which our own books treated this matter about the leases of tenants in tail, where they seem to have gone upon very much the same principle.

[420] In a Treatise upon Leases, which I believe was written by Lord Chief Baron Gilbert, and certainly is one of the best compositions on leases we have in our law, he says, "If a tenant in tail, after the statute de donis, had made a lease for years, and died, this lease was not absolutely determined by his death; but the issue in tail was at liberty either to affirm or avoid it, as he thought fit; and the reason why such leases for years were not holden to be absolutely determined by the death of the tenant in tail who made them, was either"—(see now how near this comes to a Scotch tailzie)—"because they were drawn out of an estate of inheritance, which by possibility might continue for ever; and this was but a reasonable liberty given to the issue in tail, because it might well be supposed that his ancestor was not qualified to keep all his possessions in his own manurance and occupation, but must necessarily let them out to farmers and husbandmen, who, by their skill and understanding in the arts of agriculture and husbandry, would be best able to preserve and improve the soil, and by their yielding an annual rent or income to the lessor or tenant in tail himself, would enable him equally to provide for the necessities and exigencies of himself and his family." Our Judges, who have not the power which belongs to the Judges of the Court of Session, upon this principle of policy would not hold the leases absolutely void, but voidable. The estate tail, being an inheritance which might endure for ever, was an estate out of which a nineteen years lease might be drawn. If the issue in tail, or those to take after [421] them, chose to complain of the lease, the Judges held it void; if they did not complain, upon that sort of policy which is, it seems, more open to the Court of Session to act upon than our Judges, they held them voidable. It was in this way I was led into this view of the case, whether it was a proper or an improper one.

A paper was handed up to us, stating a great deal both with respect to leases and with respect to grassums, from the same learned person, Sir Hay Campbell. You will see his authority both for and against any opinions that may be expressed to you to-day; and I consider it a document which sustains again the doctrine that long leases are bad, and that short leases are good. That imposes upon us the task of finding out what are long and what are short, and impels us to find the principle upon which the one is held good, and the other is held bad. In that paper it is stated, that "a lease without an ish at all is not good against singular successors, because it is truly not a lease, but an alienation of the subject, in an incomplete personal form, which cannot be sustained against an infertment. Suppose then that it is for a limited term of ten millions of years, can this be sustained?—It is impossible. This may be said to be an extreme case on the one side, and a lease for two or three years is an extreme case on the other side. The thing desiderated is to fix a precise line. This is a hard task to be imposed upon Judges, and is much fitter for the Legislature; but till a new law is made, they must necessarily exercise their powers of discrimination according [422] to the best lights they can obtain upon the subject. The act of the 10 George III. certainly does not decide the question, because it relates only to cases of entailed property where the tailzie contains special clauses limiting the power of granting leases to a small number of years;"—(I doubt whether that is correct; because if it was intended that that act should apply only to such cases, there should have been a provision limiting its operation to such cases:—” but it contains a principle which deserves to be attended to, viz. ‘ We are willing to extend your power of leasing under certain conditions beneficial to the entailed estate; ’ ”—(Now what the meaning of this act was, I think Sir Hay Campbell must know as well as any man in the kingdom:—) “ but not beyond a certain moderate and reasonable endurance; because if you go farther, this might be held as bordering too nearly upon alienation, and exceeding the ordinary power of rational administration. Thirty-one years or two lives are generally reckoned very moderate terms, yet the Legislature seems to have been afraid to go farther, even when the interest of the entailed estate was to be forwarded, unless in the case of building leases, which were to be allowed for ninety-nine years. It was upon this ground that I could not venture, in giving my opinion as a Judge in the first of these Queensberry cases, to go farther than thirty-one years as a moderate endurance. I shall be better pleased with thirty-eight; neither should I object to fifty-seven years, in cases under the act 1449; but to go ”—(Now see the notions of this great and [423] experienced Judge, with respect to entailed property, the absolute dominion over which is supposed to belong to those in possession of it)—“ but to go that length in cases of entailed property, would in almost every such instance be over-reaching the life of the succeeding heir, which does not seem very consonant to the rational object and proper meaning of an entail:—” and then he proceeds upon the act of 1419, saying, (and this is matter of authority), “ see the 19th of February 1771, reported in the late volume of the Faculty Decisions, where there is a good deal of discussion upon the subject (Diet. of Dec. 15200). The case of Jordanhill (Decisions, tit. Tack, No. 18) is too shortly stated by Lord Elchies. The weight of his authority is great. He lays it down as the opinion of all the Judges in his time, that a lease must not exceed ordinary duration, to be protected against singular successors by the act 1449; but he still leaves it unexplained what is ordinary duration.”

In another part he states, that he can find no resting-place until he comes to thirty-one years, or two lives in being at the time of making the lease; and that none of the old lawyers framed out a tack of thirty-two years, because there it seems you get beyond the power of an heir of entail.

He then proceeds to the consideration of the grassums. His authority is undoubtedly of great importance in this matter; and it is quite decisive as to his opinion. He says, “ As to the question now raised about grassums, it is entirely new to me. [424] I had always considered it as indisputable, that so long as a tack was a tack,” (and whether a 999 years tack is a tack, is a question which must be decided in the cause of Elgin v. Wellwood; but you see that this learned person has thought it might be a question, whether a tack was a tack), “ the proprietor, whether entailed or not entailed, might let his farm as he pleased, and under any conditions he chose to annex, taking care always not to lower the current rent, to the prejudice of the heir of entail.” I remark again upon this passage as I pass along, that in the course of the former argument at your bar, neither authority, text-writer, case, nor dictum was heard, to assert that the heir of entail could let down the rent. I speak of cases where there is not authority under the entail to do it. It seems now, that is become matter of question. It is grave matter of question, for as there are a great many entails, I apprehend, (I think it right to use a word which shows that I do not mean to assert it, but only to state my apprehension,) in which long leasing would be held to be prohibited by the word “ alienation,” if under such a word short leases, which would not be alienations under the distinction which has been pointed out, may be made for any rent just higher than that which might be considered as an illusory rent, what would be the condition of persons having estates tail. It becomes material therefore to consider whether this can or cannot be done; for whether you call it implied prohibition, or whether you call it want of power, or whatever you call it, the incapacity to do it must be founded in some principle connected with the administration of the estate, if [425] an heir of entail has not this power, except in cases where it is necessary. No person entertains a doubt, that if an heir of entail could show, that when he let down the rent he did it of necessity, that would not be a case in which it would be said to be wrongly done; but supposing he cannot let down the rent in a case in which it is not necessary he should let down the rent, then the next question is, What is the principle upon which he is prohibited from letting down the rent? It must result from this principle, that those who are to enjoy the estate which he is bound to take care of, shall not enjoy it in a state less beneficial than they would if the rent was not let down: and that proves the principle, that the heir of entail is bound at least to pay some attention to what is called the rational and due administration of the estate.

The paper then proceeds to state another principle, which likewise deserves attention on account of the authority from which it proceeds: "By the current rent I mean that which has hitherto been obtained, not a future possible rent which might be got by varying the stipulations, and rejecting all entry-money, or other advantage to the heir in possession. The maker of an entail might no doubt prohibit grassums;" (and there are unquestionably several entails in which grassums are prohibited; I take those to be of very modern date, when compared with the entails under our consideration, and stated in the cases before the House): "but even this would not always benefit the future heirs; for still the heir in possession might decline to raise the rent, and it would be extremely difficult to [426] force him, or even to prove the fact of grassum after his death." Then he takes notice of the decisions which have been made in the Court of Session upon the subject of grassums, and says "he is at a loss to see the ground of a question; for if the tack be too long it will cease to be a tack, and even without a grassum, it could not be sustained; if within the bounds of a tack, it must be sustained whether grassum or not."

He afterwards states, that this is the result of his experience upon the subject: "The question, What is a long lease participating of the character of alienation, and what is moderate, amounting to administration only, is no doubt attended with difficulty, because the limits have never yet been precisely drawn: but the question of grassum is of a very different nature, and it is astonishing to me how it should ever have been made a question at all. I have been now upwards of sixty years employed in studying, reading, practising, hearing and determining upon all sorts of questions in the laws of Scotland, and I declare I never heard from the mouth of any lawyer, old or young, or any Judge, nor ever read in any book, nor figured in my own mind till now, that an heir possessed of an entailed property, was or could be under the smallest restraint as to taking grassums upon the renewal of his leases, the entail itself saying nothing to the contrary, and the former current rent under a lease, which perhaps had been granted by the tailzie himself, not being diminished;" (so that his opinion certainly is, that where there was nothing said about it, the rent could not be [427] diminished.) "Tailzies very often say the rent shall not be diminished; and this is clearly proper, because otherwise it might be unfairly done, and the tailzie rendered illusory. One instance occurred where an entail prohibited raising the rent, 5th February 1794, Moir (Dict. of Dec. 15537). This was a mere whim, and laughed at by the Court, and it was got quit of upon a specialty." Then "the utmost length that any tailzie case has yet gone, is to prohibit taking grassums: and even this has not been done in many instances, and the effect of it is merely to serve as an inducement to let the farms, not by public auction to the highest offerer, but in a rational way, and for such an advance of rent as may with ease be obtained by a prudent landlord acting discreetly in his own affairs. In this way alone it is practicable, without involving the management of an estate in the greatest possible confusion."

This difficulty has been raised very high in argument. It has been said, no heir of tailzie can know, and no other person can know, when he lets for the best and most improved rent. That the difficulty of knowing that, is such that you cannot adopt it as a principle. An English lawyer may think there is no great difficulty in matters, in which those who are experienced in the Scots law think there can be nothing but difficulty. There is not a single marriage-settlement in England, that has been drawn for some centuries, where the tenant for life has not a power of leasing, and that power is given to him to lease for the best and most improved rent, and the lease is void if not so made: and yet I believe I [428] may challenge the experience of the oldest persons in Westminster Hall, to point out three or four instances of leases being held void upon that restriction. Our Courts have said, the best evidence that a man has let for the best and most improved rent is, that he has taken no more himself than he has taken care those who come after him shall have. We may trust to the inclination of mankind in general, to get as much as they can get, and if the tenant for life provides for those who are to take after him, as he has provided for himself, (to be sure he may be under mistake as to them and as to himself, and he may take too little, but it is not very likely he should expose himself to that mistake, or willingly take too little,) this throws a burthen on those who mean to quarrel with such a lease, to prove that there was in the transaction that want of ordinary prudence which shows an inattention to the prescribed terms under which he was to let the lease. Prima facie a lease has been always held to be good against remainder-men, which made for them the same provision as for the tenant for life; and I believe, in ninety-nine cases in a hundred, that is the safe principle of decision. If the principle of leasing, either under powers of leasing in English deeds, or under the declared right of leasing in Scotch tailzies, does in law depend upon the lease being made with a due and rational attention to the administration of the estate, whatever difficulties there may be in applying that principle, you must come to the question, whether the lease, or whatever it is, is made upon the principle on which the law of Scotland will decide for its validity?

I will go no farther in the statement of this paper [429] there appears in it to be great authority in favour of grassum; and it helps to show what is the opinion of the Judges and lawyers of Scotland upon alienation, as being or not being the result of tacks of longer or shorter duration; and, as far as it goes, to show the principle upon which a prohibition of alienation has been held to prohibit tacks of a long duration, but not of a short duration.

The act of the 10th of Geo. III. is intituled, "An act to encourage the improvement of lands, tenements and hereditaments, in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, held under settlements of strict entail."

The recital is in these words: "Whereas, by an act of Parliament of Scotland, made in the year 1685, intituled, 'An act concerning tailzies,' all his Majesty's subjects are empowered to tailzie their lands and estates in Scotland, with such provisions and conditions as they shall think fit, and with such irritant and resolute clauses as to them shall seem proper; and which tailzies, when completed and published in the manner directed by the said act, are declared to be real and effectual against purchasers, creditors, and others whatsoever; and whereas many tailzies of lands and estates in Scotland, made as well before as after passing the said act, do contain clauses, limiting the heirs of entail from granting tacks or leases of a longer endurance than their own lives, for a small number of years only," (the printing is, or for a small number of years only, and the policy of the act is to encourage the improvement of lands, etc.) "whereby the cultivation of land in [430] that part of this kingdom is greatly obstructed, and much mischief arises to the public."

Upon this recital the act incapacitating those whom it prohibits by general words, or if not by general words, by the fact that they were either permitted to make particular leases, or prohibited from making other leases, goes on to provide, "that it shall and may be lawful to every proprietor of an entailed estate, within that part of Great Britain called Scotland, to grant tacks or leases of all, or any part or parts thereof, for any number of years, not exceeding fourteen years, from the term of Whitsunday next after the date thereof, and for the life of one person, to be named in such tacks or leases, and in being at the time of making thereof, or for the lives of two persons to be named therein, and in being at the time of making the same, and the life of the survivor of them, or for any number of years not exceeding thirty-one years from the term aforesaid."

Here the Legislature seems to consider a lease for fourteen years, and the life of one person, or a lease not for any certain number of years, but for the lives of two persons, or a lease not for any life or lives, but for thirty-one years, as being in some respect equivalent to each other in the ordinary and proper management of a Scotch estate. Then if they are made for two lives, there is to be a special clause about inclosing, etc. and if for nineteen years, the lessees are to fence and inclose the lands; and every lease of above nineteen years is to contain certain clauses for the proper administration of the estate, which it is not necessary for me here to mention: "And [431] all leases made or to be granted under the authority of this act, shall be made or granted for a rent not under the rent payable by the last lease or sett, and without grassum, fine or foregift, or any benefit whatsoever, directly or indirectly reserved or accruing to the grantor, except the rent payable by the lease; and that no such lease shall be granted till after the end or other determination of any former lease of the same premises, or that such lease, if granted for a time certain, shall be within one year of being determined, and that all leases otherwise granted, shall be void and null."

Here it must be admitted, that the Legislature had in contemplation the practice of letting, under the rent last received; that they had in contemplation a species of letting with grassum, fine or foregift; that they had in contemplation that species of tack which occurs in this case, a letting in fact before the determination of a former lease: and that they likewise had in contemplation, that if a man let a lease under this act before the former lease was expired, and more than one year before the expiration of that former lease, it was an addition to that former lease, which under the authority of this act would be void.

Then follows this clause, which I apprehend must be supposed to take out of the authority of this act of Parliament the cases referred to in this clause: "That if any tailie shall, either expressly or by implication, contain powers of leasing more ample than are hereby given, the heirs of entail in possession shall be at liberty to exercise all such powers in the same manner as if this act had never been made."

This clause, in judicial construction, can mean no [432] more than this, as it seems to me, namely, that persons who had larger powers of leasing than are here given, shall not be prejudiced by the enactment of this act.

The act then proceeds to that part of it which relates to the encouragement to lay out money. In one of the cases of Elliotts,* where a tenant of entail had laid out money on improvements, and where by letting leases he had by grassum got into his pocket that sum of money which he had expended in improvements, and afterwards his estate tailie ceased, and another person under the effect of the entail came to the enjoyment of the estate; the Court of Session held, that under the true construction of the clause which followed, though that person had received in the shape of grassum so much for the improvements which he had made upon the estate, yet that he had a title under this act, as against the person who succeeded him, for three-fourths of those improvements, to be paid out of the rent reserved to the persons who were to succeed. Taking it for the present to be a right decision, consider what the effect of this act of Parliament is, if grassums are to be taken. The result would be, if a tenant under the tailie should lay out a large sum of money in improvements, (not exceeding such a sum, the act puts a limit to the amount of the improvements, but supposing that sum of money to be considerable, as in many estates it will be), if he afterwards lets the estate, getting a considerable sum as a grassum, in a case where he cannot let with a diminution of the rent, that a person succeeding to the estate is to pay such proportion [433] of those improvements out of the small rent reserved by a man who takes a large grassum. It is difficult to say that such can be the right construction of this act of Parliament.

With respect to the lease of Harestanes, which is for fifty-seven years, the question is, whether it can be supported, considering the principles on which the House has held a ninety-seven years lease bad, or upon the principle upon which, as it appears to me, they have always acted; (I mean in judgment—practice is a different matter)—can such a lease be sustained upon the principle of distinction between long leases and short leases? The Court of Session is of opinion that it is a term which amounts to an alienation, and cannot be supported. If your Lordships are of that opinion, which I humbly state to be mine, that would dispose of the lease of Easter Harestanes. By the list of leases which has been laid upon your table, with a view to show what grassums have been taken upon the Queensberry estate, it appears that it was at a very late period indeed before any body dealing with that estate got, even in a very few solitary instances, to a lease of nineteen years. They were of very short duration; and so were almost all the leases contained in the list laid before your Lordships with respect to grassums, leases of very short duration. They show, that the persons dealing with that estate thought they were justified in taking grassums, but not for leases of sixty, seventy, ninety, or a hundred years; and although there are to be found in Scotland very long leases, I find that with very few exceptions in judgment, such leases have not been sustained.

* Trustees of Sir F. Elliott v. Sir W. Elliott, 1793, Jan. 22. Dict. of Dec. 15622.

[434] It has been asked, if you do not sustain a lease for fifty-seven years, will you sustain a lease for fifty years? will you sustain a lease for thirty years? will you sustain a lease for twenty-seven years? Or, to put the question as the case upon your table requires us, as to what we call the alternative leases, what will you sustain, if you do not sustain fifty-seven? Sir Hay Campbell answers that question; but if I am to answer, I resort to the principle which cuts down one of those leases, because it is inconsistent with the fair and rational administration of the estate. I should be disposed to say, that with reference to ninety years, or such leases as are mentioned in the act of Parliament, it would be a lease of too long duration. If you ask me, why I say so, I can give you no more satisfactory answer, than that I think it is a rational application of the principle upon which they have held leases too long not to be good. But I do not know, with respect to this, and every other part of the case, any thing which appears to me to deserve so much and so strong recommendation to have these matters all settled by Parliament, as the state in which the power of leasing in Scotland exists.

In respect of other leases, it becomes extremely important that some such measure should be adopted: it would leave the law of Scotland in a cruel state, if on the one hand grassums cannot be taken in which the families of heirs of entail may be interested; I mean their widows and their children: for it is impossible, looking into the matter historically, to deny that this method of taking grassums has been frequently resorted to, to enable the heirs of [435] entail to make provision for wives and younger children, for whom, as in the Buccleuch cases, it would be found extremely difficult, on the construction that shuts out grassum, to make provision. On the other hand, it appears to me equally clear, that if grassums can be taken in the way in which they have been taken, the result may be, (and more especially where there is no prohibition that requires keeping up the old rent, and any rent may therefore be taken,) the consequence must be, unless there be some reasonable provision made about grassums, that the heirs of entail may be disappointed of their whole provision, supposing every one can so act with respect to his own posterity under a charter made by his ancestors for his and for their provision. Whether that is a desirable consequence—whether entails ought to be thus defeated—is a distinct question.

The power of judges, in this respect, may be doubted. Upon that subject, as it applies to English law, I have formed an opinion, which leads me to think, that the judges of this age, in England, would not have been permitted to get rid of the statute of English entails, as judges of that age did soon after the passing of the statute de donis.

The next subject is the alternative leases. The Division of the Court of Session, which has decided upon the alternative leases, seems to have been of opinion, that those leases, in the first instance, might be good for twenty-one years, or that they might be good for nineteen years; or in the first instance, for nineteen, and then for twenty-one years, (I do not recollect which) were it not that they were [436] affected by fraud. I cannot bring myself to think that such alternative leases can be good. The action of declarator has been stated in the papers before us, and most justly and truly stated, to be an extremely useful proceeding in the Court of Scotland. It enables a person to have it declared, whether there is or is not such a lease, as he contends there is, and as other persons contend there is not. Upon such a proceeding, it seems to have been thought, if the late Duke of Queensberry grants a lease for thirty-one years; if that will not do, for twenty-nine years; if that will not do, for twenty-seven years; if that will not do, for twenty-five years; if that will not do, for twenty-three years; if that will not do, for twenty-one years; and if that will not do, for nineteen years, agreeing also, that if the House of Lords shall decide in the Wakefield case, or in any other case, that a ninety-seven years lease is good, they shall not have a lease for nineteen, or thirty-one, or any other fixed period of duration, but for ninety-seven, or for fifty-seven, or the longest which the Court of Session or the House of Lords may approve, that such a lease could be good, if it was not affected by a general fraud—a general device, founded in fraud, which that Division of the Court of Session imputes to all those cases. Now, putting that general fraud out of the question, it appears to me to be a most extraordinary thing, that a lease of such a nature as this, with such an indefinite ish, as a contract of this kind provides for, can be a good lease. It it can be a good lease, I have no conception how persons are to deal with each other, in respect of a lease of this sort, supposing no other person in-[437]-terested but the landlord and his tenant; for the rent of the lease frequently varies, according to the extent of the term which the party grants; the rent is set with express reference to the term. We have a rule in Westminster Hall,* that if a man has a power to grant for ten years, and he grants for twenty-one, the lease, although bad for the twenty-one, will be good for the ten: because, there both parties have before them a written instrument, which gives the power: and they both know what is the utmost extent for which it can be good. But how are we to deal with a contract of this sort, made liable to such alterations, where the contract itself is founded upon the necessity of limitation?—What is to be the state of law and property in Scotland, if the contract itself does not furnish the means to determine what lease is either to bind the lessor, or those to come after him, as personal representatives, or as real representatives, or the heirs of tailzie, in the case of a lease rental?—if no person is to know what burden there is upon that estate, in the shape of a tack, or rental, until the question has been pursued, (as this lease provides it shall be,) through the Court of Session and the House of Lords. According to English law, there may be a good lease for ten years, if A. B. shall not come from Rome in ten years, or for twenty years if A. B. shall not come from Rome in twenty years; but then there is a certain ish or determination in these cases; for you know it [438] must be at an end, on that certain fact taking place; but I cannot find out the principle of law upon which such leases can be held to be good.

Supposing these leases to be good in other respects, the next, and the most important question is, whether the taking a grassum is that which leads to the conclusions, which are to be found embodied in the interlocutors of the First Division of the Court of Session, with respect to the March and Neidpath estates: or to those which are to be found embodied in the interlocutors of the Court of the Second Division, with respect to the Buccleuch estate. What the principle is, upon which the First Division of the Court proceed, we know: for they, in their interlocutors, state expressly the grounds and principles upon which they proceed. What was the principle upon which the Court of the Second Division proceeded, is to be collected, as well as we can collect it, not from the terms of the interlocutor, but from such conclusion as may be found to arise out of the opinions delivered upon the subject. That interlocutor does not enter into a detail of the grounds of the opinion, in the same way as the interlocutor does with respect to the March and Neidpath estates.

Supposing the doctrine to be against grassum, you cannot apply that doctrine to the Buccleuch property, unless leases with grassum are prohibited in the true construction of that deed of entail, although the word "alienate" is not in the deed. If you are of opinion, that the operation of that deed of entail would be the same without that word as with it, then the question as to grassum arises with [439] respect to the leases made under those deeds respectively. The question must be considered, having regard to the different expressions, and the import of the different expressions which are to be found in those deeds, and as far, and no farther, than legal implication in construction will authorize you to attend to the several provisions, as manifesting the general meaning of the authors of these deeds of entail.

The Neidpath entail provides, "that it shall be noways lawful to the heirs of tailzie, nor any of them, to sell, alienate, wadset, or dispose any of the said haill lands," and so on, "or any part thereof, nor to grant infeftments of liferents, nor annualrents furth of the same, nor to contract debts, nor do any other fact or deed whatsoever, whereby the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, may be adjudged, appraised, or otherways evicted from them, or any of them, nor by any other manner of way whatsoever, to alter or infringe the order and course of succession above-mentioned." And after the irritant and resolute clauses, by a subsequent clause "it is provided, that notwithstanding of the irritant and resolute clauses above-mentioned, it shall be lawful and competent to the heirs of tailzie a-specified, and their foresaids, after the decease of the said William Duke of Queensberry, to set tacks of the said lands and estates during their own lifetimes, or the lifetimes of the receivers thereof: the same being always set without evident diminution of the rental." There is then a power of providing for their wives, and for their younger children.

[440] In the other entail, after stating what it shall be lawful for the entailer himself to do, it proceeds to state, "That it shall not be lawful to the said Lord Charles Douglas, and the heirs-male of his body, nor to the other heirs of tailzie above mentioned, nor any of them, to sell, wadset or dispose any of the foresaid earldom, lands," and so on, "nor any part of the same, nor to grant infeftments of liferent or annualrent out of the same, nor to contract debts, nor do any other fact or deed whereby the same, or any part thereof, may be adjudged, appraised, or anyways evicted from them, or any of them, except so far as they are empowered in manner after mentioned, nor to violate or alter the order of succession foresaid, any manner of way whatsoever." These words, "any manner of way whatsoever," appear to me to have relation to every thing that is before prohibited: and when in an antecedent part of this entail, it is stated, that the author of this tailzie may dispose in any manner of way whatsoever, and the others are here prohibited to dispose in any manner of way whatsoever, it appears difficult to say, under such expression, that the word "dispose," meant only to prevent what is technically called disposition; and these words, "except so far as they are empowered in manner after mentioned," apply to a special prohibition, among other things, of granting leases, which special prohibition is in these words: "That the said Lord Charles Douglas, nor the other heirs of tailzie above specified, shall not set tacks nor rentals of the said lands for any longer spaces than the setter's lifetime, or for nineteen years, and that without [441] diminution of the rental, at the least, at the just avail for the time; nor to do any other fact or deed, civil or criminal, directly or indirectly, by treason or otherwise;" and so on.

The provision to be made for spouses by this deed went to the extent of a thousand pounds for one—to a larger sum for two—and if three, it might amount to about two thousand three hundred pounds: and there was likewise a provision for daughters and younger children, amounting to the sum of fourscore thousand pounds Scots, which would be between six and seven thousand pounds sterling.

Such was the nature of the instruments; and the question arises, (regard being had to the provisions contained in them,) whether, according to the law of Scotland, grassums could or could not be taken upon such leases as the Duke of Queensberry has thought proper to grant?

With respect to the practice as to leases of private property in Scotland, the counsel for the respondents have laid before you a list of leases which have been made with grassums. Those leases, I think, with respect to their duration, you will find to be generally very short; some of them certainly of considerable length; and with respect to the periods at which those leases have been made not going so far back by any means as the year 1685, when the statute of tailzies was made.

Those who encounter the argument drawn from this practice, say, that the list is not confined to leases of entailed estates, but that, on the contrary, by far the greater part of the lands mentioned seem to be unentailed; and it may be worth attention to look into [442] the list, with a view to see how far this observation is founded in fact. They say further, that a considerable number of the instances in the list are quoted without any statement except that the defenders are not informed concerning them. They further state, that in almost the whole, no more is taken by way of grassum than one year's value. In answer to which, this observation arises, and has been made, that the question, whether a grassum is to be taken or not, does not depend upon the quantity of the grassum—that if a large grassum is not lawful, a small grassum is not lawful; and that again is met with this observation, that the fact that no attempt has been made to set aside deeds which have been made partly in consideration of grassum, may be accounted for by the circumstance that the grassum was small.

With respect to the leases of the Queensberry estate, it certainly does appear that, although this estate was entailed in 1705, grassums were taken within a very few years of that date; and that the grassums continued to be taken upon it, (the leases being short, and the grassums in general not being large, except in some instances), down to much later times : and it is to be observed, that this practice with respect to the estate of Queensberry, carries with it the authority which belongs to the circumstance, that two of the tutors or curators, or whatever they may be, of the Duke of Queensberry for the time being, letting these leases with grassums, were persons in the highest situation of the law in Scotland.

To answer the observation that these practices [443] passed without question, the appellants state, that it does not appear that the substitutes of entail, or any but the immediate successor, had an interest during the life of the actual tenant to question the lease, and that if questioned, the irritancy might be purged, with the consent of the tenant, so that the next heir would gain nothing during the life of the heir in possession. On the other hand, it is said, that if the taking grassums is unlawful, they may still be purged, notwithstanding the death of the Duke of Queensberry—a proposition which may call for your judgment. The appellants further represent circumstances which might induce the next heir not to question the lease—first, during the granter's life, it might be doubtful whether any declaratur of irritancy could be maintained, although grassum were taken, if the lease were short : for the tenant's life might endure beyond it, and that he might plead in defence ; secondly, he might be a near relation of the tenant, and perhaps answerable in his own person to indemnify the person who might have suffered by the supposed violation of the entail ; thirdly, he might have a wish to take grassums himself ;—and when I come to state the facts, you will see that the weight which belongs to such a suggestion is, that his predecessor may have left his disposable property to near connections, and the succeeding heir of entail could not therefore prosecute the irritancy without affecting such relations, if he were not himself, out of assets descended to him, answerable to repair the loss suffered by the effect of the irritancy. This thing happens perhaps nineteen times out of twenty in such successions ; and they point out in this list, [444] instances in which it has happened, and in which they therefore insist, that the person who could have challenged on account of grassum, had been prudent in not challenging on account of grassum, for that he would only have taken the burden of the grassum off the entailed to the unentailed estate, which would have been liable to it. Upon the whole, they say, therefore, that the list is by no means a formidable list on the head of the practice.

To this I think must be added, that the persons who now complain, Lord Wemyss himself, or that family at least, granted leases with grassums. On the other hand, it must be admitted, that great part of the entailed estates in Scotland do not appear, by any evidence we have before us, to have been in the hands of persons who have let leases for grassums. This circumstance, however, again, is to be taken into consideration with regard to the defenders, that there may have been very great difficulty on the part of those who were to endeavour to find out what had been the practice as to those entailed estates. It is quite obvious, undoubtedly, that the very importance of this point would lead persons to take a great deal of care, how they afforded the means of information to those prosecuting this cause, as to the circumstances in which their own estate stood.

On the head of practice, the respondents again refer to the practice with respect to Crown lands, and the practice with respect to Church lands. It is not my intention to go through all the reasoning upon that subject. I think it may be stated as to Crown lands, and also as to Church lands, [445] in that period the statutes * had not pointed out that the possessor was to reserve the rent subsisting at the time of his entry—if he did reserve that rent, he was not prohibited : unless you can argue from the case about teinds, as the Court of Session has done ; and with respect to Crown and Church lands, there has been a degree of irregularity in the management of them, which does not make the practice with respect to them of much importance. It is a consideration of some importance, however, because, particularly with respect to the Church lands, a practice did obtain in Scotland of taking grassums, which now obtains in England, and I believe in Wales, under the name of fines, not very much to the benefit, or with the approbation of those who have the good or bad luck to succeed receivers of those grassums or fines.

* As to the beneficed clergy under prelaties, by the Scots Stat. 1581, No. 101 ; and as to all ecclesiastical persons, including by name bishops, abbots and priors, by the Scots Stat. 1585, No. 11.

They have also stated many decisions of the Court of Session in Scotland, in which they represent that the right to take grassums has been established, and they cite a great many instances in which, as far as they go, there has been a general impression in the Courts of Scotland, in favour of the practice, as far as it is established by what the Judges have said, and what they have done, and what they have forborne to do or to say. In the case of Sir Archibald Denham v. William Wilson (Dict. of Decis.), writer in Edinburgh, as that case is stated in the papers on your table, and taken, as I understand, from the papers in the cause, "Sir William Denham of Westshiell, of the [446] date of August 11th 1711, executed a deed of entail of his lands of Westshiell, and burthened the same with an annuity of £4000 to Dame Katherine Erskine, spouse, afterwards Lady Schawfield. The pursuer, upon the decease of the late Sir Robert Denham, succeeded as heir of entail to the said estate, and soon found it absolutely necessary to bring a process against the defender, who for some time had been Sir Robert's factor upon that estate,"—(your Lordships will observe that),—"and likewise his agent and trustee, and had obtained an assignation to the rents that fell due during Sir Robert's life, to whom he had also confirmed himself executor-creditor.—The pursuer was advised, that it was the duty of the heirs of entail, out of the proceeds of the estate, to pay the lady's annuity, and keep down the annual-rents of the heritable debts of the tailzier with which the estate wa. chargeable."

Whether you are to call it an implied prohibition, or whatever else you may call it, it appears to me to be admitted in the papers before us, that the succeeding heir of tailzie was to keep down annuities out of the proceeds of the estate, and that he was likewise to keep down the annual rents of the heritable debts of the tailzier, with which the estate was chargeable, although in the tailzie there was no clause which ordered him to do so; and those duties of keeping down the annuity and the annual-rents by the persons representing the estate, are duties which one may venture to represent, as founded in an obligation which has some relation to the interest of those to come after him.

[447] The case continues thus: "It seems that Sir Robert's plan was to render the estate of as little value as possible to the next heir: for when the defender was factor, whatever payments of these burdens was made out of the rents of the estate, he, instead of taking discharges, took assignations in his own name; so that, had Sir Robert lived any number of years longer, by this scheme, the succeeding heirs of entail would have been quite cut off, and the tailzier's intention totally defeated."

But the matter did not rest here; Sir Robert Denham also fell upon a new, and what, with submission, appears a most unwarrantable device, to disappoint the heir of entail of a considerable part of the proceeds of the estate for many years after his decease, by letting leases for which he not only took considerable grassums,—(your Lordships will be pleased now to advert to the speciality of this case),—but also took bonds or bills from the tenants for part of their rents, payable by partial payments annually, for the same endurance with the tacks; to which bonds and bills it seems the defender had got assignation, and intimated the same some time after Sir Robert's decease.

When the process against the defender came before the Lord Bankton Ordinary, the pursuer insisted that the annual sums payable on these bonds and bills were part of the future rents of the estate of Westshiell, to which the pursuer, as heir of entail, had right, and therefore that his Lordship should, ante omnia, decern the defender to repay what he had uplifted since Sir Robert's death, by virtue of his assignation to these bonds and bills, and transfer [448] the same to the pursuer in so far as not uplifted. His Lordship, of the date of July 11th 1758, was pleased to make avisandum to the Lords with the above point, and to order informations to be given in for both parties: and then on the part of the pursuer, "Primo, It is contended, that these bonds and bills assigned by Sir Robert to the defender, could by no means be effectually conveyed to him for a longer endurance than Sir Robert's life; it might as well be pleaded, that Sir Robert could assign the whole rents of the estate for nineteen years, the term of the endurance of the tacks, as that part of the rents which is constitute by bonds and bills, than which nothing could be more absurd. Secundo, That there was no room to allege that the sums contained in these bonds or bills ought to be considered as grassums, which heirs of entail are frequently in use to take without challenge,—seeing at letting the present tacks considerable grassums were paid to Sir Robert, quite distinct from these obligations, to the extent of about £300 sterling, and the amount of the sums in these same bonds and bills comes to no less than £637 1s. 1d. Scots per annum of rent, which at the expiry of the tack makes a total of £11,521 8s. Scots, which by this device the heir of entail would be disappointed of, should this new invented plan meet with success.” Then they state, “that this is a most illegal machination: for at that rate, supposing an entailed estate should improve from £500 to £1000 sterling per annum, nineteen years rent of £500 a year might be conveyed to a stranger, in direct violation of the intention of [449] the maker of the entail: a scheme which, at first sight, appears fraudulent, and inconsistent with the law, so long as entails are permitted to take place in this country.” Then they insisted, that these were to be considered as annual rents in the nature of discharges: and they proceeded to state upon the whole, and under the circumstances of the case, that whatever might be said about that which was paid at the commencement of the lease as grassum, it was, as with respect to these bonds and bills, to be considered as rent.

On the other hand, it was insisted, that there was not the least pretence for this,—both sides agreed that grassum might be taken,—there was no point, therefore, brought before the Court as to that, but it must be admitted, that both sides agreed that grassum might be taken; and your Lordships will hear what the Judges said on that point: but Mr. Wilson said this in effect—This is a very strange claim you make,—for the result of it is neither more nor less than this—here are (I forget what number, but I think twenty-one) tenants, who upon the renewal of their leases, a dozen of them being in good circumstances, say, here is a grassum,—(this was an entail, where it was to be without a diminution of rental.)—here is a grassum, let us have our lease at the rent last paid:—the heir in possession takes the grassum from them.—With respect to other persons, not in quite so good circumstances as the former, they say we cannot pay down the grassum, but our grassum shall be so much, and we will pay you that, de anno in annum, till we have satisfied you the whole of it. The grassum, if it be legal, must be paid, it is said, at the commencement [450] of the lease; but, argues Mr. Wilson, if it can be taken at the commencement of the lease, how can it be illegal for the parties to agree that the landlord shall give credit to the tenant for the grassum, till such time as it shall be convenient for the tenant to pay it; or that, instead of receiving that grassum in one payment, he will take it in different payments, in succeeding years; supposing, for instance, a person who could not part with his money, had been able to find some person to make up the money, and that other person had paid the money, and that the landlord had then given him back his bond to pay the grassum at a particular period, or at particular periods. This, it was contended, was in substance and effect precisely the same thing.

The Judges, as far as we have notes of their judgment, express themselves in the following terms:—My Lord Kames says, “A bond payable for sums at the terms the rent is paid, is presumed a part of the rent.” Here it must be remarked, that the sums were not payable at the time the rent was paid; that is a mistake. “But in this case, we should not go upon presumptions; a proof ought to be allowed, that these bonds were granted for rents—these bonds must be paid to Sir Archibald.”

Lord Coalston says, “There is no fraud in this case—a lawful act to take bonds for grassums, as the heir of entail is not restricted in setting tacks:” so that he considers all this as grassum. The bonds were taken for what he thought a grassum, just as much as any payments could in the consideration of the Judges be considered as having the character of grassum.

[451] Lord Minto says, “The question depends upon this fact, Whether this is a grassum or a rent.” Mr. Justice-Clerk says nothing.

Then follows Lord Alesmere, and what he states, will be well worthy your Lordships attention:—“A deception of this kind is not unlawful, but if not cleverly done, it cannot be sustained. Every bungling operator is not fit to execute such nice operations. This deception is not properly executed—this appears to be rent, not a grassum.”

Lord Nisbet says, “This a grassum, not a rent, it has not the qualities of rents—no hypothec.”

Lord Auchinleck says, "These bonds rent, not grassums."

Lockhart, the defender's counsel, observed, that the heir of entail could have discharged these bonds; he could not discharge rents.

Upon the report of the Lord Ordinary, "The Lords sustain the defences of William Wilson, defender, against that part of the pursuer's libel which concerns the bonds and bills granted by the tenants of Westshiell to the deceased Sir Robert Denham, to which the said defender has right, partly by assignation, and partly as executor decerned and confirmed to the said Sir Robert Denham, and remit to the Lord Ordinary in the cause to proceed accordingly."

So that, in the first instance, the parties and the Court proceed upon the notion of grassum not being subject to objection. There was a very good reason for that: the Judges, one and all, were taking grassum themselves: even my Lord Alenmore, who thinks the deception was not unlawful, so that it was cleverly [452] done; but that here the operator was a bungler, and the payment therefore appeared to be rent, instead of grassum. Upon the whole, however, they were of opinion it was to be considered as a grassum, and they sustained the defences, as far as concerned the bonds and bills.

This was brought before the Court again; and it was argued, that this was an attempt to evade; that it signified nothing, whether the bonds and bills could be sustained or not; that it must be considered as a rent; and the Judges were finally of opinion, and came to this decision in substance—That if you contract for grassum at the commencement, you may take it, and keep it; and that the lease is a good lease, provided it be made without a diminution of the rental; but that, on the other hand, if you deal with a tenant, who cannot immediately pay you a grassum, and you agree with that tenant to take annually from him sums, which are in discharge of the grassum; in fact, those annual sums are not to be considered as grassums, but to be considered as rent; in other words, that the grassum must be presently paid, and you cannot give time, in the manner in which it is here stated, to pay the grassum de anno in annum. I understand that this case did not come before the House of Lords; but it is a case which deserves a great deal of consideration. It seems to decide, that if a sum of money, before or at the time of granting the lease, is taken as grassum, the heir of tailzie has no right to complain; but, if you can see from the whole transaction that the sum taken was reserved as rent, although expressly in discharge or satisfaction of grassum, then it must be taken as rent. But why, because to be paid in [453] future, it was to be taken as rent, appears to me a proposition extremely difficult to be deduced from the principles which must be supposed to have governed this case. (Vide post, 465, the further discussion of this case.)

There are several other questions, which we shall be obliged, I think, to put to ourselves, before we come to a determination of this case; and they may be put some of them in this way. It is said, that by the law of Scotland the heir of tailzie cannot make a lease, which is to reserve to himself, during the first five years of lease, £800 a year, and then to reserve, during the remainder of the lease, £500 a year; that the lease must not be more beneficial to the person holding at the commencement of the lease, than to those who are to take after him. Now, if that can be sustained as law, which is hardly denied, then this question presents itself: If a man cannot for the first five years of a nineteen years lease, take £1000 or £1500 a year for himself, reserving to himself, and those who come after him, £250 a year, for the remaining fourteen years of the lease—I may be wrong, but there does not appear to be a great deal of good sense in saying, he may do that per indirectum, which he cannot do per directum; that is to say, that instead of reserving the £1000 a year, or £1500 a year, for the first five years, he may reserve throughout the whole of the lease only £500 or £250 a year; and, instead of the £1500 a year, or the additional rent for the first five years, he may take in presenti from his lessee as much as that £1500 a year, or the additional rent for the first five years, would amount to.

[454] Supposing the meaning of the words, "without diminution of rental," to be, that you might let at the last rent; I conceive it would be the same in point of law, even if we had no authorities so to inform us, that if there were no such words to be found in the Buccleuch entail, as "the just avail at the time," you might lower the rent, stating the reason. Then, suppose the rent having been lowered, there is a third lere to be granted; what is the rent at which that third lease is to be granted? Is it the rent which was the last rent which had been so lowered; or are you to refer back again to that which was the rent before it was so lowered? I find, there is one case (Elliott v. Curries, Fac. Coll. Jan. 16. 1798)—(it was not a case where the last rent had been diminished on a subsequent lease, but) where the tenant who held, had ceased to hold, and the land was taken into the possession of the landlord himself, and he held it for a considerable time.—If the value of land, in the last year in which he so held it, had been asked, and it turned out that the value of the land to be let was £1000 a year; and, on the other hand, that the actual rent reserved, before that landlord took it into his natural possession, was only £500 a year—I understand there is one case, in which it has been held, that if the landlord chooses to let it again, he is allowed to let it, not at such a rent as the value at the period of his natural possession would justify, but at the low rent which the land was let for at the time when his holding commenced. If you consider what may be the effect of such a rule, I think you will see no small reason to doubt the principle upon which it stands.

[455] * In this case, the great and important question is, What is the effect of that thing, which in this case is called grassum, but which I apprehend must be called rent. With respect to the tacks made under this entail, sometimes inconsiderable sums were taken—one year's or two years rent, reserving sometimes the old rent, understanding the words, the old rent, to be rent recently paid before the lease is made. Upon this transaction, we are to decide what is the Scotch law applicable to the subject—we are to look at the practice—we are to look at the understanding of the Courts—we are to look at decision—and if an opinion should be ever so clearly entertained, that if the matter were res integra, it would be impossible to introduce the doctrine, that the heirs of tailzie may thus deal with estates; yet, if you find that doctrine at this day part of the law of Scotland; to any notion of the inexpediency of such law you ought to pay no attention, but to pronounce the law simply as you now find it to be.

On the other hand, as a lawyer, I do not shrink from stating, that there may be a great deal of practice in transactions of a particular nature; there may be a great deal of understanding, as to the legality or illegality of that practice; and there may be a great deal of decision, where the point decided is not the point in controversy; which understanding, it must be admitted, is important; [456] which practice is strong; and it must be admitted, that that general understanding is important testimony as to what the law is, and that the dicta of Judges, and what they have taken for granted in decisions not upon the point, are of great weight also, as testimony of what the law is; but nevertheless, the law may not be as that practice, or that understanding, or those dicta would prima facie import it to be.

The present case affords a very strong and cogent illustration of the doctrine which I have been stating. You see in this case, that from a particular period, long before the year 1600, and down to the year 1732, it was the constant doctrine, and the uniform decision of the Courts of Scotland with respect to teinds, that they were to be valued upon the rent constantly paid, and without reference to grassums taken by the person to whom that rent was constantly paid. If any person had asked prior to the year 1732, what was the law with respect to teinds, he would have been answered, Who can doubt it? Here are the doctrines and the decisions of the Courts; and yet in the year 1732 the Court of Session itself decided, that all this practice, and all this understanding, and all these decisions, were not according to the law of Scotland. I do not say, that the same principle as between the land-owner and the person who is entitled to the teinds, is to be applied in considering the effect of a deed of tailzie, as between the heir of tailzie in possession and the person to succeed; but I am only attempting to illustrate the observation, that both in England and in Scotland it has frequently occurred, that there is a great deal of practice, a [457] great deal of understanding, and many dicta, and yet when the thing came to be investigated, that practice, that understanding, and those dicta, were found to be without foundation.

With respect to long leases, what has been the practice in Scotland—what has been the understanding with respect to them—what have been the decisions sustaining them? It is but a few years since the Wakefield case was brought into the Court of Session, when they decided, that their practice, that their understanding, that their decisions were wrong; and when this House decided upon the question, whether long leases were or were not prohibited as “alienation,” under that word “alien,” although it was represented that the whole law of the country would be overturned; yet the Court of Session in the first instance, and this House on appeal, were of opinion, that notwithstanding all that practice, all that understanding, all those dicta and decisions, the law of the land was, that the word “alien” in a tailzie which had prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, did prohibit long leases as alienations.

* At this part of his address to the House, the Lord Chancellor observed, that in the March and Neidpath case, there were one or two of the leases expressly granted for the lifetime of the receiver, and the lifetime of the grantor; and that the question upon them would be, how far grassum affects them?

It is now stated in the papers upon the table, that “it is impossible not to admit, that there are grounds, both in principle and authority, for holding a long lease to be an alienation:” But they go on to state, “that the determination does not clash with the fundamental rules on which entails depend.” They further add, and in their words I had rather point out the distinction than in any of my own—“but the question with regard to the endurance of leases has no connection whatever with the question [458] of grassum, and it is impossible to deduce any analogy from the one, which can bear even remotely on the other.” If this be so, the powers of my mind are not equal to discover what is the principle upon which long leasing is alienation, and short leasing is not alienation. If we are to take it upon the strict rules of the interpretation of tailzies, then we must say, that alienation means transference of property; and a lease is neither in the law of England nor the law of Scotland, a transference of property. By the law of Scotland, until the statute of 1449, leasing, which in other words is called location, was a sort of right, (and so in the law of England), which the tenant had to enjoy the premises demised, or tacked, not by virtue of any transference of the property itself, but having a mere possessory right, or a mere personal right under the contract. In the year 1449, in Scotland, an act made it a species of real right; but though a species of real right, it is not a species of real right deduced from alienation in the technical and strict sense of the word, because alienation in the technical and strict sense of the word is transference of property.

If it be the law of Scotland, as it has now been finally determined to be (Wakefield case, ante), that under a prohibition to alienate, a long lease is prohibited, and if it be the law of Scotland, that a lease is not a transference of the property; yet, that in the construction put by the law of Scotland upon these deeds of tailzie, it applies strict construction to prohibit long leases; and yet it permits, upon grounds not of construction, but upon other grounds, [459] what are called short leases, or leases which are necessary for the manurance and profitable management of the land, however difficult it may be to declare that one lease is too long and another lease too short; yet we have at least got into this state, that every body seems to be agreed, that a lease of a certain duration is neither too long nor too short. I should say, if I were to lay down what I conceive is a duration of which that might be predicated, that a lease of nineteen years was neither too long nor too short; but whether I am right or not in saying, that a lease of nineteen years is neither too long nor too short, I know I am expressing myself according to the law of Scotland, when I say, that a lease of ninety years is too long; that it is an alienation, not because it is a transfer of property, but because it operates as mischievously as a transference of property.

If I am asked why short leases are not prohibited, I cannot answer.—I have read these papers, till I can hardly tell what is in them;—and I have not been able to find expressly, and in terms, why a short lease is allowed. I am obliged, therefore, to see why a long lease is not allowed, and when I find why a long lease is not allowed, I find why a short lease is allowed. The dicta and decisions with respect to forfeiture, with respect to deathbed leases, and so on, have this expression when they strike at long leases, “they cannot be considered as tacks, because they are not leases of necessary and ordinary administration;” some of them go so far as to say, because they have grassums. If this can be maintained that such is the principle upon which short leases are allowed, how can I be doing that [460] which is charged upon me, altering the law of Scotland, introducing a change into the law of Scotland, or striking at principles upon which deeds of tailzie have hitherto been construed.

With respect to those deeds of tailzie, it is impossible to overlook that which I find scattered in every author, that they are strictissimi juris, that they are considered odious. Yet it is difficult to deal with that proposition as applicable in the year 1685, or to affirm that the tailzies established by that statute are odious. I agree in this principle, that as, on the one hand, it would have been wrong in any Court of Justice to have added to that act of Parliament, so on the other hand, I think it would have been equally wrong in any Court of Justice to have taken away from the fair effect of it; and as to the effect of these tailzies, I do not, as a Judge, enter into the consideration of its placing the property extra commercium, if they happen to make an estate tail into what may be represented as a perpetuity.—I think it incumbent upon the Court to say, that what is complained of as an act which amounts to a breach of a tailzie, is a breach of the tailzie within that act of Parliament which sanctions the tailzie: and if the question is, whether a long lease is or is not an alienation within the meaning of the author expressed in the deed, it must also be considered whether it is an alienation within the intent and meaning of the act of 1685. Now that act has not one word about leases: it speaks of such provisos and conditions as you might think proper to insert in tailzies, but it has not one word about leases: and when they get the length of saying, that a long lease is an alienation, I cannot concur in the opinion [461] which I see expressed elsewhere, that it does not follow, that because a long lease is an alienation, a short lease is an alienation. It seems to me that every lease must be an alienation; but that it has been so long settled, and it is so necessary for the purposes of production and enjoyment that short leases should be endured, that it is impossible to disturb short leases, though you disturb long leases.

When we get to this point, there are many ways of considering the question with respect to those leases which were made by the Duke of Queensberry, and which are said to have been made for grassums. In this case there has been a considerable abuse in the application of that word "grassum." We have it said here, if you take a small grassum, you may take a large grassum, and it is very difficult to say why, if you take a small grassum, you should not take a large one: yet, I do not think it absolutely follows, that a sum may not be so very large as to be too large even to be a large grassum, so that that term grassum cannot be properly applied; and when I see the heir of entail on an old rent of 3s. a year, taking £300 by way of grassum, I should be glad to ask any lawyer in Scotland, of the century before the last, whether he had the least notion that the sum of £300 taken for a lease where the rental was only 3s. was in the law of Scotland bona fide a grassum?

This must be taken in two or three points of view. We must inquire first, what is the law—not what should be the law, if this were res integra. If the case is not touched by decision, we are next to ask what is the conclusion we are to come to, regard being had to the contents of these deeds of tailzie, and the [462] nature of that which has been done under these specific deeds of tailzie?

Now, inverting the order a little as to these considerations: first of all, I call your attention again shortly to what has been the practice; and although I think, that upon the analysis of the several cases in this list of leases which are here printed, the practice will prove to be infinitely less than it appears upon first sight to be, if you take for granted that all the leases stated in this list of leases were let for grassums; yet it is impossible for me to deny (and I ought to admit every fact which bears upon the question that will enable your Lordships to try the opinion I may give) that, even upon an analysis of these cases, looking at each and every of them, there is enough to form a considerable body of practice. I might also admit as probable, that no research can have been so effectually made, as to bring before you the full amount of this practice. There are many heirs of tailzie who are not inclined and will not be advised to assist such inquiries. I might also admit, that you have cases, in which parties have come into Court, not questioning grassum at all, in which Judges have stated certain dicta with respect to grassum, which must also be taken as evidence of the law; and where you have decisions, except those very lately indeed, in favour of grassum. To this I must add, that it is stated in these papers, and not denied, that the former possessor of this estate let many leases for grassums. The practice is also extremely weighty. Sir Hay Campbell, who states the result of his experience during a long professional life, in the course of which he has been in every respectable situation of [463] the profession, where he has had occasion to advise and to give judgments upon leases, states his idea of grassum in such a way as to amount, I must admit, to very strong proof of what has been the practice, and to afford strong proof of what he considered to be the law; and there can be no doubt that his conceptions of what is law, are very much to be regarded by those who are called upon to pronounce the law judicially, although he merely gives an opinion, and was never called upon to pronounce judicially upon the very point in question; but if he had been called upon to pronounce it, there can be no doubt what his opinion and judgment would have been.

On the other hand, there are an infinite number of estates tail, in which, as it is represented, and without contradiction in these papers, leases have not been granted on grassums. But as to this tailzie of the Duke of Buccleuch having been made in 1705, it does appear that grassums, in the fair sense of the word grassum, on short leases, were taken by those who had the care of the Queensberry estates while the Dukes were minors, or while some Duke was minor, and that the persons who in succession had the care of the estate, were persons who, from their situation,—the judicial situations they held in the country,—were likely to know what they could and what they could not legally do in the administration of the estate of an heir of tailzie.

There is another circumstance, which is evidence of practice, and of the law: namely, that in many cases, heirs of tailzie are prohibited from letting for grassums. I believe that those prohibitions are not of very ancient date; but, whatever may be their [464] date, whether it is more remote or more proximate, the fact that there are such prohibitions in deeds of tailzie restraining heirs of tailzie from letting with grassums, is some evidence at least that at the period at which such tailzies were made, and such prohibitions inserted, it was thought necessary there should be such prohibitions, and therefore it was thought you might let with grassums, provided there was no such prohibition in the tailzie.

With respect to the decisions upon the subject, I pass over the Church cases and the Crown cases, with the observations which I have made upon them, as bearing or not bearing upon this question. You will find them all stated at large, in the cases upon the table, and I cannot add to them; but there is nothing which bears as decision upon the point which I am now putting. I pass over the case of Leslie v. Orme. In that case, there was a grassum, but the case was not decided upon the effect of grassum; and it must be admitted, that the fact that it was not decided upon the effect of grassum is a fact of some weight. In that case, the lease for four nineteen years was sustained by this House. I can do no more than refer you to the observations which were made upon it, in the cases formerly in discussion in this House.*

With respect to the Westshiels case (Denham v. Wilson, 15 Jan. 1761), so far from being an authority in favour of grassums, it is in principle an authority against them. In that case the pursuer did not complain of grassums, and the defender had no complaint about grassum to answer. It was an action which did not strike at a lease on which grassum had been paid. It was an action by [465] a succeeding heir of tailzie asserting that he was entitled to consider as rent certain payments, which were secured by bonds and bills; and that the person to whom those bonds and bills had been assigned, was not entitled to take the money secured by the bonds and bills, because the heir said that whatever their apparent nature was, they were really securities for rent, and the rent of course belonged to the heir of tailzie who had succeeded to the estate. In that case several tenants took leases from the heir of tailzie in possession. With respect to many of them, they were made according to what they considered good practice. They took leases, and paid grassums down. With respect to others, the lessees did not pay grassums down, but they said in effect, we have not money to advance, but inasmuch as the heir of tailzie, according to our notions (I am now putting language into their mouths which I think their acts spoke, if their mouths did not utter it,) is not prevented from letting without diminution of the rental, (for that was a case, as appears by the papers on your table, in which the heir of tailzie could let, provided he let without diminution of the rental,) therefore, though we cannot now advance the grassum required, we will do what comes to exactly the same thing—we will take the lease at the old rent; that is, we will take it without diminution of the rental, and you have a clear right to grant it, (as we say, and as you say,) without diminution of the rental, and instead of paying you a grassum, which is defined in some of these papers to be a sum of money paid at the commencement of the lease, we will not pay at the commencement of the lease, but we will give you [466] something payable not on the land leased, we will give you bonds and bills for so much money, (those, to be sure, were for annual payments,) and, (as they contended), it makes no difference either with respect to the validity of those leases, or the claims of the heirs of tailzie to come afterwards, whether we stand simply in the relation of tenant to you the landlord or not. The transaction creates between us the relation of debtor and creditor; the heir of tailzie has nothing to do with that transaction. If you look at the opinions of the Judges given upon the hearing of that case, some say this is grassum, others say this is rent, others say that it is a deception, and that it must not be performed by a bungling operator, and so on. Sir Hay Campbell's note of what passed, is a very curious testimony to show how clear the law was in that year 1761, with respect to the powers of heirs of entail.

In the first instance, they all decided, (and certainly there again it is authority to be regarded, both with respect to the practice and with respect to the law itself)—they all decided that it was not grassum, and deciding that it was not grassum, whether the lease was good or not good, being granted for grassum, was a question they had not in that case to determine—it was not before them. They found, that as the succeeding heir of entail had not sought to affect this lease on the head of grassum, the Judges had nothing to do with it; that if they could not bring the sums granted under these bonds and bills into the account as rent, they could do nothing. And they could do nothing;—why? because the parties had not upon that subject submitted any [467] thing to them; and therefore, all that is said about grassum in that case, appears to me to be obiter dictum. The argument, which was repelled upon the second hearing, was an argument submitting to the Judges in that action, that the sums due upon the bonds and bills were not sums demanded in the action. It is impossible for the mind of man to say, that there is any sound distinction between a grassum that is paid, and a grassum that is agreed to be paid, and secured.—If it be rent, that is another matter.—There are two most able papers on the subject; but notwithstanding the ability with which it was argued that this was rent, and notwithstanding the decision that it was rent, I must take the liberty of saying, that after looking at that case again, and again, and again—after paying all the deference I can pay to the judgment—and after admitting all the weight that appears to me to be due to the great authority of the counsel of that day who signed the memorial before the Court of Session, I never can agree to that decision.

I say further, that when I see in these papers that grassum is treated as a thing impossible to be rent, because you cannot apply the remedies to grassum which by law and by acts of sederunt may be applied for the recovery of rent, I should be glad, if any body would tell me how then it was possible to apply those remedies to the payments secured under those bonds and bills. I am very far from saying that is a reason why it should not be considered as rent. Mr. Cranstoun has satisfied me, there may be such a thing as a fraud upon an entail. He has given instances in the memorial addressed to the Court of Session, where [468] one thing appears, and another thing is that which is designed. There is therefore no doubt on my mind that there may be fraud upon an entail; and I agree, that if this was meant to be a fraud upon the entail, by taking these bonds and bills not eo nomine as rent, but really and truly as rent, the trustees using this device to prevent the heir of tailzie or the Court of Session from saying what was the real transaction, the fraud might be overreached by the Court. But then the difficulty I have upon my mind is this, if the heir of tailzie could take the grassum which he did from tenant A. B. and could take the grassum, which he did not instantly take from tenant C. D. but bona fide agreed with C. D. that grassum should be thereafter paid, and paid by certain instalments: if the parties make a lease, which upon the hypothesis of what the law was then, was a good lease independently of that collateral transaction, by reserving rent without diminution of the rental, it appears to me, that to say because they have thought proper to constitute the relation of debtor and creditor, therefore the fruits of that relation were to be considered as rent, and to be ascribed to the relation of landlord and tenant, is a consequence that does not follow at all. The Westshiells case goes no farther than this, that the Judges of that day took it for granted that grassum was allowable where there was no diminution of the rent of the day, a proposition admitted by the pursuer, and not contended against by the defender; and they decided, that what was secured by these bonds and bills was rent, and was not grassum.

If that case had come before me as a Judge, I must have said I could make no distinction between [469] a grassum paid directly, and a grassum secured by way of future payment, that they are both of the same nature, and that unless both could be recalled (recalled is perhaps too strong a word to use, for there may be equities with respect to those grassums) but that unless they can both be objected to, he who admitted the right to take grassums upon that deed, ought in that case to have been held to have no right to call for the payment to him of the sums secured by those bonds and bills.

This brings to my mind the case now pending on appeal to this House, the case of the Earl of Elgin v. Wellwood. If nothing is grassum but what is paid at the commencement of the lease, how are your Lordships to deal with the case of the Earl of Elgin v. Wellwood *: there the grassum was no less than £12,000, which is not to be paid at the commencement of the lease, it is to be paid at the death of the landlord or the tenant; and that is a case which includes the other question, namely, whether, where there is a power or faculty to set tacks for such time as the party thinks proper, making such reservations as are thereby prescribed, letting for the term of 999 years is to be considered as setting a tack, or whether that was not to be considered as an alienation, notwithstanding the permission contained in the lease to which I am now alluding?

With respect to grassum, as with respect to long leasing, much difficulty has been introduced by some [470] late cases.—It is not my intention to go through them all; but I will call your attention particularly to the case of McGill (not reported); in the printed opinion of one of the learned Judges the following account is given of that case. He says, “the property was very considerable. As I was counsel in the cause, I can speak with some certainty. It was an action by the guardians of a minor heir of entail, whose father, on account of the very slender provisions allowed by the entail to his widow and younger children, had granted a lease of a part of the lands to a trustee for their benefit, with an expectation of its being afterwards let at a higher rent. The question was not very anxiously contested; the guardians, who were desirous that the additional provisions should be made good, having acquiesced in the first interlocutor that was pronounced, although some of the Judges expressed doubts as to the validity of the transaction. For this reason, I presume the decision is not mentioned in the reports, although a question of smaller pecuniary importance between the same parties is there noticed; and of this I am confident, that it was not considered by the Bar as a precedent upon which the country might rely. One case I remember, where an heir of entail in an estate yielding between five and six thousand pounds a year, was prevented from providing his widow in a jointure of more than £200 a year”—(I hope, that whatever may be the decision upon this case, something may be done by Parliament by way of regulation upon this subject, and without delay, for the purpose of giving security to what perhaps this decision might other-[471]-wise tend to shake, and prevent having effect)—“upon the authority of the decision in the case of McGill, he proposed to grant a trust lease of certain farms, which it was supposed might yield increased rents when the current leases were at an end. The answer by the counsel was, that there could be no objection to the granting of a trust lease; but that, as no certain reliance could be placed upon it in a question with the succeeding heirs of entail, the trustee should have it in view, out of the surplus funds, while the heir of entail lived, to accumulate such a sum as might be necessary.” I cannot conceive that this case can be considered, after what I have read, as a case of grave authority.

Your Lordships will obtain a very correct idea, which will enable you to be more precise in your views of this subject of grassum, from a paper printed in a case which I have now in my hand, and which has the name of "Blair, Solicitor-General, as to the mode of making a lease subject to provisions for younger children," undoubtedly with a view of avoiding what my Lord Almore calls a bungling operation. He puts it thus: "What occurs to me as the most unexceptionable mode of conducting a transaction of this kind, if the execution of it shall be found practicable, is this, that the new lease should be granted for a real grassum to be drawn by the memorialist at the time, not from the occupier of the land, but from some third party, or any other person who shall agree, in consideration of getting the new lease in his name, to advance a sum of money equal, or nearly equal, to [472] the value thereof, to be drawn back by him from a sub-tenant yearly, during the currency of the lease. For this purpose, it will be necessary, in the first place, to fix with certainty the value of the new lease, which can be done by previously making an agreement with a person who is to occupy the land in character of sub-tenant, at such rent as the land may be worth. The surplus rent, therefore, which is to be drawn by the principal tenant, being thus known, it becomes an easy matter of calculation to ascertain what is the present value of such surplus rent for the space of nineteen years, or whatever may be the endurance of the lease. If any person can be prevailed upon to advance a sum in the name of grassum equal to the present value of the lease so calculated, making however a reasonable allowance for the trouble and inconvenience of being reimbursed by yearly payments from the sub-tenant, the transaction I think would answer every purpose which the memorialist has in view. The person advancing the money would be the principal tenant, paying a grassum for a real lease granted in his favour at the old rent, and drawing an annual surplus rent from the sub-tenant, who would just be liable to pay the rent which he agreed for, without having any connection with the grassum, and the memorialist would draw a sum of money which would be entirely at his disposal. Upon the supposition that the heir of entail has the power of setting farms at the old rent and taking grassums, (which is understood to be a settled point), I do not see upon what grounds such a transaction could [473] be challenged.—There may be a difficulty in getting a person to advance money upon the security of a lease, and on the prospect of being reimbursed out of a surplus rent."

This is a mode in which a transaction of this sort is thought to be most advisably carried into execution; but when this mode is stated to have had the opinion of so learned a man as Mr. Blair, it must be admitted that it is "upon the supposition that the heir of entail has the power of setting farms at the old rent, and taking grassums; which is understood (as he says) to be a settled point." But upon such a transaction, if you are to look at the real nature of it, what in the world is it but anticipation of rent! The lease is to be let at the value of the land; there is to be a previous agreement for a lease at the value of the land; an estimate is then to be set upon such a lease, that is, in other words, having agreed for a lease upon the full value of the land, another lease is made to somebody else at the old rent with a grassum, and the heir of entail in possession is to have the disposal of this grassum if he has got it; or if he did not take the grassum, somebody else is to have the benefit of the lease, with regard to which a calculation is to be made of the grassum. If that is not anticipation of rent, there surely is nothing prohibited.

I have called your attention to what has been considered to be grassum, and contrasted that with what passed in the case of Westshiells, where bonds and bills were taken, it not being thought necessary that the rent should be increased, and those bonds and bills were held to be rent, because they said they [474] were connected with the transaction. But how it can be held that grassum is not anticipation of rent, consistently with the opinion given in the Westshiells case, is a difficulty I cannot get over.

Great as the name of Mr. Blair is—and there never did exist in the judicial state a man entitled to a higher character,—it is impossible to look into these papers without seeing how unsettled his notions were as to the question whether long leases might be granted of entailed estates.

The result of the whole in reference to dicta and decision, coupled with practice, will be, whether there is or is not so much of decision upon this point as to have become settled doctrine, hallowed and sanctified by time: so that if this case had been agitated some thirty or forty years ago, we must have come to the same decision. No one can state more strongly than I should be disposed to represent to you, that the current of authorities in the Court below, standing on grounds that could not be shaken, must be considered to have been established on sound principles, in order that the law may be settled. But here the question at last would be, whether you have so much of decision upon this point as precludes you from examining what is the principle upon which you have acted in other cases, and particularly with respect to long leases, to which I have before alluded.

It has never been suggested that rent could be diminished under a tailzie. I must be understood to be speaking, not of tailzies containing express prohibitions, or under circumstances where it is of necessity that the rent is diminished; but of tailzies where there is nothing about diminution of rent in the tailzies [475]—of tailzies where the necessity of reducing it does not occur from the state of the times, and where you are therefore to look at the charter of tailzie, which prohibits alienation and long leasing, and that upon a principle which has been stated in all the cases in which that prohibition has been mentioned. Can it be said, notwithstanding long leases are prohibited by the prohibition to alienate, yet if there is nothing in the charter that prohibits diminution of rent, and if there is nothing in the circumstances of the times which warrants diminution of rent, the heir of tailzie, who cannot grant a long lease, because that is not for necessary and ordinary administration, may, nevertheless, sink the last rent to the lowest sum, which is a farthing above illusory rent. I beg to ask what a system of law must that be which says, you shall not let a lease for thirty years, (I take this duration for the purpose of illustrating what I mean, though we have got no lower than fifty-seven; your Lordships have said fifty-seven years is prohibited, because that is in its nature an alienation; and that it is in its nature an alienation, because it is placing on the tailzie an incumbrance, not of necessity and for ordinary administration), and yet, if there be no prohibition of that kind, that word “alienation” will permit you to sink the value of the estate for nineteen years, if that is the longest term which the word alienation will permit, whether grassum is paid or not, to such a sum as is just one single farthing above that sum, which will constitute an illusory rent. It is not immaterial that the question should be considered in this point of view, because I admit that if the law be so, if you can do that, it bears strongly upon your power with respect to the present question; but if [476] the law be so that you cannot do that, I will not call it an implied prohibition, but I do say that it is a non-capacity, imposed upon the heir of tailzie, represent him as much as you please as the absolute heir or manager of his estate—imposed upon him, not by the terms of the tailzie, but by the same principle which imposes upon him the restraint, not to let leases for ninety-seven or fifty-seven years, or any number of years not of necessary and ordinary administration.

There is certain evidence of what is the law upon that subject. In the first place, something is to be found upon the subject in these papers. Lord Meadowbank in one case states, that diminishing the rent much, he would call even fraud. There is one of the Judges who says, he would not permit a diminution of the rent. Sir Hay Campbell, according to the paper which I read to you, certainly supposes there could not be a diminution of rent; he conceives from the nature of a tailzie that a diminution of rent could not take place, unless there is a necessity for such diminution. Upon what grounds do these opinions rest, unless it be that such incapacity is imposed upon the heir, not for his own sake, but to preserve a just dealing with the tailzied estate.

I can never come to the decision of a Scotch cause, which involves an important question, without fear and trembling. It would be folly for any man in my situation, to suppose he is to deal with questions of Scotch law, as he would with questions of English law. I always recollect, that with respect to the judgments of the Courts of Scotland, it is our first duty to employ ourselves industriously in investigating those subjects which come before us, [477] and I know it would be ridiculous to suppose that the nature of our jurisdiction is not open to error, from the circumstance, that those who have to advise your Lordships can only occasionally inform themselves. But with much diffidence in myself, and great respect to others, I am bound to preserve my independence as a Judge, and weighing every circumstance, to enable me to form a solid and a right opinion, I advance to that point in which conscience will not permit me to speak other than the language of the law.

With these observations, I apply myself again to what is the law of Scotland with respect to mansion-houses and policies. It is admitted since the Greenock case,* the Roxburgh case,† and others which might be mentioned, that the heir of tailzie cannot disappoint his successor of the mansion-house and policies: yet the author of the tailzie has not prohibited him by a single word, for this doctrine applies to those cases, where the author of the tailzie has not prohibited him from doing what he pleases with those mansion-houses, and those policies: but yet the law has said they are the residences of the heirs of tailzie in succession, and we will imply the prohibition. But leases, they say, of mansion-house and policies are not protected by the act of 1449. Why are they not protected by the act of 1449? You find words by which lands and tenements are protected by the act of 1449, yet you find the cases mentioned in which as to lands and tenements that act is not applied to protect them.

[478] Tenants in fee simple, those who in the largest sense are absolute fiars, have an unlimited discretion as to mansion-houses and policies. This was strongly impressed upon the minds of Scotch lawyers in the Roxburgh cases, by the great professional talent of Mr. Clerk. When the feus were made, it was thought necessary to except and reserve for the succeeding heirs of entail, the principal mansions and many acres of land adjoining. Upon what principle was this?—it was thought to be contrary to the intention of the author of the tailzie, who had not said one word about his mansion-house, to permit it to be given out of the possession of those who he hoped would there maintain hospitality among their Scotch neighbours, and continue to receive the respect so justly due to the Scotch nobility.

As to the power of selling woods (to be cut down after the decease of the heir of tailzie), I never considered that as an implied prohibition; I said only that in such respect he was not the same monarch, having the same unlimited estate and power over his lands as an English tenant in fee simple, or the absolute fiar in Scotland. The tenant in pure fee can sell his wood to be cut, and this shows that the principle is not generally applied. There is no doubt, that the Scotch heir of tailzie may denude (to use the word) the estate of every stick upon it, timber, and saplings, and every thing else that should be permitted to grow; in short, he may do all the waste he can do in the course of his life. That is what our tenant in fee can do, but what our tenant in tail cannot do.‡

As to the objections arising from the difficulty and [479] uncertainty of the proposed rule of law in its application, the same occur in the Courts of this country when they are required to decide what is an illusory share of a sum of money which a man has a right to appoint. Mr. Selden was certainly wrong in saying, that the decision of the Court of Chancery depended on the length of the Chancellor's foot. But I may admit as an exception or qualification, that when the Court comes to decide what is an illusory share, that does very much depend upon what is the length of the Chancellor's understanding. Sir W. Grant was so sensible of the difficulty, that he came to the decision, that he never would hold any share to be illusory, which no former Chancellor had done (Butcher v. Butcher, 9 Ves. 399). The question comes to this, What is the principle which you are to apply to this case, and what does that principle require of you? Unfortunately that is open to what arises by way of observation, I mean according to legal opinions and criticisms, upon the words of the charters themselves.

I endeavoured, when I read in one of those charters, in the March and Neidpath entail the words, "without diminution of the rental," to see how I could deal, upon any construction which I could put upon those words, with a great variety of questions which may possibly arise. What does this word diminution of the rental mean with respect to time? Does it mean, that you are to look at the date of the charter, and that you are to preserve always the rent as it is stated in the charter? If that is the case, would it be called a diminution of the rental, supposing the rental of this estate [480] to be £10,000 a-year, if the tenant in tailzie in possession lets farm A. at £100 a-year more than it before let for, and farm B. at £100 less? In one sense, that is no diminution of rental. Suppose he lets farm A. for £100 a-year more, and lets farm B. for £50 a-year less than it was before let for, there being upon the whole a gain of £50 in the rental. Is that a diminution of the rental or not in the law of Scotland? I have no means of answering that question but by stating that a great authority (Mr. Blair) says, he thinks the heir of entail is not entitled so to deal with the estate, but that he is bound to raise the rents in proportion. So that you have to determine, if you take this limited sense of the word, "without diminution of rental," whether that means a diminution of the total quantity of rent upon the whole of the farms, admitting of a diminution of rental for parcel of the estate, but still preserving the whole quantum of rent upon the whole taken together. According to the opinion to which I have adverted, if you diminish the rent of farm A. though you still preserve the quantum of rent upon the whole, by raising farm B. in proportion, you do not answer the Scotch idea of the meaning of these words.

‡ There is the appearance of mistake in the opinion expressed by the Lord Chancellor as to the powers of an English tenant in tail. The Report agrees with the note of the short-hand writer, and the sense in which the passage is to be understood will appear by considering the point of comparison between the Scotch tenant of tailzie and the English tenant in tail.

There is another case we must look to, in order to know what this means. Suppose, that when the author makes his tailzie, he is in the natural possession of a part of the estate, that other part of the estate is in possession of tenants:—he dies:—the next heir of tailzie makes a lease, and he is to make a lease without diminution of the rental; what is [481] the sense of the words "without diminution of the rental," with respect to those lands of which his predecessor was in the natural possession, and which perhaps never were let at any rent at all! or they may have been let at some rent, before the time of the author of the tailzie, who, during his time, was in the natural possession! If they never were let at any rent previous to that time, then the words "without diminution of rental," with respect to that estate, cannot, in the technical sense of the words, mean without diminution of rental; because, according to that construction, he would be empowered to let the whole estate, including all that part in the natural possession of the entailer, for the rent of that part not in the natural possession of the entailer. To get rid of that difficulty, you must take the true value of that which was never let before, and so the words, "without diminution of rental," do not necessarily bear the technical sense of those words; but in order to give a rational construction to those words, you must take into your consideration the value of that on which there can be no diminution of the rental.

Suppose again, that the land in the natural possession of the entailer had fifty years before been let at a rent. Could it be said, (something like it has been said lately, but I cannot assent to it,)—could the next heir of tailzie, being bound to let without diminution of the rental, say the author of the entail was in the natural possession of this part, which was worth £5000 a-year during his possession; but the last time this was let, which was fifty years ago, it was let at £2000 a-year; I will let farms A. B. [482] C. and D. which were not in the natural possession of my author, at the rent which they yielded when the entail was made; but with respect to that which was in the natural possession of my author, and which, if it had not been in the natural possession of my author, would, before his death, have increased from £2000 to £5000, it is no diminution of the rental to pass over the period of his enjoyment, in which the value of it had so much increased. I will take the £2000 a-year, as a ratio of the rent. I say that is impossible. I have therefore, when I read these words, asked myself what they can mean. Here is annexed in the papers, the rental to the tailzie—Is it then to be contended, that the manner in which it is to be discovered whether there is an evident diminution of the rental or not, is to put upon the heir of tailzie the obligation to see whether there is sixpence abated from the former rental. I cannot conceive that to be the meaning of the author of the entail. I am of opinion, that the words "without evident diminution of the rental," mean without diminution of such fair rent as may be obtained.

We are told no person can deal with this decision; that you put such a difficulty upon the heirs of tailzie, that they must go to what in this country we call auction, and what in that country they call roup; that it will not be safe for them to act at all.

To that I answer, I feel no difficulty in the world upon that subject. And when we are told, as we are told over and over again in the papers before us, that he who is not to diminish rent, is not bound to increase it. I apply the principle which appears to me [483] to be a very fair principle to apply. You are not bound to increase it, I admit: but you are not bound to increase it, for this reason, that it may be taken, if you do not, to be the just rent. In this country, (and do not let it be supposed I am confounding the powers of tenants in tail in this country, with those of tenants of tailzie in Scotland), in a similar case, the author of the power always imposes it as a condition, that the lease shall be made for the best rent which can be obtained. Then what is the evidence, upon the execution of the power? Show me that he takes no more for himself than he leaves for his successor, and that is evidence (Presumptive, ante, p. 428) that it is the best rent which can be obtained. Show me that he does for himself only that which he does for others, and no difficulty can arise.

Suppose a man of the age of eighty, (and the Duke of Queensberry was about the age of eighty when he made some of these leases,) calculates his own life, and says, I may live for five years—Now, I will let for nineteen years; at £1500 a-year for five years, and £500 a-year for the rest of the nineteen. It was positively asserted, but I really cannot give my assent to the proposition, that such a lease as that could not be set aside by the succeeding heir of tailzie. I will not say that it can be, but there has been no instance produced of such lease. What is the state of the law of Scotland if grassum can be so taken: such a contrivance would not be endured by the law of Scotland—What does it amount to? The heir in possession says, I will take a grassum of [484] £5000; my way of taking that grassum of £5000 is not to take it in one sum, but to divide it into payments for the first five years, and then, at the expiration of the first five years, those who come after me, instead of having £1500 a-year, shall have £500 a-year. No, says the law of Scotland, you shall not have it so; if you mean to take it at all, you shall have it once for all—you may not take such an advantage by instalments, but you may take it at once in the name of grassum. I should be very glad if those who are more conversant with this subject, would tell me upon what principle such a doctrine can stand. The case may be thus illustrated: Here is a farm called A, and another farm called B, each of them was let: the last rent was £100. I am obliged to keep up the old rent, at least it is contended that that is so, as far as I can judge, I think it is so, and upon my opinion that it is so, I must decide with respect to farm A, and I take £500, and let it for the old rent; but with respect to farm B, unless I can get that £500 paid down to me in presenti, I cannot apportion it on the first four or five years of the lease: for what I receive de anno in annum must continue. Now that this is the state and principle of the doctrine there can be no doubt.

If this view of the case be right, on the words "evident diminution of the rental," I think there is no difference with respect to the words contained in the prohibitory and irritant and resolute clauses of the Buccleuch case, "without diminution of the rental at the least at the just avail for the time."

Looking at the opinions which have been deli-[485]-vered, it is curious to observe the different views which the human mind takes of the meaning of words. Some of the learned Judges are clear of any doubt whatever, that these words mean, at all events at the just avail at the time: others of them are clear, without any doubt whatever, that it means no such thing, and that it means, that if you cannot get the last rent, you must not let the estate at all: others are of opinion, that you might let it at the last rent; and if you do let it for less than the last rent, you shall let it at least for the just avail at the time. These opinions are supported by many very curious and ingenious cases.—They say, if you hire a workman for twelve hours, or from sunrise to sunset, you must pay him, if he has employed the interval between those periods, if there are not twelve hours from sunrise to sunset. I say that is all very well; but you are dealing with other subjects. Another learned Lord says, if I order my servant to go with my corn and sell it at its value, that is, at the market price, at least at the market price the preceding day: what should I say to my servant if he came back again, and said, I did not sell it at the market price of this day, but I did sell it at the market price of the last day; but, Sir, I have to inform you, that when I went to market, I was bid three times as much for it as the price paid on such day. The master immediately says, the servant cannot possibly have understood my meaning—My meaning was this; get the market price of the day if you can, at least get the market price of the former day; but do not conclude from my saying, you are to get the market price of this, or the market price of the last day, that [486] I mean to authorize you to sell my corn at half its price, if you get double the market price of either day.

The question then is reduced to this: What is the meaning of the provision which is made in favour of the succeeding heirs of tailzie? I think the meaning of it is this; by way of direction to the heir in possession—"get what you can—recollect what is the rent—do not let it be diminished, unless it is necessary it should be diminished; take the just avail at the time in all cases, not in that case only when the just avail at the time is less than was the rent before actually paid." The person making the entail could not have meant to say, "I have not the slightest wish or intention that my heir of tailzie should get the value of the estate; I mean to let him take less than the present rent, if he cannot get the present rent; but although I guard against his taking less than the just avail at the time, I do not mean that he should take the just avail at the time, when that is higher than the present rent."

If notwithstanding what has been the practice, and notwithstanding any thing that may be called decision, there is a principle upon which you are entitled to say that grassum is anticipated rent; if that is now the Scotch law, these leases cannot be maintained. God forbid you should say it is the Scotch law, if it is not so! I would not say it, if I were not convinced it is the Scotch law; but all law ought to stand upon principle, and unless decision has removed out of the way all argument and all principle; so as to make it impossible to apply them to the case before [487] you, you must find out what is the principle upon which it must be decided. After all the consideration I have been able to give to the case, my opinion is, that grassum is anticipated rent; what constitutes it so, and what may be the effect of such a decision, may require a good deal of consideration, with a view to apportioning that anticipated rent; or if the tack is such a tack as the heir in possession ought not to have made, to decide to what extent you will place in situations of inconvenience, persons exposed to all the inconvenience which may arise in consequence of such a decision.

I do not advert now to the alternative leases. With reference to the question whether they are good or not, I am not sure whether it would not be my wish to remit so much to the Court of Session, if the alternative leases steer clear of the objection which applies to the others; but I do not find that any of those leases are clear of the valid objection on the ground of grassums, if it be a valid objection, not even the cases of Crook and Flemington Mill.

Entreating your Lordships to believe that I have given to this subject a degree of painful attention, which I hope I shall be relieved from ever giving to any other, if I am in an error, I cannot extricate myself by the operations of my own mind; and the view my mind takes of the subject, that view my conscience obliges me in my judgment to express. With these observations, I conclude this matter to-day, and on a future day will propose to your Lordships some findings which may be, in my opinion, agreeable to the principles which I have stated.

[488] With respect to the leases of Flemington and Crook, and likewise a farm called Edstoun, it is insisted there were no grassums; it is likewise insisted, that if there was any diminution of the rent in point of fact, it was a diminution rendered absolutely necessary by the circumstances under which the heir of tailzie was placed—he not having the power of letting at the same rent. These are cases also in which the summons has the alternative conclusion, that if these very long leases are not good, certain leases of certain durations there mentioned may be permitted; and the Court seems to intimate an opinion, that the alternative leases might be good, provided there was no fault on the part of the tenant. With respect to the leases depending upon that question, both on account of the manner in which the title on the part of the tenants has been created, which seems to me not to have been sufficiently investigated; and likewise on account of the extreme importance of the question, Whether leases with alternative durations can or cannot be sustained as tacks? on reconsidering which question, I have not been able from the papers laid on your table, or on the search I have been able to make into books, to find sufficient reason to offer to your Lordships a decided opinion upon the point. With respect to the Flemington and Crook case, I shall propose to your Lordships to remit these cases to the Court of Session, generally to review the interlocutors complained of, and to do therein what may be just.

As to the supposed matter of equitable consideration, which is proposed for the consideration of the [489] House, whether you can look at these grassums as taken generally for the benefit partly of the heir in possession and partly for the successor, and apportion them, there certainly is a passage which has been pointed to my attention since I last addressed your Lordships, which somewhat indirectly brings that forward for consideration.—On looking into the papers, it appears to me to be quite impossible that it should be disconnected with the question of purging the irritancy; and as this question has not yet been discussed and decided in the inferior Court, we cannot entertain it as a matter of original jurisdiction: and whatever, therefore, may be the decision with respect to that case, I am not aware that if your Lordships adopted an opinion as to the power to make tacks, and as to the validity of the tacks, that they should be shut out from proposing it to the Court of Session. With respect to my own opinion, I shall say no more than I intimated the other day, that I think it will be found extremely difficult indeed to sustain the leases.

I will now state, in a few words, the view which I have taken of the other cases, and the propositions which I shall have the honour of making with respect to them. With respect to the lease of Harestanes, in which case the Trustees of the late Duke of Queensberry, and Alexander Welsh, the tenant, were appellants, and the Earl of Wemyss respondent; that is a case which brings into question the validity of grassums, and is also to be determined upon other circumstances; and among others, the circumstance that the tack is for fifty-seven years. Conceiving that that tack of fifty-seven years is an [490] alienation within the meaning of the entail, it will not be necessary for me, in my view of the case, to say more as to this case, than to propose to affirm the interlocutors complained of.

With respect to the case of Symington, who is the tenant of the farm of Edstoun, it is a case which has an alternative ish, and it might have been necessary to reconsider that case, because it is case affected by that circumstance. But it may be disposed of upon other grounds. (See the minutes of the judgment. Vide post, p. 533.)

In the case of the appeal of the Duke of Buccleuch against the Executors of the deceased William Duke of Queensberry, I propose to reverse the interlocutor of the 7th March 1816, and to find, that the late Duke of Queensberry had not power, by the entail under which he held the land, to grant tacks for terms of years, partly for yearly rent and partly for a price or sum paid to the Duke himself; and that tacks granted by him, upon surrender of former tacks which had been granted partly for yearly rent and partly for prices or sums paid to the Duke himself, ought to be considered as partly granted for prices or sums paid to the Duke, and that such tacks ought not to be considered as let without diminution of the rental, or at the just avail, and are therefore to be considered, as between the parties claiming under the entail, as tacks which he had not power to grant by such entail; and with that finding, to remit the cause back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this finding.

[491] In the case of the Duke of Buccleuch against the Executors of the late Duke of Queensberry, and Hyslop, the tenant of Halscar, I propose, to reverse the interlocutor complained of in the appeal, and to find that the late Duke of Queensberry had not power by the deed of entail to grant the tack in question, the same having been granted upon the surrender or renunciation of a former tack then unexpired, and which former tack had been granted by the Duke at the same rent, and also for a sum or price received by him; and that the said tack having been granted, partly in consideration of the rent reserved thereby, and partly in consideration of a price or sum before paid to the Duke himself, and of the renunciation of the said former tack, therefore to find that the tack in question ought to be considered, in this question with Hyslop the tenant, as let with an evident diminution of rental, and not for the just avail; and with this finding, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as is just and consistent with this finding.

With respect to the Whiteside case, I propose to find, that William late Duke of Queensberry had not power, under the entail, to let tacks, partly for annualrent and partly for sums and prices paid to himself; and that tacks granted upon the resignation of former tacks, which were granted partly for rent reserved and partly for sums and prices paid to the Duke himself, are to be considered as tacks made partly for rent reserved and partly for sums and prices paid to the [492] Duke himself; and that the tacks in question having been granted partly for rent reserved and partly for a sum or price paid to the Duke for a former tack renounced, for which a sum or price had been paid besides the rent reserved—the same is to be considered, as between the persons claiming under the entail, as a tack, partly for rent and partly for a sum or price paid to himself, and ought not to be considered, in a question with the tenants claiming under the said tack, as let without evident diminution of the rental; and with this finding, to remit the cause to the Court of Session, to do as it should deem just, consistent with this finding.

With respect to Edstoun, to adjudge precisely in the same terms as I have just proposed as to the Whiteside case.

The only other cases are those which relate to Crook and Flemington. I propose to your Lordships to remit to the Court of Session the interlocutors in both those cases to be reconsidered.

The orders and judgments of the House in the several cases were according to the opinions and proposals of the Lord Chancellor.*

LORD REDESDALE.†

My Lords: There are two entails now under consideration, applying to different estates, and with different limitations: One of them applicable to the March and NEIDPATH estate, with respect to which the Earl of Wemyss is the person contesting, with the Trustees of the late Duke of Queensberry and the tenants, the validity of leases granted by the Duke; the other, applicable to what is called the QUEENSBERRY estate, in which the question is between the Trustees of the late Duke of Queensberry and the Duke of Buccleuch, upon a proceeding somewhat of a different description from that in the former case, for the purpose of obtaining a declaration, that all the leases expressed in the proceedings to have been granted by the late Duke of Queensberry, of the Queensberry estate, have been granted according to the power vested in him by the entail of that estate. There is also this distinction betwixt the two cases. With [494] respect to the March and Neidpath estate, it is not contended that the leases which are now in question, were authorized by any power contained in the deed of entail; for the leases which have been granted are not either for the grantor's life, or the life of the receiver, which is the only species of lease expressly referred to in the settlement of the March and Neidpath estate. With respect to the Queensberry estate, the leases are of a different description; because, supposing the word "disponi," in the entail of the Queensberry

* The Lord Chancellor concluded by saying, that he had never been able to look at these cases without being satisfied, that in whatever way they were determined, it would be absolutely necessary for the stability and security of titles to property in Scotland, that some Act of Parliament should be passed.

The Earl of Lauderdale observed, that after this judgment, a declarator would lie against any heir of tailzie who took a grassum; and that being the case, this judgment would give rise to such a scene of litigation as absolutely to require an Act of Parliament to be brought in to declare what is the law.

The Lord Chancellor replied, that the proposition which he intended to make, would bring before the House that consideration; and he hoped, whenever that matter should be brought before the House, the peers would express more fully their opinions upon that subject.

† This speech was delivered before the conclusion of that of the Lord Chancellor, but it has been thought preferable to preserve the connexion of the Lord Chancellor's judicial opinion by postponing these observations of Lord Redesdale.

estate, to have the same effect as the word "alien," the leases impeached are sought to be supported under a power of leasing, which is contained in the settlement of that estate.

The form of the action which has been brought by the Trustees of the late Duke of Queensberry against the Duke of Buccleuch, to have this great number of leases declared to be good, was a subject of consideration of your Lordships when this case was before your Lordships upon a former occasion; and your Lordships directed the cause to be remitted* back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to review generally the interlocutor complained of in the appeal then depending; and special directions were given as to the points to be reconsidered upon such review.

Upon this remit the Court to whom it was made have pronounced an interlocutor repelling the defences, and finding, decerning, and declaring, in [495] terms of the original libel. The terms of the original libel required an unqualified declaration in favour of all the leases in question. It would have been to me somewhat satisfactory, if the Lords of Session had thought fit to express that they had considered the several subjects respectively to which their attention was particularly called by the remit, and had expressed that they had so done, in the decision which they have made upon the subject. At present, we are only enabled to form a judgment how far they took the particular subjects into their consideration, in consequence of the notes with which we have been furnished, importing to be notes of what fell from the Lords of Session respectively.

Upon those notes I feel myself compelled to state, that, as far as I can form any judgment, the Lords of Session have totally mistaken the object of the remit in one point—that object not being to obtain the opinions of the Lords of Session, whether, generally, an action of declarator respecting the validity of the leases could be entertained; but whether by the persons, and under the particular circumstances which are mentioned in the remit, such action could be entertained? Upon that subject the Lords of Session have given to your Lordships no satisfaction whatever. It appears to me strange, that these learned Lords should have so mistaken the terms of the remit: but, perhaps, it was much easier to mistake the terms of the remit, than to grapple with all the difficulties which the terms of the remit, not mistaken, might have imposed. We must, however, now deal with the decision such as it is. I cannot forbear [496] observing also upon the language used in some of the memorials upon the subject, with respect to what may have fallen from Noble Lords in this House. There is a style and a manner which are becoming upon such a subject; and I will only say at present, that I cannot apply that word to all that is to be found in some of these memorials.—I trust, my Lords, that the practice will not be continued.

With respect to the leases themselves.—In the Neidpath case, the first question which occurs, arises upon the length of the term which has been granted. It seems to be a very serious question, To what extent that can be carried? There is another case † upon your Lordships table, in which the question is, Whether a lease of 999 years may be granted of an entailed estate. I leave your Lordships to consider what may be the effect of leases for 999 years of an entailed estate. Your Lordships will recollect, that during that term of 999 years, the estate will nominally belong to one person, and really to another; that the consequence will be, that the power and influence of such property will be divided—divided, in a greater or less extent, according to the possible improvement of the property, or the difference in the value of money, from time to time; and at length, the lessee for 999 years may have an infinitely better property than the tenant who succeeds to the entailed estate, and the power and influence arising from the estate will be wholly in the lessee, and the tenant of the [497] tailzie will be a mere annuitant. One of the greatest evils affecting another part of the united kingdom, arises out of the leases renewable for ever, which have been granted in that country, where leases for 999 years have also been granted, to a great extent. Knowing all the political evils which have resulted from that practice, I take it upon me to say, that if a lease for 999 years can be granted of an entailed estate in Scotland, the consequences to the country would be infinitely worse than any which can result from the strictness of any Scotch entail. When, however, Judges in a Court of Justice take upon themselves to act upon what they conceive political evils, or political benefits; and when they hold that entails are odious, from political considerations, which is the only ground I know of upon which it can be contended that entails are odious; they should consider, whether, in endeavouring to defeat entails in this manner, they are not producing a greater political evil than that which they are attempting to avoid. But I do not understand what right a Court of Justice has to entertain an opinion of a positive law, upon any ground of political expediency. I have always been at a loss to conceive upon what ground a Court of Justice was entitled so to act. The Legislature is to decide upon political expediency; and if it has made a law which is not politically expedient, the proper way of disposing of that law is by an act of the Legislature, and not by the decision of a Court of Justice. It is true, my Lords, that in this part of the country, in very ancient times, contrivances have been resorted to to avoid the effect of a statute, also a very ancient statute, by which entails were counte[nanced]—I mean the statute de donis. This has been done gradually, and by various contrivances, and with some assistance too from the Legislature. The prejudices of those who conceived themselves interested to preserve entails, not admitting of a complete repeal of the statute de donis, it has been, in effect, partially repealed by such contrivances, and these contrivances have been in some degree countenanced by the Legislature. The effect of these contrivances has now been so long considered as established law, that it cannot now be questioned. We might almost as well question the constitution of the Legislature itself. Lately, it has been my duty particularly to consider that subject also, and I fear, your Lordships will be unable to find by what law a considerable part of the constitution of the Legislature of this country has been formed. It has been the work of time, and has been sanctioned by length of time; and length of time has given sanctity to the practice of barring entails in England.

The learned Judges of the Court of Session in Scotland seem to have supposed that those who attend the decision of appeals in this House, are disposed to judge of entails in Scotland according to the law affecting estates-tail in England; and that they consider estates-tail in Scotland as similar to estates-tail in England. On the contrary, it seems to me impossible to assimilate the laws of the two countries on this subject. In contemplation of the law of England, as it now stands, a tenant in tail has a quasi perpetual inheritance; he has powers, which certainly do not belong to a tenant of a tailzied estate in Scotland—I mean a [499] tailzied property, protected with all the clauses necessary for that purpose. The tenant in tail in England, if adult, is capable of rendering himself complete master of the land, and making himself tenant in fee-simple, unless it is an estate held under grants of the Crown of a particular description, where the reversion is in the Crown, and estates-tail, generally, where the reversion is in the Crown. In the latter case, a tenant in tail may bar all but the Crown, though he cannot bar the right of the Crown. A tenant in tail in England, who is an adult, being capable of barring the entail, is not bound to keep down the interest of a mortgage affecting the estate out of the rents of the estate; but with respect to an infant tenant in tail, the rule is otherwise, for an obvious reason, that in consequence of his infancy, he is not capable of making an absolute disposition of the estate, and therefore it is considered that those who receive the rents for him, are bound to keep down the interest during his infancy. A tenant in tail in England grants a lease, and does not bar the entail. The lease is not void, but it is voidable. If he grants a lease with warranty, and there are assets descending to the heir of entail, the lease is good; because the warranty will bind the heir of entail, if there are assets to answer that warranty; - if he grants a lease with a covenant binding the heir of entail, and there are assets descending to the heir to answer that covenant, the heir of entail is so far bound, as to be compellable to make recompence for the breach of covenant out of those assets. Therefore it is, as I conceive, that a lease by a tenant in tail in England [500] is not absolutely void, but voidable at the election of the heir, and that it will probably be avoided or not by the heir, according to circumstances. The difference, therefore, between the condition of a tenant in tail in England and an heir of entail in Scotland, is such, that I do not apprehend that any person who has been conversant with the law of England is likely to fall into any of that confusion, as to the nature of estates-tail in England, and the nature of tailzies in Scotland, which the learned Judges of the Court of Session in Scotland seem to have supposed.

It is a very difficult task, unquestionably, for persons who are not familiar with the administration of the law of any country, to apply their minds so fully and effectually to the subject, as those who are familiar with it. No person can feel that more strongly than myself. Having been for twelve months only in the situation of Speaker of the other House of Parliament, and therefore absent from Courts of Justice, I certainly did not find myself, when I returned again to a judicial situation, so capable of applying my mind to the subject as I should have been, if there had been no interval between my following the profession at the Bar, and my holding the situation of Chancellor of Ireland. I have heard that one of the most able men who ever sat in the Court of Chancery in this country, (Lord Cowper,) having ceased for four years to be Chancellor, in consequence of a change in the Administration, when he afterwards came back to the office of Chancellor, often declared that he did not feel himself so ready in the discharge of his duty in that office as he had been before. Whenever, there-[501]-fore, I judge of a case of Scotch law, (being bound, nevertheless, by the situation in which I stand, to form a judgment upon it as well as I can, and as every one of your Lordships is bound), I always have a jealousy of myself upon the subject, and always endeavour most particularly to divest myself of any thing that can be called English prejudice. I hold that to be a most imperious duty, because I must admit that it is likely such prejudices should exist in my mind. But if I am to discharge my duty as a Lord of Parliament, in giving my opinion upon cases of appeal which come before this House, as long as the Court of Appeal shall remain in this House, (and most of your Lordships must be in some degree at least in the same situation), I must endeavour to make up my mind upon the subject in question as well as I can, and to give the best judgment I can form upon it.

In judging of any question of law, it has always appeared to me highly important to discover, in the first place, what are the principles upon which persons who have had to decide upon the same question of law have proceeded; because I do not apprehend that a Court of Judicature is to decide capriciously, or is to decide because it will have it so, or as has been said with respect to the Court of Chancery, facetiously, by a very learned person, Mr. Selden, that a judgment in the Court of Chancery was like taking measure of the Chancellor's foot, one Chancellor having a long foot, and another a short one. The object of every person in a judicial situation, and particularly of a person in the office of the noble Lord on the Woolsack, should be, and I conceive always has been, to establish certain principles, [502] by which, not only he shall guide his own decisions, but by which others may decide similar cases, and by which those who have to give advice on similar cases may be able to give proper advice. For if principles of decision are not established, it is impossible to say what will be the decision upon any case, or what advice ought to be given by those who are consulted on the subject. I have therefore been most anxious to discover what are the principles of decision which the Courts in Scotland have adopted in deciding upon the powers of tenants of tailzied estates in Scotland under strict entails. With respect particularly to their power of granting leases, (for that is the subject which is immediately under your Lordships consideration), I find, that it has been generally considered that a lease of a long duration is a species of alienation; and your Lordships have accordingly decided, in the Wakefield case, that a lease of ninety-seven years was a species of alienation, not permitted to a person who held an estate under strict entail; and that a prohibition of alienating prohibited such leases. It immediately occurred to me, to endeavour to discover upon what principle this was so determined. The principle, and the only principle which I have been able to discover, is this,—that the prohibition to alienate extends, generally, to any lease, the lease being, in itself, an alienation pro tanto, during the continuance of that lease, except so far as a rent is reserved upon that lease, payable during its continuance. I then proceeded to consider upon what ground any lease by a person holding under a strict entail, could be good against the successors in that [503] entail; and according to what has fallen, from time to time, from Judges in Scotland, and what is to be found in text-writers on the subject, the rule is this,—that a lease of a proper duration, and under certain circumstances, is to be considered as a fair administration of the estate, which it is necessary to allow to a person holding a tailzied estate, for the purpose of giving to him the fair benefit of the estate during his right to the enjoyment of it; because if he were utterly incapable of letting any lease whatsoever, the consequence would be, that he must either hold the property, however large it might be, entirely in his own possession, (a thing, in many cases, almost impossible), or he must dispose of the possession of it to persons whose interest would terminate with his life. That inconvenience, therefore, seems to have been considered as a sufficient ground for allowing some, but it may be difficult to say what power of disposition by leasing, to a tenant of a tailzied estate in Scotland. The language of all the persons who have spoken, and of all the persons who have written upon the subject, has been, that they considered the granting of leases by a person under the restriction of a tailzie, as a due administration of the estate, and a species of administration which was necessary for the enjoyment of the estate. It seems to me, that a power thus yielded to necessity, and yielded only to necessity, ought to be bounded by the necessity which compels it to be yielded:—that is, by that which, generally speaking, is compatible with the future as well as with the present enjoyment of the estate. The future possession of the estate might be injured, [504] if the land were let without the means of insuring the proper management of it, in consequence of the lessee not having a certain term and interest, and particularly in a country in the state in which the greatest part of Scotland was a hundred years ago. Where a country was capable of great improvement, it would have been highly injurious to have prevented persons, holding estates under strict entail, from granting any leases whatever, that should endure beyond their own interest in those estates. The limitation which I have stated seems to me to be one which necessarily arises from the principle on which, as I conceive, an indulgence in making leases to bind the successor has been allowed to tenants in tail; and that the grant of a lease, for what may be deemed a long term, (whatever may be the length of term that may be allowed), is not permitted to a person holding an estate strictly entailed, being prohibited by the prohibition of alienation: the alienation by lease being prohibited where the extent of the term granted is beyond that which was necessary for the proper administration of the estate. When I am asked, what is to be the limitation of a lease under such circumstances, I confess there is a great difficulty in drawing any line precisely; but if there is to be no limitation, it is perfectly clear that the property may be, in effect, alienated; and when it has been decided that a long lease may be an alienation, as in the Wakefield case, it appears to me perfectly clear, that you must consider the question upon every lease to be, whether that which has been done is alienation or administration, according to circumstances.

[505] In judging, therefore, of the Neidpath case, the first question to be considered is the length of duration of the lease of Harestanes, which is a fifty-seven years lease, not qualified by any circumstances; not for instance, a building lease. Was it, or was it not necessary to the administration of the estate, that a fifty-seven years lease should be granted? What line is to be drawn between fifty-seven years and ninety-seven years? A ninety-seven years lease your Lordships have determined to be not sustainable, on account of the length of time; a fifty-seven years lease is a lease that may, probably, endure much beyond the life of the granter. It may be made by a person at a very advanced period of life: his immediate successor, (his son perhaps) may also be at an advanced period of life; and a fifty-seven years lease in such case likely to endure during the whole time of the successor's holding. If it should so endure, what is the consequence? The administration of the estate during the time of the succeeding tenant in tail, is not in the hands of that tenant in tail; it has been preoccupied by the person who preceded him in the enjoyment of the estate. The consequence necessarily is, that the person who so succeeds under the tailzie, has not the same power of administration as the person who preceded him had: and, generally speaking, has no chance of having the same power, considering the ordinary term of human life. We are told, that threescore years and ten is the ordinary term of human life; and if threescore years and ten be the ordinary term, consider how large a portion of that ordinary term a lease of fifty-seven years will occupy: and what is the probable state of a succeeding heir of [506] entail coming to the possession of the estate under a lease of fifty-seven years, granted in the latter years of his predecessor. That consideration also called to my attention the leases with covenants to renew; for, if a man may grant leases for fifty-seven years, and may covenant to renew those leases for fifty-seven years, yearly, as long as he lives, what is likely to be the situation of the succeeding heir of tailzie, if that covenant should be acted upon? Has the successor, generally speaking, any chance whatever of having the administration of the estate in any degree? It appears to me, that, considering the case upon no other ground but the length of time, the lease of Harestanes is one that cannot be supported upon any principle upon which I have heard it asserted, that an heir of tailzie, who is prohibited from alienating, and who has not a power to grant leases expressly given to him, can grant a lease; and upon that ground alone, I should be of opinion that that lease is capable of impeachment. But there is upon that case another consideration, which is, the question of grassum. I cannot understand what the Lords of Session in Scotland conceive grassum to be. In my mind, grassum, as taken on the leases in question, is nothing more nor less than anticipation of rent—it is taking rent beforehand. A noble Lord, whom I see in his place, will recollect the common expression in Ireland, of fining down the rent. What is a grassum but fining down the rent? Is there any distinction? I can find none. Then, if grassum is fining down the rent, what is grassum but rent? rent paid beforehand to the grantor of the lease, instead of being paid annually to whoever should be [507] owner of the estate. But the objection which I state does not depend upon this reasoning alone: the Courts in Scotland have determined that grassum is rent; they have determined that it is rent with respect to teinds, and with respect to superiors; and in all cases, except in the case of tailzied estates, grassum is admitted to be rent. Such have been the decisions of the Courts in Scotland. Now, what can be the distinction between the same thing with respect to an heir of tailzie, and with respect to other persons? When an heir of tailzie in possession receives a sum of money on granting a lease, for what does he receive it? He receives it, because the rent reserved upon the lease which he grants, is so much less than the value of the land. Grassum would not be given to him, unless the land was let by the lease at an under rate. It is therefore neither more nor less than rent received by anticipation, and received by one heir, instead of being received by a succession of heirs. In the Westshiells case, a very extraordinary distinction was attempted to be made. The Court of Session held, that though what was granted by the name of grassum was not rent, yet what was given, not by the name of grassum, but in the shape of bonds for the payment of money at future periods, was rent. It appears to me that both were the same thing. What difference is there betwixt my receiving, upon my granting a lease, £100, or my receiving £100 in ten years, at the rate of £10 a year, with interest? Therefore, in the Westshiells case it appears to me, that the bonds which it was determined should go to the succeeding heir of entail as rent, were just the same thing as the grassum taken in the [508] same lease. I cannot distinguish between the two. In that case no question was made with respect to the grassum; and I believe there were reasons why the person who claimed the benefit of the bonds did not think fit, either to resort to his father's assets, for the purpose of demanding a proportion of the grassum, or to attempt to set aside the leases which had been granted, provided he received the bonds remaining due in lieu of rent. The effect of grassum is also to be considered in another point of view, which more particularly relates to the case of the Queensberry estate than to that of the Neidpath estate; and yet, to a certain degree, it respects the Neidpath estate also, if the opinion that the rent to be reserved upon a lease to be granted by a person in possession of a tailzied estate in Scotland must be the last reserved rent, is well founded. Upon what principle that opinion is founded, I am utterly unable to discover; for, if nothing is said in the deed of entail upon the subject of rent, I cannot see why the person who is in possession of an entailed estate cannot grant a lease for half the last rent, as well as for the last rent. I can see no just ground of distinction: I see nothing upon which I can found a principle of decision, to make a distinction between these two cases; and therefore I so far agree with those Lords of Session who held that the tenant of an entailed estate may let down the rent. They must so hold, if they mean to be consistent, where there is no express prohibition to the contrary; for if the tenant of a tailzied estate has power to grant a lease for any term, where there are no express words in the deed of entail to prohibit it, if there is nothing in the deed [509] of entail to prohibit granting for less than the old rent, there is nothing to limit the terms on which the lease may be granted; and consequently to be consistent, those who hold that, where there is no express prohibition, a lease may be granted for any term, must also hold that the rent may be let down, and that the lease may be granted at any rent. Most of the Lords of Session, however, are of opinion, that the old rent must be reserved; and a very distinguished person, whose sentiments upon that subject have been read by the noble and learned Lord, seems to have conceived that there can be no question but that the old rent must be reserved. But upon what principle? I can see none. If a person who is in possession of an entailed estate can defeat his successor, by granting a lease upon a grassum, I can see no ground for holding that the rent reserved must be the old rent, or that it may not be any rent however small. But, if the lease is granted upon a grassum, and the old rent is nominally reserved, is the rent so reserved in effect really and truly the old rent? Does it produce the same thing? Certainly not. Your Lordships know, from what has been stated in the case of the Queensberry estate, the effect of the grassums taken, and the consequent burdens brought upon the estate, if with respect to others, grassum is to be considered as rent; but, between the Duke of Buccleuch and the late Duke of Queensberry, is it not to be considered as rent, and that, consequently, the net rent now to be received is not the same net rent which was received previous to the leases in question.

Looking at the cases which have been decided, it [510] strikes me, that the case of Leslie v. Orme, which came before this House during the time Lord Thurlow held the office of Chancellor, has established certain principles upon which I should wish to decide the present case. The case of Leslie v. Orme was this: An entail had been created in the year 1692, by a person of the name of Patrick Leslie, by which he disposed of lands in entail, (with the usual words prohibiting alienation,) to his second son George Leslie. The words of prohibition contained in the deed of entail were, "that it should not be lawful to the said George Leslie, and the said heirs of tailzie, to sell, annaillzie, or dispone the lands and others, or any part thereof, provided to them, heritably or irredeemably, or under reversion, nor to grant infeftments of annual rent, or yearly feu-duties thereof." There followed in the deed of entail these words: "Nor to let tacks in diminution of the true worth and rental they paid before the said tack." This deed of entail therefore generally prohibited alienation, and expressly prohibited, not the setting tacks for any duration of time, but the setting tacks "in diminution of the true worth and rental they paid before the said tacks." A subsequent deed was executed according to the power vested in the party for that purpose, taking notice of the former deed of the 8th November 1692, and reciting, that by that deed it was prohibited, conditioned, and declared, "that it should be nowise leisome and lawful, nor in the power of the heirs of tailzie therein named, to set tacks of the lands therein specified, in diminution of the true worth and rental they paid before the said tacks;" and that [511] for the reason stated, he was disposed to change this clause, and that he had power to do so; and therefore he did, with consent and advice of his son George Leslie, "dispense with, and annul the clause above specified, as freely in all respects as if the same had never been conceived or insert in the bond of tailzie above deduced:" the effect of which was, to strike out of the former deed of entail the words prohibiting leases: But these words were added: "So that, in all time hereafter, it shall be leisome and lawful to any of my said heirs of tailzie, to grant tacks and assedations on any part of the lands contained in the said tailzie, and that under the present rental, if they shall think fit and expedient, without incurring any hazard or danger in and through the foresaid irritant clause, which is hereby abrogate and taken away." Now, my Lords, taking these two instruments together, it seems to me that there is a general prohibition of alienation; and that there is an express power of granting leases, and of granting those leases without limitation of term, and at any rent, under the present rental. Unless the prohibition of alienation extended to prohibit long leases, there was in these instruments nothing that prohibited long leases; but it is perfectly clear, that not only the granter of the entail, but the Court of Session, did conceive that there was something prohibiting long leases; for, when they came to decide upon the leases granted, they declared themselves to be deciding upon the supposition that the person in possession under the deed of tailzie acted in the execution of the power of leasing so granted; and they expressed [512] this to be their construction of the settlement, in the words of their decision.

The first person who came into possession of the estate under this entail, was a person of the name of Peter Grant, who took the name of Leslie; and he having had a litigation with respect to his title, was involved in considerable expense; and a person of the name of Orme, who had been employed by him to direct that business, had considerable demands upon him for money on that account. Part of the property consisted of a house called Fetternear, which had been a mansion-house, but at that time was in great decay, and not capable of being inhabited. Mr. Orme obtained a lease, dated the 29th March 1769, of that part of the estate for the term of four nineteen years, at the rent which had been before reserved upon a former lease. The consideration for this lease was part of the debt due to Orme; and the remainder of that debt was to be satisfied by means of another instrument, enabling Orme to withhold a part of the rent reserved by the lease till the whole of that debt should be discharged. Orme also obtained other instruments after mentioned from Mr. Leslie Grant. At length, the property comprised in the entail came into the hands of the person who disputed the lease, and sought to reduce all the instruments obtained by Orme from Leslie Grant, as contrary to the powers which were vested in Leslie Grant by the deed of entail; and he likewise endeavoured to reduce them, upon the ground of frauds practised upon Leslie Grant by Orme. The question of fraud was a distinct question, and it was determined that it was not compe-[513]-tent to the person who then sought to investigate the transactions, to impeach them on this ground; and the question which finally came before the Court was upon the effect of the instruments executed by Mr. Leslie Grant. The Lord Ordinary, in his interlocutor, found, with respect to the tack dated 29th March 1769, whereby Leslie Grant, in consideration of the sum of £992 15s. 6½d. sterling of premium or entry-money, discounted and allowed to him out of a larger sum due by him to Orme, conform to accounts settled between them, set in lease the lands and baronies of Balquhain and Fetternear to Orme, for the space of four nineteen years, from and after the term of Whitsunday 1769, for a rent or tack-duty of £9062 8s. 3d. Scots: That as by the two deeds of entail, the heirs of entail were put under no restriction as to the number of years for which leases might be granted, they were at liberty to grant leases for any term of years they thought proper, and therefore sustained the defence, and assolizied the defender from the reduction of his tack, in so far as challenged on account of its being granted for such an unusual term of years, "seventy-six years;" and in so far as this tack was challenged on account of its being granted for a rent or tack-duty below what the lands and estate were worth, and did or might have paid. The Lord Ordinary found, that though, by the tailzie of said estate, in 1692, the heirs of entail were restrained from setting tacks in diminution of the true worth and rental they paid before the said tacks, as the entailor by another deed in 1707 did dispense with and annul that clause, sicklike and as freely as if the [514] same had never been conceived nor insert in the bond of tailzie; declaring the same to be void and null in all time coming, so that in all time thereafter it should be leisome and lawful to any of the said heirs of tailzie to grant tacks of any of the lands, and that under the present rental, if they should think fit and expedient, without incurring any hazard or danger in and through the aforesaid irritant clause, which was thereby abrogate and taken away. The Lord Ordinary then "found that the tack in 1769 was not liable to challenge by the pursuer as granted for an under rent or tack-duty; and separatim found, that the said tack-duty of £9062 8s. 3d., with the discount given of £992 15s. 6½d. sterling, in name of premium or grassum, was superior to any rent these lands did then pay or had formerly paid, and therefore upon that ground also sustained the defence, and assolizied the defender from the reduction of that tack." The latter part of this finding shows, that at the time of that decision, there was not so perfectly clear an opinion of what was the construction of the words "the true worth or rental," contained in the first deed of entail, as is now alleged; and the pursuer had attempted to impeach the lease, as granted for a rent or tack-duty below what the estate and lands were worth, and did or might have paid. The third deed under challenge, was an obligation and assignation of even date with the tack thus granted by Leslie Grant to Orme, whereby, for the causes therein expressed, Leslie Grant assigned to Orme, his heirs, etc. for his own behoof and that of the other creditors of Leslie Grant, therein mentioned, the [515] sum of £4470 1s. 9d. Scots, being the balance of the above tack-duty over and above £3600 reserved to Leslie Grant; this instrument containing a discharge of the said £4470 1s. 9d. of the said tack-duty, until such time as the debts above mentioned should be satisfied; and with this proviso, that in case any of the heirs of tailzie should refuse to ratify these his deeds, the aforesaid tack-duty of £9062 8s. 3d. Scots should be restricted to £3600 until the aforesaid debts should be paid. Upon this the Lord Ordinary found, that the assignment and restriction of the tack-duty, for the purposes therein mentioned, viz. for payment of the debts contracted by Leslie Grant, who held the estate under the foresaid entail prohibiting the contracting of debts, the restriction of the tack-duty, and the assignment of the surplus of the tack-duties to Orme in payment and satisfaction of the debts due to him and the other creditors mentioned in the deed, could not be effectual beyond the life of Leslie Grant, and such of the other heirs of entail as should ratify and confirm the same; and as it was accordingly ratified and confirmed by the pursuer's father, the Lord Ordinary sustained the defence, and assoilzied the defender from the reduction of the said deed, so far as respected the restriction of the tack-duty and assignment of the surplus over and above the £3600 during the lifetime of Leslie Grant and of the pursuer's father; but reduced the same, so far as regarded the restriction and assignment of the tack-duty from and after the death of the pursuer's father, and reduced the same accordingly. The reducing the rent for the purpose of paying [516] debts was not within the power of leasing which had been granted, and was a mode of charging the estate with those debts, which was expressly restrained by the deed of entail; and yet Leslie Grant might have done the very same thing in another way, if he might have granted a lease at a less rent, instead of granting it for the larger rent, and thus might have given the benefit of the depression of the rent, to the extent in which a benefit was intended to be given by this deed, which was found not to be according to the powers which he had. I mention this, particularly with this view, that it is perfectly clear that the Court of Session, at that time, did not consider that what a man might have done in one way, he therefore could do in another. The interlocutor farther noticed, that the tack of the 29th of March 1769, reserved to Leslie Grant, his heirs and assigns, a faculty or privilege to resume the possession of the mansion-house, offices, and gardens, and mains of Fetternear, upon twelve months premonition, upon an abatement from the tack-duty of £430 4s. 10d. Scots, but that that reservation had by deed in August 1769 been discharged and annulled, so far as respected assigns, and was, by deed of the 7th September 1773, again restricted and limited to Leslie Grant himself, and the heirs male of his body. Upon this the Lord Ordinary found, that as the said Leslie Grant was under no restraint or limitation from granting tacks of all or any parts of the said estate, and for such rent or tack-duty as he thought proper, there laid no challenge at the pursuer's instance, either of the tacks themselves, as comprehending what was denominated the mansion-[517]-house, offices, etc. of Fetternear, or restriction of the aforesaid reserved faculty to the exclusion of the heirs and assignees of Leslie Grant, other than the heirs male of his body, and therefore assoilzied the defender from the reduction of the several restrictions of the said faculty. The Lord Ordinary then, after noticing that the pursuer insisted that the unlimited power of granting tacks, for any number of years, without limitation, ought not to comprehend the mansion-house, offices, etc. of Fetternear, as being the principal mansion-house of the family, found that there was no evidence that it was the mansion-house of the family, or had been occupied and possessed as such, for many years before, but was, in a great measure, ruinous and waste, and as the tailzie itself made no such exception, repelled that reason of reduction. The last deed under challenge, was a tack or contract 11th September 1773, whereby Leslie

Grant did, for the causes and considerations therein mentioned, not only ratify the aforesaid tacks, but prorogated the same for the further term of nineteen years, upon receiving payment of a premium or grassum of £25 sterling, and the Lord Ordinary sustained the defence against the reduction of this tack, and assailed the defender. The case afterwards came before the Lords of Session, and the Court so far differed from the Lord Ordinary, that they sustained the reasons of reduction of the deed of restriction granted by Peter Leslie Grant to Orme, dated the 5th day of August 1769, and of the deed of restriction and tack granted by Peter Leslie Grant to Orme, dated 7th of September 1773, and also of the tack granted by the said Peter Leslie [518] Grant to Orme, dated the 11th of September 1773; and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly. The Lords of Session, therefore, agreed with the Lord Ordinary with respect to the power of granting leases at any rent, and without any restriction as to the term, under the words contained in the second deed of entail, but held that, notwithstanding the terms of that power, and although that power was granted in general words, extending to all the estate, without any exception of the mansion-house, the mansion-house and lands could not properly be considered within the terms of that power, because they were the mansion-house and residence of the family, the Lords finding that Fetternear was a mansion-house, against the finding of the Lord Ordinary. They also considered the subsequent lease, by which an additional term of years was added to the first term of four nineteen years, as not within the power; and the decision of the Court of Session was affirmed, on appeal, by this House.

I conceive, therefore, that in this case of Leslie v. Orme, the Court of Session, and this House affirming what was done by the Court of Session, have established by their decision, as far as that decision has any authority, that the lease in question, in the case of Leslie v. Orme, was to be sustained under the express power given by the deeds of entail; and that, therefore, it was to be in all respects in conformity with that power; that it was the express power under that settlement which enabled Leslie Grant to grant a lease of that long endurance, and at the rent reserved, and to take the grassum which he did take. I cannot conceive how there could [519] otherwise be a question with respect to the lease which was sustained. If Leslie Grant could have made that lease, though every thing had been thrown out of the entail which expressly gave that power, would first the Lord Ordinary, and then the Court of Session, have expressly sustained the lease as good by force of the power, the Court of Session, in construing that power, holding by implication, contrary to the express words, that the mansion-house, and the lands adjoining it, were not within that power. Under these circumstances, therefore, I conceive that the case of Leslie v. Orme tends to show that that which is now said to have been the old law of Scotland, was not considered as the law at that time. It seems also clear, that the power which an heir of tailzie has to grant leases, so far as he has that power, is subject to the exception with respect to the mansion-house, and the lands which belong to it; an exception which indeed is pretty generally admitted. That exception was understood both by the Lord Ordinary and the Court of Session; for though the Lord Ordinary did not determine, as the Court afterwards did, with respect to the house and land, it appears that he considered the house as not the mansion-house, but waste, though he also relied on the general words in the power, including all the estate without exception. The Court, on the contrary, considered that Fetternear was properly the mansion-house of the estate, and therefore not properly comprised within the leasing power, notwithstanding the words of that power, which extended to the whole property. The result appears to be, that it was then understood that an heir of tailzie cannot grant a lease of the entailed [520] mansion-house and lands occupied with it, but that they shall be reserved for the use of the next heir of tailzie, when he comes to the enjoyment of the estate. Upon what principle can that have been determined? It can only have been determined upon this principle, that the heir of tailzie who is in possession has generally no right to grant a lease but for the purposes of his own enjoyment of the property; and therefore he has no right to grant the mansion-house, because that is not necessary for his enjoyment of the property, according to the view of the creator of the entail, who is supposed to have intended that the person in possession, as heir of tailzie, should have the mansion-house, and the lands belonging to it, for his own occupation. This appears to me to show decisively what is the principle upon which any lease by the heir of entail must stand, unless granted under an express power; for I cannot imagine on what ground the mansion-house and the lands adjoining it are excepted from the general power of leasing attributed to the tenant in possession of an entailed estate, without any express words for the purpose, unless the power of leasing is to be considered as arising from the necessity of leasing for the purpose of enjoyment, and therefore not extending beyond that necessity. For what reason was it determined in Leslie v. Orme, that the lease for four nineteen years was not a lease struck at by the prohibition of alienation? because the power of leasing given to the tenant in tail, gave him a right to grant a lease at any rent he pleased; and if the lease was good at any rent he pleased, the reason for avoiding the lease, on the ground of alienation, did not apply.

With respect to the case of the Queensberry estate, [521] in which the Duke of Buccleuch is the person complaining to your Lordships, the word "alien" is not contained in the deed of entail, but the prohibition uses only the word "dispone;" and the question is, Whether the word "dispone" is equally effectual for the purpose as the word "alien?" I will not trouble your Lordships by going through all that is to be found in Acts of Parliament, and in text-writers, upon the effect of the word "dispone." It appears to me, that it is fully equivalent to the word "alien," and that, in this very settlement of the Queensberry estate, it is unquestionably used, as already stated by the noble and learned Lord, as equivalent to the word "alien." Upon that subject I am relieved from difficulty by the opinions of the Lords of Session, because a great majority are of opinion, that the word "dispone" has in this deed of entail the same effect.

The next consideration respects the alternative leases;—the leases which are to endure for so many years, if such be the power, and so on, till reduced to nineteen years. It appears to me, that such a letting of an estate cannot be deemed a proper administration: for how is the person who succeeds to the estate tail to ascertain for what term the lease is to endure? By the terms of the lease, the endurance is to be, first, decided by the Court of Session, and, lastly, by this House. In the mean time, what is to become of the rent? How is the property to be managed? How is the rent to be paid? Upon a lease which is to bind the succeeding heir of entail, that succeeding heir of entail ought to know immediately to what extent he is bound: [522] he ought to have the power to go immediately to the person who is the tenant, and say,—“Give me the rent reserved by that lease.” But the succeeding heir of entail under these leases must wait until the decision by the Court of Session, or by this House, shall have ascertained their validity and extent, or he must receive under some convention between the parties, or under a protest, to avoid affirming the leases; and until such decision, he cannot know to what extent he is bound by the leases. Is that the state in which the succeeding heir of entail is to be placed? And can that be deemed a legal disposition of the estate, which has such an effect? It appears to me, therefore, that these alternative leases cannot be good, because the term is not certain. What is a lease for a term? A lease must have a certain ish, according to the law of Scotland. What is the certain ish of these alternative leases? Will any of your Lordships be able to tell me, until this House has decided the case?—Can any of your Lordships say what is the ish? Is it a good lease according to the law of Scotland, independent of any other consideration, not having a certain ish?

There is another question which arises upon the covenants to renew, from time to time, by annually granting leases for nineteen years. These covenants to renew have no operation beyond this,—they obliged the person who entered into these covenants, to renew, at the rent agreed upon between the parties, from time to time, during his life, however long the duration of that life might be. Supposing a lease upon a grassum with a covenant of that description by a person of two or three and twenty, who [523] might live fifty or sixty years afterwards. The grassum to be paid upon such a lease ought to be calculated according to the value of the life of that person, as the lease would be, in effect, a lease for nineteen years, and for as many additional years as the life of that person would probably endure, which, upon the contingencies of lives, is an operation of calculation.

The question of grassum is in some respects a distinct question, though it operates both with respect to the alternative leases and the covenant to renew.

The question with respect to grassum applying to the Neidpath estate, is a question not depending upon any particular words in the deed of tailzie, but simply upon the right which a tenant in tail has to make leases of the estate tailzied; for although there is a particular power contained in that entail, that power does not apply to any of the leases which have been granted; and consequently the question in the Neidpath case is, What is the effect of the grassum upon a lease granted by the tenant of an entailed estate, with respect to whom there is no particular prohibition of granting the lease in question, but where the lease in question can only be effected by the prohibition of alienation. What is the effect of grassum? As a lease is a disposition of the property for a certain period, the effect of taking a grassum is, to give to the person who grants the lease a rent for the estate different from the rent which the person who succeeds him in the estate will receive during the continuance of that lease. What is "rental?" What is "rent?" What is "grassum?" Grassum is taking, beforehand, that which otherwise would be taken half yearly, or annually, according to the terms [524] of a lease: It appears to me that "grassum," "rental," "rent," or whatever word may be used, are, in reality, one and the same thing.

The disposition which is contained in such a lease made by a tenant of tailzie, restrained only by words prohibiting alienation, is a disposition of property during the period for which that lease is granted, in which there is a reservation of annual rent, for the benefit of the person who succeeds him; but that reservation does not convey the same benefit as that which he stipulated for himself. If a lease were granted for nineteen years, or any other term, reserving, for ten years, or so long as the granter should live, £100 a year; for the remainder of the term, £10 a year, I have not heard it asserted that that would be a good lease against a succeeding heir of entail. If a lease is granted at £10 a year for the whole term, and a grassum is taken equivalent to £90 a year during the first ten years, what is the difference? This would be, what was called in the Westshiells case, a contrivance, which, it was said, if dexterously executed, was to be sustained, but if not dexterously executed, was not to be sustained. If therefore the words prohibiting alienation affect any lease granted by the person in possession of the tailzied estate, they must affect a lease which does not reserve to the person who may succeed, the same benefit which the person who granted the lease derived from it, according to the term of his enjoyment of the estate; because, whatever benefit was so derived from the lease by the person granting it, would be exactly the same thing as the benefit derived from reserving a large rent for the life of the [525] granter, and reducing it, at the period of his death, for the remainder of the term: which no person has contended would be a good lease.

With respect to the Queensberry estate, the words of the entail as to the power of leasing are these: "That the said Lord Charles Douglas, nor the other heirs of tailzie above specified, shall not set tacks nor rentals of the said lands for any longer space than the setter's life, or for nineteen years, and that without diminution of the rental, at the least, at the just avail for the time." It has been said, that this gives a power to let leases at the old rent. Under these words, it is not contended that leases might be let under the old rent, or that there are no words prohibiting the letting under the old rent: it is admitted that the letting must be without diminution of the old rent. The first question to be asked upon that is, What is the meaning of the word "rent?" It is said that it means, the rent reserved upon the prior lease of the same lands. I do not know upon what ground that stands; for it might just as well be asserted, that it meant the rental at the time the deed of entail was executed; and this must be general; so that if at the time of the execution of that deed, and long after, the lands had been in the hands of the creator of the entail, and the several tenants of tailzie in possession, and the value had been increased, so as to be quadrupled, or increased in any greater proportion, you must resort to the old lease prior to the entail. The words are "without diminution of rental,—at the least, at the just avail for the time." It is said that the meaning of the words is this, "without diminution of [526] rental," meaning by "rental," the rent last reserved before the granting of the lease in question; but that, if it should so happen that that rent could not be obtained, then that the lease might be made at such rent as could be obtained. This appears to me to be a very arbitrary interpretation of the words. The fair construction of the words, taking the whole together, and using the latter words as explanatory of the former, appear to me to be this,—that the creator of the entail shall be taken to have said, “I mean by the words ‘without diminution of the rental,’ that you shall let, at least, for the fair avail at the time; that is, I do not desire you to get the utmost you can possibly obtain for the estate, but that you shall get the just avail for the time.” This strikes me as the fair interpretation of the words, taking the whole together.

But it is said, that in this entail there is another clause, which interprets the meaning of this,—a direction that when any lady of the family should succeed to the estate, she should marry a person of the name of “Douglas,” or at least a person who would take the name of Douglas. But what is the meaning of these words? That he wished the lady to marry a person of the name of “Douglas?” That was, in his mind, the preferable measure; but that, if she should not marry a person of the name of Douglas, she should marry a person who should take that name. Does not that, if it operates at all, rather show the meaning in which the words respecting leases are used as I have interpreted them? That the entailor did not mean, by the words “the just avail at the time,” a worse thing than that [527] which he had proposed to require under the former words?—If, therefore, the clause respecting marriage is to be used as interpreting the other clause respecting leases, it appears to me to have directly the contrary effect to that which has been contended for. It shows, that by “rental,” he meant the best rent, but that he then added,—“I do not desire you to reserve the best rent that can possibly be obtained, but take the just avail at the time; and it shall be sufficient.” If a construction is to be put upon the words “at the least,” in the leasing clause, by a reference to the same words used in the other clause, it seems to me that, instead of having the effect which is contended for, they have directly the contrary effect; that by the words “at the least, at the just avail for the time,” the entailor meant something less, and not something greater than he intended to express by the words “without diminution of the rental.” But taking the leasing clause by itself, when the entailor says, that the tenant of tailzie shall not set tacks nor rentals of the lands for any longer space than the setter’s lifetime, or for nineteen years, “and that without diminution of the rental,” adding, “at the least, at the just avail for the time;” can it be said, in an honest interpretation of the deed, that he meant that less than the just avail at the time should be taken? And do not those words, “at the least, at the just avail for the time,” interpret what he meant by the word “rental?” Do not they show, that by “rental,” he meant the best rent that could be obtained? and that he then meant to qualify the expression he had used, by adding, “but I do not insist upon your [528] getting the extremity of the rent that might be obtained; take the just avail at the time, and I shall be satisfied.” That seems to be a much more fair and reasonable interpretation of the clause, than that attempted on the part of the representatives of the late Duke of Queensberry. But construe this clause even in the way in which the representatives of the late Duke of Queensberry contend it ought to be construed;—is there no diminution of the rental by means of the leases in question? is it not clear the payment of grassum is in effect a diminution of rental, taking the rental to mean the former rent? What is the meaning of “rental?” Is it nominal or real rent? Is it that which a man is to receive for his own benefit, or that which is nominally held out to him as rent, but a part of which only can be beneficial to him? The nominal rent may be £10; but if the consequence of the grassum taken by the grantor of the lease is, that the deduction from that rent, instead of £2 becomes £5 is there not, by the operation of the grassum, a diminution of the former rental, in any reasonable sense of the word? Is there not a diminution of the rental, in the view that this entailor seems to have had upon the subject? Why did he insert this clause? Did he not insert it, that there might be fair dealing between the tenant in tail in possession, and the succeeding heir; that both might have equal benefit from the lease? And is this fair dealing? Have both an equal benefit? It seems to me that, considering the effect of grassum, with respect to the clear sum to be received upon the rent reserved, it is impossible to say that a lease so granted, is not a lease granted with diminution of [529] the rental. See the effect the grassum has upon the rent before reserved. As to all the world except the heir of entail, the grassum is considered as part of the rent; and all the charges upon the estate are assessed accordingly. It is admitted that the grassum is to be considered as part of the rent, with respect to all but the succeeding heir of entail. What is there in the law of entails that makes the condition of the heir of entail different from that of other persons with respect to the meaning of the word "rental?" I am not able to comprehend how it is possible to say that the grassum is not a part of the rent with respect to the heir of tailzie, when, with respect to every other person, it is a part of the rent. If it is part of the rent—if the grassums previously received are to be considered as part of the rent, when the land is let again (whether with another grassum or without a grassum) at the same nominal rent, the land is let at less than the rent that was before actually received, though the same rent is nominally reserved. The rent before taken by the granter of the lease, was compounded of the grassum and the reserved rent. When the lease which was so granted was either surrendered, or expired, if the grassum was not taken into consideration in fixing the reserved rent on a second lease, then the land is set with diminution of rent, in the strictest sense of the words, independent of the additional charge brought upon the actually reserved rent, by means of the grassum.

Upon these grounds, therefore, I do conceive that the effect of taking grassums is, to make all leases which have been granted at the old rent upon gras-[530]-sums, or upon the surrender of leases granted upon grassums, not within the power of leasing given by the deed of entail; and that the lands comprised in such leases have been set with diminution of the rental, even if the word "rental" in the deed of entail is not to be construed, as I insist it ought to be construed, as meaning the rent which might be obtained for the estate at the time, and not the rent which was before reserved.—There are no words in the deed of entail expressing that the word "rental" meant the rent before reserved.

In the act prohibiting the alienation of lands of the Crown, except under particular circumstances, and except by way of exchange, by which the last rental should not be diminished, if a question had been raised upon an exchange, what was the meaning of the word "rental," it must, unquestionably, have been construed to mean, that the value of the lands given and received in exchange should be the same; that the value of the land which the King should exchange with another person, should be no greater than the value of the land which he should receive in exchange. That act was intended as a restriction upon the power of the Crown to alien lands; and therefore, if the King exchanged lands with another, the act required that the lands which he should receive in exchange should be of equal value; that is, that the exchange should be without diminution of the rental of the Crown—the word "rental" there clearly meaning real annual value. The words of the statute must clearly and unquestionably mean the real value, and not the rent actually reserved.

[531] Taking the whole of the circumstances of these cases together, (upon which I should not have addressed your Lordships so long, in all probability, had the noble and learned Lord been able to have proceeded to-day, as he would most probably have anticipated much that has fallen from me upon the subject,) I can only add, that it appears to me that a fifty-seven years lease cannot be good, under the entail of the Neidpath estate;—that under the entail of the Queensberry estate, the word "dispono" is a word operating a restriction upon the granter of leases, as much as the word "alien;"—and that in respect to the leases in question in that case, they cannot be sustained under the power of leasing which is contained in the deed of entail, because they have been granted upon grassums, and at rents reserved on leases before granted on grassums, and therefore with diminution of the rental, and certainly not at the just avail at the time.

JUDGMENTS BY THE HOUSE OF LORDS IN THE PRECEDING CASES.

DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH v. Sir JAMES MONTGOMERY, etc. In action of Declarator.

Die Lunae, 12 Julii 1819.

It is ordered and adjudged, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the said interlocutor complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same is hereby reversed: And the Lords find, That William late Duke of Queensberry, had not power by the entail founded on by the parties in this cause, to grant tacks for terms of years, partly for yearly rent, [532] and partly for a price or sum paid to the Duke himself; and that tacks granted by him upon surrender of former tacks which had been granted partly for yearly rent, and partly for prices or sums paid to the Duke himself, ought to be considered as partly granted for prices or sums paid to the Duke, and that such tacks ought not to be considered as let without diminution of the rental, or at the just avail, and are therefore to be considered, as between the persons claiming under the entail, as tacks which he had not power to grant by such entail: And it is further ordered, That with this finding, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this finding.

DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH v. HYSLOP. In the Reduction.

Die Lunae, 12 Julii 1819.

It is ordered and adjudged by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the said interlocutor complained of in the said appeal be, and the same is hereby reversed: And the Lords find, That the late Duke of Queensberry had not power, by the deed of entail founded upon by the parties in this cause, to grant the tack in question, in this cause, the same having been granted upon the surrender or renunciation of a former tack then unexpired, and which former tack had been granted by the Duke at the same rent, and also for a sum or price received by him; and the said tack in question, therefore, having been granted partly in consideration of the rent reserved thereby, and partly in consideration of a price or sum as before paid to the said Duke himself, and of the renunciation of the said former tack: And find, therefore, That this tack of the 30th of December 1803, ought to be considered in this question with Hyslop, as let with diminution of rental, and not for the just avail: And it is farther ordered, that with this finding, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as is just and consistent with this finding.

IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

THE REV. ARCHIBALD M'LEA, Doctor in Divinity,—Plaintiff in Error: JAMES WALKER, Sheriff's Officer, in Rothsay,—Defendant in Error [7th April 1819].

[See Forbes v. Gibson 1850, 13 Dunlop 341: affd. in H. L. 1 Macq. 106; Hogg v. Parochial Board of Auchtermuchty 1880, 7 Rettie 986.]

The stipendiary clergy in Scotland are liable to the payment of duties on their manse, parsonages, and glebes, by the stat. 43 Geo. III, c. 122, and 46 Geo. III, c. 65, and the assessed taxes imposed by the 48 Geo. III, c. 55; and are not exempted generally from taxation by the general laws of Scotland, nor by the Scots act 1593, c. 166.

Semble that they are also liable in respect of stipend, although by the stat. 1593, c. 166, it is ordained, "that all minister's stipends, in time cumming, be free from all tacks, pensiones, taxations, or impositiones quhatsoever, notwithstanding of onie gift or disposition made in the contrair," etc.

The word "taxation" in the act 1593, c. 166, is to be construed by considering the recital of the act: the occasion of the enactment and the other words which are coupled in the same clause, with the word "taxation."

This cause arose out of a claim advanced on behalf of the clergy of the church of Scotland, that their order was entitled in law to a privilege of exemption from taxes.

In order to try the validity of this claim, the plaintiff in error brought, in the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, an action of trespass against the defendant in error, to recover damages for the seizure of a horse which was taken in execution under the circumstances stated in the special verdict subjoined.

The defendant pleaded the general issue, and the [536] case having been tried by a jury, the following special verdict was returned: "The jurors, upon their oaths, say that the defendant took, etc. That when the defendant so took the said horse, he acted in execution of two warrants granted by the sheriff substitute of the shire of Bute, on two certificates and petitions at the instance of Archibald M'Lea, collector of taxes for the burgh of Rothsay, against the plaintiff, both of which warrants were dated the 25th May 1811, and authorized the poinding of the goods and effects of the plaintiff, for the recovery of the sum of £26 5s. 7d. being the amount of property duty for the year, from the 5th day of April 1809 to the 5th day of April 1810, assessed upon the plaintiff by the commissioners for putting in execution the act 46 Geo. III. cap. 65, for the burgh of Rothsay; for and in respect of his manse, glebe, and stipend, as minister of Rothsay; and for recovery of the sum of £4 3s. being the amount of assessed taxes for the year ending at Whitsunday 1811, upon the following articles: to wit; one occasional servant the sum of 6s. one riding horse the sum of £2 13s. 6d. and hair powder duty the sum of £1 3s. 6d. amounting in whole to the aforesaid sum of £4 3s. and the expenses allowed by the law for making the same effectual; and to which last mentioned sum the plaintiff had been assessed under the provisions of the statute 43 Geo. III. cap. 156, and 48 Geo. III. cap. 55.

"And the jurors further say, that the plaintiff is a clergyman of the established church of Scotland, etc. and that the sum of £26 5s. 7d. was assessed [537] upon the plaintiff in respect of the profits arising to him from his said living as minister of Rothsay.

"And if upon the whole matter," etc.

Upon this special verdict the case was argued before the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, and on the 4th of July 1812, the Court gave judgment for the Defendant.

Against this judgment, the present writ of error was brought.

On behalf of the Plaintiff in error.

By the law and practice of Scotland, from the Reformation downwards, neither the stipend, glebe, nor manse of the ministers of the established church is chargeable with any public burden. This immunity is part of the public law of the land, which has not been altered by any of the statutes referred to in the verdict upon the record.

Before the Reformation, the clergy of Scotland possessed all the tithes, and one fourth of the lands of the kingdom. They paid one-half of all the taxes imposed upon the land and its fruits. They also made the contributions required of them to the Pope. They paid a fifth penny of their benefices to the King, and on extraordinary occasions they paid tenths.

When the Reformation made its way into Scotland, all the popish establishments were swept away, the King and the aristocracy of the country appropriated all the property and revenues of the clergy, and it was some time before the protestant ministers acquired right to any permanent provision.

The first act that appears upon the subject is one [538] of the Privy Council, and bears date in the year 1561. It was afterwards confirmed by act of parliament 1567, cap. 10, which, upon the preamble, that "the ministers have been long defrauded of their stipends sua that they are becomin in great poverty and necessity; statutes and ordaines that the haill thrills of the haill benefices of this realm sall now instantly and in all times to come, first be payed to the ministers of the Evangel of Jesus Christ and their successors; ay and quhill the kirk come to the full possession of their proper patrimonie quhilk is the teindes. Providing always, that the collectors of the saidis ministers make zeirlic compt in the checker of their intronmissions sua that the ministers may be first answered of their stipendis apperteyning to everie one of them. And the rest and superplus to be applied to our Sovereign Lord's use."

By statute 1572, cap. 52, an act of secret council was ratified, setting apart all benefices not exceeding 300 marks, as a provision for qualified ministers.

In the year 1581, an act was passed, according to which the whole kingdom of Scotland is divided into certain parishes, which were intended to be of moderate bounds, and for every one of which a minister was to be appointed, having a suitable stipend. The words of the act are (1581, c. 100), "It being found maist ditficil that in the charge of plurality of kirks any one minister may instruct mony flocks, therefore it is thochet expedient, statuted and ordained, be our Sovereign Lord and his three estates of this present parliament, that every parish kirk and sameikle bounds as sall be found to be a sufficient and competent parochin, therefoir sall have their [539] own pastour with a sufficient and reasonable stipend according to the stait and habilitie of the place."

The teinds of the benefices in which the parish is locally situated were in almost all cases burdened with the stipends here referred to, which were granted to the clergy in the form of warrants called assignations by the commissioners of teinds against the titulars of the respective benefices, authorizing and requiring them to make payment to the minister of a certain number of bolls, or a certain sum of money in name of stipend. Under these warrants, the minister had no right to any teind; but merely to a certain quantity of victual or a certain sum of money, while the titular remained proprietor of the whole teinds, and continued to draw them either in his own name or by means of his tacksman. These stipends form the principal part of the income of the clergy at this day. They have no other but that which arises from their glebes, which have their origin in the operations of the same aera.

By statute 1587, cap. 29, parliament upon the preamble that the church owed their temporalities to the improvident and profuse liberality of the crown, that the church had no longer any use for that part of their property, while on the other hand the crown stood much in need of it, "unities, annexies, and incorporates to the crown of this realm to remain therewith annexed, and as it were propertie thereof in all time cumming, and with our said Sovereine Lord and his successors for ever, all and sundrie lands, lordshipes, baronnies, castles, towres, fortalices, mansions, manour places, milnes, multures, wooddes, schawes, parks, fischings, townes, villages, [540] burrowes in regalities, and barronie annual rents, tenents, reversions, customes, great and small feu farmes, tennents, tennandries, and service of free tennents. And all and sundrie utheris commodities, profitis and emoluments quhatsumever, alsewill to burgh as to land (except as hereafter sall be excepted in this present acte) quhilkis at the day and daif of their presents, viz. the xxix day of July the zeir of God 1587 zeirs, perteinis to quhatsumever archbishoppe, bishope, abbote, prior, prioreses, etc. Except and alsua foorth of the said annexation, all and quhatsumever mansiones of parsonages and vicarages annexed to parochie kirkes with four aikers of glebe maiste west to the kirk, and commodious for the minister serving the cure theirof for his better residence thereat, quhilk sall not be nor ar comprehended in the said annexation. But sall remain with the minister, parson or vicar or uthur quha sall be provided thereto for serving the cure according to the actis of parliament maid thereanent of before."

These were the first glebes in Scotland after the Reformation. They were part of the church lands reserved to the ministers upon the new establishment, and it was provided that they should not be liable either in teind or feu duty. Later statutes have authorized the designations of glebes out of lay-lands, but they have always been held in law entitled to the same privileges as the original glebes set apart by the former statutes. They are allodial, neither paying any feu duty nor acknowledging any superior. No teinds are exigible out of their fruits, and they have neither been valued in the cess books, [541] nor charged with cess or any other burthen imposed for behoof of the state or of the parish: in respect, as the stat. 1621, c. 10, expresses it, "that the same is dedicated and appointed ad pios usus."

These provisions for the clergy were from the beginning privileged. The act 1587, c. 29, declares they shall "be free of first year's fruits and fifth penny." The act 1592, c. 123, narrates that by several previous statutes which are not now extant, they were preferable to the king upon the benefices burdened with the stipend. Finally, in the year 1593, an act was passed in the following terms: "For saemeikle as sundrie ministers quha has been in long possession of their stipends be verteu of their assignations, are troubled be pensioners or tacksmen, quha hes tane in tack gift or pension, either their haill stipends or an great pairt thereof, and hes obtained ratification in parliament thereupon. Therefore our Sovereine Lord with advice of his estates of this present parliament, ordaines that all ministers stipends in time cumming, be free from all tackes pensiones taxations or impositiones quhalsumever, notwithstanding of onie gift or disposition made in the contrair to the effect that the ministeres may bruike their stipends peaceably in all time cumming, without any trouble according to their assignations."

The first taxation imposed after the passing of this act was in the year 1597.

Parliament grants 200,000 merks to the King, 100,000 of which is to be paid by the spiritual estate, £66,666 8s. 10d. by the barons freeholders, and £33,333 4s. 6d. by the burghs of the realm. The portion falling on the spiritual estates is to be paid by the bishops, abbots, [542] and beneficed persons, and by them alone. In this list ministers having stipends are not included. Further, these beneficed persons were required to pay not only for what was in their own natural possession, but for the income drawn by those possessing under them; and while for their relief it is provided that they shall have recourse against "their vassals, feuars, tacksmen, and pensioners," it is not provided that they shall have relief from ministers possessing part of the teinds by the assignations before-mentioned; and it is not alleged that they ever had any relief from this body.

In the year 1633, the lay members of parliament granted to King Charles the First, thirty shillings in the pound upon the old extent * for six years, beginning with the year 1634, and "the archbishops and bishops for the spiritual estate, granted a proportional supply out of all archbishopricks, bishopricks, abbaies, priories, and other inferior benefices, as they have been accustomed to be taxed, in all time bygone whensoever, the temporal lands of this kingdom were stented to thirty shillings the pound land, of old extent." That act further contains the following general revocation of all privileges and immunities; "And further his Majestic and the said estates annul and discharge all privileges and immunities whatsoever, whereby any persons may think themselves free of payment of their present taxation; the privileges granted to the ordinary senators of the colledge of justice, and the taxation of benefices given, disposed, and mortified for the entertainment of the universities, [543] colleges, and hospitals within this kingdom only excepted."

Neither stipends nor glebes were ever charged with any portion of this tax; it appears, however, that benefices such as parsonages and vicarages, though set apart for the sustenance of the reformed clergy, and at the same time not greater than an ordinary stipend, in respect of their being benefices, were burthened with this or similar taxations. For among the rescinded acts there appears a statute (1641, 2d Sept.), the preamble of which bears, that the clergy holding vicarages and other small benefices had been grievously oppressed by the collectors of the revenue, that such exactions were contrary to law as well as equity, and declaring stipends, and benefices similar to stipends, free of all taxation. The act is entitled, "An act for freeing of vicarages provided to ministers for their stipends of taxations;" and the preamble is, "Our Sovereigne Lord, and estates of parliament, considering the distractions that ministers are brought into, and other prejudices and losses sustained by them, by taxations craved of vicarages which are assigned and provided to them, as a part of their stipends in so far as they are assigned and provided, and that it is against all reason and equitie, and former acts of parliament, that ministers' stipends should be burthened with impositions and taxations; therefore statutes and ordaines (for eschewing of these inconveniences and prejudices,) that no vicarage teinds, nor rents thereof assigned or provided, or to be assigned or provided, to ministers as a part of their stipends, be burthened or affected with any taxations of impositions bygone, owing, unpaid, or in time coming," etc. Upon this [544] preamble, vicarages, provided they make part of the modified stipend, are declared to be free of all taxations, in the same manner as all other stipends were admitted to be in virtue of the previous acts of parliament. As to stipends not in the predicament of a benefice, there was no occasion to make any enactment, because they never had been charged with any tax.

During the civil wars, and afterwards during the usurpation, full effect was given to these previous statutes, and in particular in the execution of a measure of Oliver Cromwell, the express purpose of which was, to make a fair and equal valuation of all the property in Scotland, for the purpose of a general taxation, without regard to any private privilege whatever. The legislative provisions were as comprehensive as general terms can make them; and yet the stipends and glebes of ministers were considered as protected by the public law of the land, and held to be free of all burden. (See Wight, vol. I. p. 182.)

On this occasion, every county proceeded by itself to value its own lands. The proceedings of several counties are still extant; and, for all Scotland, the rent thus valued, as it stood in the year 1656, is the rule according to which the cess is levied at this day. Yet there is no instance of teinds forming part of a modified stipend, or of glebes, being valued or subjected to any part of the burden.

The words of Cromwell's act (1656, c. 14) are, "And for the more equal and right proportioning of the several sums before mentioned, be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the several sums of money to be rated, assessed, and levied, in virtue [545] of this act, shall be taxed and assessed by a pound rate on the several parishes in the respective counties, cities, and places aforesaid, for all and every their lands, tenements, hereditaments, annuities, rents, parks, warrens, goods, chattels, stock, merchandizes, office, or any other real or personal estate whatsoever, according to the value thereof; that is to say, so much upon every twenty shilling rent or yearly value of land and real estate, and so much upon money, stock, and other personal estate, by an equal rate, (wherein every twenty pounds in money, stock, or other personal estate, shall bear the like charge as shall be laid upon every twenty shillings yearly rent or yearly value of land,) as will raise the monthly sum or sums charged upon the respective counties, cities, and towns aforesaid. For the better effecting whereof, it is hereby enacted, that the several and respective commissioners hereby appointed for the several and respective counties, cities, and towns aforesaid, shall meet together at the most common and usual place of meeting in each of the said counties, cities, and towns respectively, on or before the 15th day of July, in this present year 1657.

"And the said commissioners, or so many of them as shall then and there attend and be present, shall cause this present act to be put in execution, according to their best discretion and judgment; and having agreed amongst themselves of some general rules and directions for the doing thereof, and appointed another time for the second general meeting, which shall be on or before the 30th day of July aforesaid at the furthest, to receive the returns from the several counties, stewartries, cities, bur-[546]-roughs, parishes, and places: and there with all convenient speed, they, or any two or more of them, shall nominate and appoint two or three of the honest and able inhabitants in the several and respective parishes to be surveyors and assessors, who (or any two of them) are to ascertain and rate the yearly value and profits of the said parishes and places for which they shall be appointed surveyors and assessors, and shall return the same to the said commissioners, or to such person or persons as shall be appointed to receive the same." The act also contains the following clause, abolishing all privileges: "And be it hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that no privileged place or person, body politique or corporate, within the cities, counties, towns, and places aforesaid, shall be exempted from the said assessments and taxes, but that they and every of them, and also all fee farm rents, and other rents of the late king's revenues, all rents and other sums received by the late court of ward, out of any infants or lunatique estates, and all other manner of rents, payment, and sums of money and annuities issuing out of any lands within any city or county, shall be liable towards the payment of any sum by this act to be taxed and levied."

The act also contains the following exception: "Provided also, that nothing contained in this act shall be extended to charge any of the masters or scholars of the universities or colleges in Scotland, or any other officer in the said universities, colleges, or schools of any hospital or alms-houses for and in regard of any stipend, wages, or profits whatsoever arising or growing due to them in respect of the several places and employments in [547] the said universities, colleges, schools, hospitals, or alms houses, for or in respect of any rents or revenues being to be received or disbursed for the immediate use and relief of the same." It was necessary expressly to exempt the masters and scholars of the universities, because their income was by the general law of Scotland subject to taxation; but it was held unnecessary specially to exempt the clergy, because under the general law they had an immunity.

This enactment was carried into full effect during the Usurpation. But the stipends and glebes of the established clergy in Scotland continued, notwithstanding this statute, and the taxation which followed upon it, free of all imposition whatever. After the Restoration, from antipathy to all Cromwell's measures, the rule of valued land (see Vol. 2. p. 1, note) was abandoned, and that of the previous extent adopted in the levying of the land-tax.

Afterwards it was thought expedient to return to the new valuation, and in order to raise the next supply that was granted, which was by act of convention * in the year 1667 (23d Jan.), commissioners were appointed, with power "to call for and consider the valuations [548] of all lands, teinds, and other real estates within their respective shires and burghs; and such as they shall find just and equal, that they approve thereof and appoint the same to be the rule for levying and raising this present supply." Where estates have been split among different proprietors since Cromwell's valuation, or "when they shall find any just cause by inequality, the commissioners are to value of new again."

Notwithstanding these comprehensive words, ministers stipends were not valued, or taxed in any way; and there is a clause in this act, from which it appears that the general expressions above used could not be extended to glebes or stipends. Power is given in these terms: "As also to value the rent of all archbishopricks, bishopricks, and other benefices in so far as they exceed the ordinary value of modified stipends: provided always, that notwithstanding of the valuation thereof within the shire where there is any such lands, teinds, or other real rent, the total and proportions above specified of the said shires continue without any alteration." This shows clearly that stipends, and benefices not better than modified stipends, were not to be valued; and accordingly they were not valued.

The valuations made in virtue of this act have regulated such taxations ever since. The heritable property, exempted under that act, has been exempted ever since; and the property burdened, whether lands or teinds, have ever since been burdened according to the valuations then made.

The next supply which was granted, was in the year 1670, by act of parliament, which appoints it [549] "to be raised and paid out of the land rent, in the same manner, according to the same proportion, and with the same exceptions that the former supply granted to his Majesty by the convention of estates, in January 1667, was raised."

A new supply was granted in the year 1672, to be raised and paid according to the valuation of the same act of convention.

In the year 1678 a further supply was granted by an act of convention, which it is declared shall be levied "according to the present valuation."

In the year 1681 an act of parliament was passed, granting an additional supply, which in like manner is to be levied in the manner and proportions prescribed by the act of convention. This was a large supply, amounting to £1,800,000 Scots, and it was thought proper to give the landed proprietors some relief from the vassals, feuars, tenants, subtenants, and inhabitants in their lands. In particular, they were to have relief from each gentleman, of a sum not exceeding £6 Scots, for each tenant £1 Scots, and for each tradesman, cottar, or servant, 20s. Scots.

After these acts, the mode of levying the supply became established, and so much understood as a matter of course over the whole nation, that in many acts of parliament the supply is granted without specifying how it is to be levied, while in others the rule of the convention 1667 is especially prescribed.

This however made no difference in practice: for, whether the act of parliament was express or silent on the subject, the will of the legislature was understood to be, that the rules of the act of convention [550] 1667 should be observed, and both stipends and glebes left unburdened.

After the revolution all personal privileges were expressly recalled. By statute 1690, c. 6. a new supply is granted; and it is declared, "That no person or persons shall be excused from payment of their proportions of this supply for their lands upon any pretext whatsoever, excepting mortified lands alienarily notwithstanding of any former law, privilege, or act of parliament in the contrary." These terms are sufficiently comprehensive, to take away any privilege whatever; but yet they were not held sufficient in law to take away the exemption in favour of stipends and glebes, which by the public law were held not to be taxable subjects. Accordingly the very same parliament (Cap 9), while it gives the heritor relief against gentlemen, tenants, feuars, tradesmen, and cottars, gives him no relief against clergymen.

* This was one of those "Conventions of Estates," which were occasionally called upon sudden exigencies, real or supposed. The formal citation of all those who had right to sit in parliament, was on these occasions omitted. The king, on the plea of emergency, called together as many of the three estates as could be speedily assembled. By a statute of James IV. (1503, c. 85.) it was ordained, that "the commissaries and headsmen of boroughs be warned quhen taxes or contributiones are given, etc." The powers of these conventions were limited to the particular business for which they were called.

A new supply was granted in the parliament, 1693, c. 2. which in like manner declares in the most peremptory terms "that no person or persons shall be exempted from payment of their proportions of this supply for their lands upon any pretext whatever."

Even these words were not held sufficient to affect the right of the clergy to immunity, in respect of their glebes, mansions, and stipends.

In the same session of parliament (Cap 9), however, a poll-tax was imposed, by which it is ordained that all persons of "whomsoever" age, sex, or quality shall be subject and liable to the poll-tax of six shillings Scots per head, except poor persons who live upon [551] charity, and children under the age of sixteen years. Persons of higher rank are ordained to pay according to their presumed wealth, and in particular all ministers having benefices or stipends, and parish kirks not planted, shall pay twelve pounds of poll. Here the clergy are burdened, because the tax has no connection with land or teinds, or heritable income of any kind, but is a personal tax not falling under the general law by which the property of the clergy is exempted.

Another poll-tax was afterwards granted by parliament (1695, c. 10), but it was conceived to be unconstitutional to subject the clergy even to a personal tax, and accordingly they were omitted, which could not have happened per incuriam, while every other description of person is burdened.

The same immunity was preserved by the clergy, notwithstanding the revocation of all previous personal exemptions in several subsequent statutes (1702, c. 6; 1704, c. 4; 1705, c. ; 1706, c. 2.). In all of these it is declared, that no person or persons shall be exempted from payment of their proportion thereof, for their lands, upon any pretence whatever, excepting mortified lands; and yet, no contribution whatever was levied on the clergy. Under all the land-tax acts above mentioned, although the magistrates of royal burghs are empowered to assess the inhabitants, without exception, in relief of the burghs quota, no assessment has ever been imposed on manse or glebes within burghs.*

[552] The plaintiff does not insist upon any personal privilege: but so far as respects the house and window duty, and the property duty, levied upon his manse and glebe and stipend, there is no law to justify the warrant specified in the pleadings. That the expressions used in the statutes are universally comprehensive, is not denied. They include all houses, lands, and annual income, which by the law of Scotland are subject to taxation; but the houses, glebes, and stipends of the clergy have not been in that predicament for more than two hundred years. It is extremely questionable whether after the act of union it was within the power of parliament to burden these subjects with any tax; and supposing that parliament had the power, the ancient immunities of the church could not be taken away without a formal repeal of the law conferring them, which is not to be found in the statutes referred to by the defendant.

According to the public law of Scotland, the manse, glebe, and stipend of the clergy were not taxable. If the most comprehensive form of words imposing the burden, accompanied with a revocation of all existing privileges, could have burdened these subjects, the commissioners under former acts must have included them; but they never did, and for this no reason can be assigned but that by law the subjects [553] were free of all imposition whatever, and not taxable. There may be countries where the property and the income of the clergy are subject to taxation, and there may be other countries where the churches and courts of justice, and all public property, are subject to taxes, payable by those who take benefit from it. But this never was the law of Scotland.

* See the observations of Sir George McKenzie, upon the acts 1578, c. 62. 1587, c. 26. and 1593, c. 166. In the discussion of the act 1597, c. [] which directs the supply to be levied according to the actual value of the lands, he says, "this can be of no consequence to stipendiary ministers, seeing by act of parliament, 162 James 6, parl. 13, they are freed and exempted of all taxations and impositions." See also Forbes on Tithes, Erskine, b. 2, tit. 10, s. 50; Kaim's Abridgment of the stat. 1593, c. 162; Spottiswood on Hope's Minor Practicks, tit. 2, s. 16; Craig, Feud. lib. 1, diæg. 12, s. 14

According to the articles of the union, that law is unalterable. The constitution of the church of Scotland, with all the rights and immunities belonging to it, was the object of great anxiety at the union, and it was not considered as expedient that the united parliament should have power to alter it. It was therefore made a condition of the union, that this should not be competent even to parliament. The only question is, whether it is not to be considered as part of that constitution, that the property set apart for the subsistence of the clergy should have an immunity from all taxation; in other words, whether any portion of it can be taken from the church, and used for the purposes of the state.

As to the particular expressions used in the property duty act, it may perhaps be maintained that they prove that parliament understood that there were teinds in Scotland belonging to ecclesiastical persons falling under the general provisions of that statute: for there is no doubt that in the rule for assessing the duties imposed, teinds in Scotland belonging to any ecclesiastical person are mentioned. But these expressions do not occur in the clause imposing the duty; and that clause does not contain a repeal of the previous law, declaring the property of the clergy free of all taxation. Neither the common nor [554] the statute law of Scotland have been altered. The courts in Scotland will administer this statute to the subjects of Scotland precisely as they would have done if this union had never been made. This act could not have included the property of the clergy at any previous period, for it has been shown that a long succession of statutes containing still broader and more comprehensive clauses were never so interpreted.

This is no new question. It occurred in every reign from James VI. down to the union: and during the whole of that period there is not to be found a lawyer who ever maintained that such expressions could affect the property of the clergy: while, on the other hand, every lawyer who has had occasion to speak upon the subject, gives it as his opinion, that such enactments do not embrace that property: and in practice the commissioners of the revenue never did charge either the stipend, glebe, or manse of the ministers with any tax. They held them free, not because the expressions of the revenue statutes did not embrace teinds, and lands, and houses, for as to that there could be no dispute; but because by the general law of Scotland, the teinds, lands, and houses of the clergy were held to be public property, and not subject to any tax.

The expressions used in the rule for assessing the property duty, do not apply to the property of the Scotch clergy. That they do not apply to their glebes and manses is obvious; and it is equally certain that they do not in general apply to their stipends. By the decrees in the Teind Court, a certain sum of money, or a certain number of bolls of [556] corn and meal, is modified as a stipend, and the minister has a right to demand that money and that quantity of victual from the titular, but he has nothing to do with the teinds of the lands. These belong to the titular or heritor whoever he be, who draws them, and he becomes personally responsible to the minister for the stipend modified. When therefore this rule speaks of teinds belonging to ecclesiastical persons, it can have no meaning, unless it holds the titulars, as the successors of the ancient clergy, to be entitled to this appellation. There may be eight or ten cases in Scotland, where the minister succeeding to the whole of an old benefice is the titular, but in general he is no more than a stipendiary, who has nothing to do with the teinds, but draws annually a sum of money, or a quantity of victual, from the titular or heritor. Accordingly Mr. Erskine says, "they are all stipendiaries."

Even private rights, in virtue of which individuals have enjoyed immunity from particular taxes, have never been held to be revoked by implication. If parliament found them inconvenient, and thought it necessary to take them away, they did so by an express act, and then they granted compensation.

A company of soap-boilers in Glasgow, for certain reasons, obtained an exemption from duties on soap, and although they were never mentioned in any subsequent act of parliament, yet they constantly enjoyed their exemption till they were deprived of it by special act of parliament, when they obtained £6000 as a compensation for the loss.

Mr. Forbes of Culloden, by two unprinted acts of parliament, obtained an exemption from duties upon [556] the spirits and malt made from grain which grew upon his estate. He was not particularly exempted in any excise acts afterwards made, yet he enjoyed his privilege till lately, when the act depriving him of it, provided a compensation to him of about £20,000 after the case had been submitted to a jury.

The Duke of Richmond's tax upon coals is an illustration of the same principle.

The statutes imposing the property and assessed taxes, contain no provision excluding this privilege. The maxim of law must therefore prevail—Generalia non revocant specialia. Greer v. Mitchell.*

The word "stipend" in the schedule to the act 46 Geo. III. c. 65. is not applicable to the Scotch clergy: for it is not payable by his Majesty or out of the public revenue.† Nor does stipend come [557] under the word "teinds," they are rather a burden upon the teinds.

As to personal taxes, such as that on the wearing of hair-powder, the plaintiff does not claim exemption. Those taxes stand on a different principle.

On the part of the defendant in error.

There is no evidence that the legislature of Scotland ever contemplated an exemption from taxes as a part of the provision of the reformed clergy. On the contrary, the maintenance of the clergy was always recognized to be a burden to which the holders of teinds were in justice subject, as the condition of their right; and a grant to the church of an exemption from taxes, of which the burden must evidently have rested on the nation at large, would have been contrary to this universal understanding. The exemption of the clergy from first fruits and the fifth penny, was of quite a different nature. These were parts of benefices which had been seized [558] by the Pope; and, in his stead, had fallen to the King. These, therefore, formed a most natural subject for appropriating to the provision of the reformed clergy; and when the corruptions of Popery were in every respect overthrown and reprobated, it was reasonable, that the few protestant clergy who had obtained benefices, should Pugh*, Douglas's Reports, 1st edit. p. 179; Faculty Decisions, App. to vol. 10, Jan. 29th 1788. The Magistrates of Edinburgh against the College of Justice. The Duke of Queensberry and Earl of Hopetown.

† The word "stipend" occurs in schedule E. of the statute 43 Geo. III. c. 122. under the following title and context:

"Schedule of the rates and duties payable by persons having, using, or exercising any public office or employment of profit.

"Upon every publick office or employment of profit, and upon every annuity, pension or stipend payable by his Majesty, or out of the public revenue of Great Britain, etc."

Schedule D. seems more comprehensive. By it, duties are imposed upon "the annual profits arising to any person resident "in Great Britain, from any profession, trade or vocation."

The same words are repeated in the schedules set forth in the subsequent statutes, and re-enacted with additional and special directions as to the mode of assessment, etc.

The statute of 46 Geo. III. c. 65, s. 74, provides, "that the duties thereby granted, including the duties contained in the schedule marked A. (which is a transcript from the former act.) shall be assessed and charged under rules which shall be construed to be a part of the act, and to refer to the said duties as if the same had been inserted under a special enactment." The rules are then given under numbers. No. III. contains rules for estimating lands, etc. therein mentioned, which are not to be charged according to the preceding general rule. It then provides that the annual value of all the properties after described shall be understood to be the full or average amount for one year of the profits, etc. And in the second head of this rule are specified "all teinds in Scotland belonging to any ecclesiastical person."

not be subjected to this papal encroachment. The exemption of glebes from teind, was as little similar to the privilege under consideration. Teinds were no public tax, but a private property. The holders of teinds too were liable to maintain the clergy; and it would therefore have been absurd to draw teinds out of the legal provision of land modified to the clergy. Nor had it been ever agreeable to the canon or ecclesiastical law, that glebes should pay tithe. In every respect, therefore, exemptions of glebes from teinds was totally dissimilar from a general exemption from national taxes. These are not instances of an intention in the legislature of Scotland to provide for the clergy, by giving them a general privilege of exemption from taxation.

The act of 1593 (c. 166) cannot be construed to contain any general exemption of the clergy from taxation. It cannot be held to exempt them from any thing more than taxations or impositions from their stipends. The statute 1663, c. 21, imposed a part of the expense of maintaining the universities on the clergy alone, which at that time were episcopal. The equity of this arrangement consisted in this, that the universities were regarded as part of the church establishment; and there is no reason to doubt, that the clergy had consented to it. The statute says, [559] "there being an expedient proposed." And it is to be presumed it was proposed by the clergy. When this was done, it was thought reasonable to declare, that it should not afford a preparative or precedent for imposing peculiar burdens on the clergy without their own consent. The reason of this evidently was, because the burden was imposed on the clergy alone, and might be supposed to afford a dangerous example to a parliament, in which they had little influence. That it did not allude to any general exemption of the clergy from taxation is sufficiently evinced by the act of convention, 1667, granting a supply or land-tax, in which the clergy are subjected. It is true, that stipends and benefices not exceeding a sufficient stipend, are exempted from this tax. But this is not by any reference to a general privilege previously existing in law. It is by a special expressed exemption; and it follows after similar exemptions of a much broader nature given to the members of the college of justice, to universities, colleges, schools, and hospitals. In the act 1667, there is a personal or poll-tax, from which, in like manner, the clergy are exempted. But here also the exemption follows after that of noblemen, barons, heritors, and life-renters; and it is followed by that of schoolmasters, readers, precentors, their wives and children; and also the college of justice, officers of the mint, and their wives, children, and servants. This affords no evidence of a general privilege of the clergy to be exempted from all taxation.

In the act of parliament 1693, chap. 9, imposing a poll-tax, it is confessed that the clergy are in-[560]-cluded, even stipendiary ministers, being set down as a class liable to a distinct duty. In the other acts, imposing poll-taxes, the clergy are also included. Even the stipendiary clergy are not exempted, although they are not subjected to a rate of poll-tax as a distinct class; but by act 1695, chap. 10, they are liable as "gentlemen." And even if they could have degraded themselves by repudiating that character, they are still liable to the lowest rate, which applies "to all persons of whatsoever age, sex, or quality, except poor persons, who live upon charity, and children under the age of sixteen." And by act 1698, chap. 12, they are liable as "unlanded gentlemen." It is said that a supplication was presented by the episcopal clergy for exemption; but it appears, that this claim was rejected, on the ground that clergy in general were not exempted. It appears by the records of parliament, that in 1701, Mr. Campbell and others, tacksmen of the poll-tax, 1695, gave in an account with regard to it, containing the total charge against them, and also the discharge. In this discharge, they stated the following article: "By the poll of the episcopal clergy £6000." This was stated as a discharge, on the ground that they were not entitled to levy it. But on this article, the committee of parliament made the following observations. "There should be no allowance for the poll of those clergymen, except their number be mentioned, in respect that no exemption subsists, except for clergy of Edinburgh, all other clergy being liable." In what way the clergy of Edinburgh were exempted does not appear; but it cer-[561]tainly was not by any general privilege possessed by the clergy at large. The observations of Mackenzie and Forbes cannot be supposed to relate to any universal exemption from taxation enjoyed by the clergy. Accordingly, it will not be said, that in practice the clergy ever pretended to any exemption from customs or excise, though customs were ancient in Scotland, and excise was introduced there in 1644 (Kaimes' Stat. Law, vide Customs, Excise). The treaty of union, if the clergy held any such privilege, would certainly have taken it away; or the subsequent revenue statutes, in which there is no trace of such a privilege, but clear proof that none existed. In the 48th Geo. III. chap. 55, there is expressly given to the clergy an exemption from hair-powder duty; but it is limited to such clergy whose incomes do not exceed £100 per annum. There is a multitude of statutes imposing duties, from which it was never imagined that the clergy of Scotland had any privilege of exemption. As to the pretended exemption in practice from the window-duty, it appears from the minute-books of the exchequer, that the clergy never pretended to demand it as of right, but obtained, as a favour from the lords of the treasury, a delay of levying. They were put insuper, as it is called, until there should be time given to apply to parliament, for an express and special exemption or other relief to the clergy from that tax. But no existing right of exemption was either recognized or pretended.

The claims of the plaintiff to exemption from property-tax on his manse and glebe, and from assessed taxes on his horse, servant, and hair-powder, [562] is void of foundation; for it cannot be pretended that there exists any special privilege in regard to these taxes. It is not pretended that the acts imposing them bestow any exemption from them upon the clergy of Scotland; nor can it be pretended, that any ancient statute affords any argument for such a privilege, by a prospective regulation.

As to the property-tax on the plaintiff's stipend, it appears to be said that a special exemption exists, in virtue of the Scotch statute of 1593. The clergy had no privilege of exemption in general, or from any one tax, land-tax, poll-tax, customs, or excise. But yet it is said the Legislature had given them a privilege of exemption from all taxes which could affect their stipends. It is said this exemption is still in force, and that it applies to the property-tax.

This argument is founded solely on the statute 1593, cap. 166. But the evils to be remedied by the statute, were claims made on the stipendiary clergy by private parties in virtue of tacks, gifts, or pensions. These might be ratified in parliament, but still were private rights. Not a word occurs in the act as to public taxes, of which indeed there existed none at that time which could be said to affect stipends. It is evident that the word "taxations," which in the statute is thrown along with tacks, pensions, and impositions, alludes only to burdens imposed on the stipends in favour of private parties, and was used just as the word "impositions" was used to exclude grants under forms that might have been pretended not to be tacks or pensions. That is demonstrated by the words following; [563] "notwithstanding of onie gift or disposition maid in the contrair." This shows it was only taxations or impositions by gift or disposition, that were contemplated, and it will not be said that a national revenue statute is a "gift or disposition." There is no doubt in what sense the word "taxation" is used in this statute, the context removing all ambiguity. The word may perhaps have been in other parts of the Statute-book applied to public taxes; but such was not its meaning in the statute 1593, chap. 166. The plaintiff is driven to contend, that under "gifts or dispositions," public statutes are included; and then he must contend, that the act 1593, was a law that ministers stipends should be free notwithstanding future public statutes made "in the contrair;" an attempt to annul, by prospective provision, future statutes. No legislature has power so to bind itself.

The acts of supply, 1665 and 1667, which grant certain exemptions to the clergy, do it not by reference to any pre-existing privilege, but in express words as a new enactment. Nor is the privilege given limited to the clergy, but extends to other classes, particularly the College of Justice. The poll taxes, which in one instance specially, and in others by general expressions, affect stipendiary ministers, may be regarded as taxes affecting stipend, and is one instance to disprove the existence of such a privilege. The expression of Mackenzie and Forbes, of whom even the former wrote at the distance of near a century from the statute 1593, and both of whom are very accurate writers, are much too loose to afford authority of any value; but [564] such as they are, they are by no means favourable to the plaintiff. In the other writers on Scotch Law, it is not said that any idea of such a privilege existing, or ever having existed, is to be found. There is therefore no reason to suppose it existed previously to the union. But if such a privilege had then been in existence, it must at that time have been taken away.

The treaty of union was made on the footing of equalizing as much as possible the privileges and advantages on the one hand, and the burden on the other hand, of each part of the United Kingdom. By the fourth article, as contained in the Scotch act of parliament ratifying the treaty, it was provided, "that all the subjects of the united kingdom of Great Britain shall, from and after the union, have full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation to and from any port or place within the said united kingdom, and the dominions and plantations thereunto belonging, and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges, and advantages, which do or may belong to the subjects of either kingdom, except where it is otherwise expressly agreed in these articles." Then follows Article V. equalizing the right of Scotland and England, in regard to ships. Then Article VI. equalizing the customs, but containing an express provision, "excepting and reserving the duties upon export and import of such particular commodities from which any persons, the subjects of either kingdom are specially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which after the Union, are to remain safe and entire to them in all respects as before the same." Article XIV. [565] "provides, that there be no further exemption insisted upon for any part of the united kingdom; but that the consideration of any exemption beyond what are already agreed on in this treaty, shall be left to the determination of the parliament of Great Britain." And Article XXV. the concluding article, provides "that all laws and statutes in either kingdom, so far as they are contrary to, or inconsistent with the terms of these articles, or any of them, shall, from and after the union, cease and become void, and shall be so declared to be by the respective parliaments of the said kingdom." Under these Articles XIV. and XXV. taken in connection with the others, it appears that, if a privilege of exemption from taxation of a public, not private nature, had existed in Scotland, it must necessarily have been held in fairness to be repealed. And this is the more strengthened by the consideration that in the act for securing the protestant religion, and presbyterian church government, there is no mention whatever made of any privilege of the Scotch clergy of this nature. It is plain therefore, that while a variety of privileges and exemptions, both public and private, are secured in the treaty of union by express reservation, no privilege of the sort contended for by the plaintiff is there mentioned. And therefore, if it had existed, it must in equity have been held to be taken away. But the true inference is, that no such privilege existed.

For the Plaintiff in error—Mr. Thomson, and Mr. Brougham.

For the Defendant in error—The Lord Advocate [566] (The Solicitor-General of Scotland), and Mr. Mackenzie.

In the course, and at the end of the argument, Lord Redesdale made the following observations:—

The glebe and manse are not mentioned in the act of 1593. The stipend issues out of the teinds; and the act 46 Geo. III. c. 65, directs the teinds to be assessed according to their value. The language of the act appears to be a little confused. In the printed case for the plaintiff in error, it is not insisted that there is a special exemption for the manse and glebe. It is put by way of argument, that the land-tax was never charged upon the manse and glebe. But that practice furnishes no inference as to the property-tax, which is of a different nature.

Lord Redesdale: *—Upon a fair construction of the statute 1593, it is impossible to hold that the clergy are thereby exempt from public taxes and impositions.

The recital of that statute states a grievance by "pensioners and tacksmen" having in tack, gift, or pension, the stipends of the ministers. This cannot be intended of collectors of taxes, and when it proceeds to recite that the acts of these "pensioners and tacksmen who have taken (the stipends) in tack, gift or pension," that clearly applies to some grant made in the form of tack, gift or pension. Upon the recital of this grievance, of charges at [567] tempted to be made upon the stipends, it is enacted, "that all ministers stipends in time coming be free from all tacks, pensions, tarations and impositions."

The word "taxation" in the enacting clause is peculiar.

In the construction of acts of parliament as of all instruments, where general

* Upon the hearing and moving judgment in this case the Lord Chancellor was absent; the C. J. of England was present at the hearing.

words are annexed to or follow particular words, they are taken to be of the same kind and meaning.

The words immediately following explain the sense in which the word "taxation" is used.

It is enacted that the clergy shall enjoy their stipends free from all tacks, etc. "notwithstanding any gift or disposition made to the contrary." This cannot be construed to allude to any public charge imposed by act of the legislature.

As to grants by the clergy in convocation, they could only bind the clergy who made the grants, not the portion allotted for stipends.

In Grier v. Mitchell,* there was some error in the verdict, and a venire facias de novo was ordered. The House of Lords thought it was a case of private right, and came under the reservation by the act of [568] union. There was no finding of the law in that case. In this case, if the stipend is exempt by virtue of the act of 1593, yet the minister is liable in respect of the manse and glebe. So far, the warrant for seizure was legal, and sufficient to justify the proceedings. The finding of the jury distinguishes between the manse, glebe and stipend, and the assessed taxes, and the defender in this action could not be found guilty. But I desire to have time to look into the acts, and to consider the case.

Lord Redesdale:—In a case of this description, where the decision affects a large body of persons, I was desirous to look minutely into the acts on which it depends.

It is immaterial to consider how the act of union might bear upon this subject. If the exemption claimed did not exist before that act, the provisions of that act cannot affect the question. The practice of not charging the stipendiary clergy of the church of Scotland, will not raise a right to exemption from charge.

What happened before the Reformation must be put out of consideration. Before the Reformation, the clergy, under the famous bull of Pope Boniface, claimed to be entirely exempt from all charges which they did not impose upon themselves. Pope Boniface carried the matter still farther, for he prohibited their imposing charges upon themselves without a licence from the pope. That prohibition was not much observed for some years before the Reformation, but it was the foundation of the exemptions claimed both in England and Scotland.

[569] After the Reformation, the whole character of the church was changed; for the exemptions which the clergy had before enjoyed, in respect of their spiritualities, upon that event ceased. At the time when episcopacy was restored in Scotland, the archbishops and bishops formed a part of the legislature of the country. They made to the king grants for themselves as in a separate state. The lords granted for their own body, including the freeholders, who were of the same estate as the titled lords; and the burgesses made a separate grant for themselves.

After the whole property of the church had been seized, two thirds were given back to the clergy, and one third was reserved by the Crown, out of which the stipends of ministers were to be provided. The revenue was charged upon the two thirds. It probably would have answered no purpose, in point of revenue, to have charged the remaining third, which was either in the Crown or applied in the payment of stipends.

It is impossible to apply the words of the statute, as contended for the plaintiff in error. The statute 1593, exempting stipends from taxation, does not relate to personal impositions on the clergy. There may be a doubt what particular taxation is intended.

It appears that stipends, issuing out of the third of the teinds, had been charged in various ways by acts of the Crown; that is the grievance which is to be prohibited in future; and all existing charges are annulled. The word "taxation," introduced in the midst of other words, cannot be extended in construction to all kinds of taxation. According to [570] the ordinary rules of construction, it must be understood in the same sense as the words with which it is coupled. Taxation in that clause must mean something of the same kind with those other things which are expressly and specifically prohibited. If this act has not the effect of exempting the clergy of Scotland from taxation of stipend, no such exemption is to be found in any other statutes. That in other respects the clergy have not been charged where other persons have been charged, furnishes no reason to extend the exemption to this case. Nor is there any ground to contend, that the words of the act imposing the property-tax are not sufficient to extend to the stipends of the clergy. By that act "tiths, stipend, annuities, and all profits whatsoever (ante, note, p. 556), are made chargeable. The party has been properly charged under the three acts specified. There can be no doubt as to the personal duties, and as to the other charges, I think the judgment ought to be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.*

* D. P. 27th April, 1814. The exemption claimed in this case was under an act of the Scottish Parliament, passed the 12th of July 1661, by which a coarse salt, worked and manufactured out of sea sand, by the poor inhabitants of Annandale, was exempted from the duties of excise. The proceeding was by information in the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, claiming a certain quantity of salt so made and seized as forfeited. The appellant claimed, and upon issue tried, a special verdict was given finding the facts. The Court of Exchequer, on argument, gave judgment for the respondents, and that judgment was reversed in the House of Lords.

* This question, as to the claim of the clergy to be a privileged order, in different ages of the law has been viewed in different lights. In early times, the general doctrine was, that spiritual persons, in respect of their benefices, were not chargeable as the laity, by charges imposed on the realm generally. Their goods were exempt from purveyance, 2 Inst. 3. And by the common law of England every parson was held to be free from the payment of tolls in all fairs and markets for all goods, etc. gotten upon or bought to be spent on their church livings. 2 Inst. 3; Reg. 260 a. So they are quit of pavage, pontage and murage (which were duties of the most universal obligation), and if they be distrained for, etc. may have a writ, etc. 2 Inst. 4; [571] Reg. Brev. 260 a.; F. N. B. 227. If the sheriff or collector of tenths or fifteenths distrained them in the lands belonging to their churches, they had a like writ to discharge them. Reg. Brev. 188 a.; Fitz. N. B. 176 a.

Statutes expressed in general words, were not held to extend to the clergy, as the statute of Winton, 13 Ed. 1.

Where a robbery was committed, and the hundred charged, though the words of the statute were gentes demorantes (all dwellers) yet the clergy were not held chargeable. See 2 Inst. 569; case of the Bishop of Coventry semb. contra. So the statute of highways, 2 and 3 Ph. and Mary, charges all householders, yet the clergy were held exempt. Again, the statute 33 Hen. 8. c. 2, empowers the justices to tax all "resiants" within the county where there is no gaol, etc. yet the clergy were formerly held not taxable. But in a case which occurred in the reign of Charles the Second, where a parson had brought an action of trespass against an officer who had taken his cows by way of distress under a warrant of a justice, and by authority of an act of the same reign, (22 Car. 2. c. 12.) requiring all parishioners keeping carts, etc. to assist in repairing the ways, it was held that he was a parishioner within the meaning of the act; and the court laid it down generally, that the clergy are liable to all public charges imposed by act of parliament; adding, that it had been so resolved (as Hale said) upon debate before all the Judges. So the case is reported by Ventris, 1 Vent. 273. According to the Reports of the same case by Keble, (3 Keb. 176. 507.) who states the trespass to have been by taking horses, and the plea in justification to have been under the 2 and 3 Phil. and Ma. c. 8. (which is enforced by 22 Car. 2. c. 12.) The words used by Hale were, "Parson is not exempt from any new charge for repairing highways; and by Hyde, C. J. in his Reports, P. 5. Ca. 1. there is no difference between clergy and laity in assesse for poor maimed soldiers or B. R.; but the dean and chapter and glebe must pay, and so resolved by all the Judges of England then, and so agreed by all the Judges now, being for constable rates and the like, and the parson of B. etc. was convicted on this very stat. of Ph. and Ma. for not sending his cart, about forty years since, and so the court conceived here." Levinz, who states the trespass to have been in taking beasts, (2 Lev. 132.) gives the words as used by Hale and [572] the court thus: "The new charges by statute, the lands of the church are subject (as other lands) unless they are excepted." Upon the stat. 22 Hen. 8. c. 5, for the repair of decayed bridges, as to the words "tax every inhabitant," Lord Coke observes, "By these words all privileges of exemptions and discharges whatsoever, from contribution, etc. are taken away, although the exemption were by act of parliament." 2 Inst. p. 701.

By the 43d Eliz. c. 2, clergymen are made liable to the poor rates for their glebe and tithes.

By the General Highway Act, 13 Geo. III. c. 78, s. 34, 35, 45, 46, they are expressly made liable, in respect of their tithes, etc. The 57th Geo. III. c. 99, s. 62 and 65, provides, that stipendiary curates, where the stipend appointed by the bishop equals the whole value of the benefice, and the curate is empowered to live in the parsonage, he shall be liable to all the same charges, deductions, taxes, parochial rates and assessments, as if he held the benefice.

This seems to be one of those cases in which the law has undergone a silent revolution. The general exemption of the clergy from public impositions, is acknowledged by the expression and implication of many statutes and decisions. But the privilege has ceased, in many instances, without legislative enactment, by the unseen progressive legislation of manners and opinions. The reasons for exemption as to matters of public taxation, imposed by the legislature, have been, no doubt, seriously affected by the disuse of convocations, in which the clergy were accustomed to assess their own contributions to the public charge of the state. Now they are taxed without representation as a distinct order of persons, but certainly not without vote or influence in the election of representatives.

SCOTLAND.

COURTS OF ADMIRALTY AND SESSION.

JAMES HUNTER & CO.,—Appellants: ARCHIBALD M'GOWN and others.—
Respondents [12th July 1819].

[Mews' Dig. viii. 79, 328. See now Merchant Shipping Act 1894, Part viii. s. 502 (i.) and Morewood v. Pollok, 1853, 1 E. & B. 743.]

The statute 26 Geo. III. c. 86, relates only to ships usually occupied in sea voyages, and not to small craft lighters and boats concerned in inland navigation.

A gabbert (Anglicè a lighter,) is not "a ship or vessel" within the meaning of the statute 26 Geo. III. c. 86, s. 2.—If goods on freight are shipped on board such a vessel and destroyed by fire accidentally, or through the negligence of the master, etc. the owners, etc. are not protected by that statute, but are responsible as at common law.

As to the general liability of carriers by the law of Scotland, Quære.

The respondents were owners of the gabbert Janet, a species of lighter navigated between Glasgow and the ports in the Clyde, and having a register in terms of the navigation act.

Upon the 7th day of January 1807, the appellants shipped, at Greenock, cotton wool on board the gabbert Janet, to the value of £1345 16s. 8d. for which they took the master's receipt, acknowledging the delivery in good condition, and obliging himself to deliver the same in Glasgow, "in like good order, danger of navigation excepted, on being paid customary freight."

By the regulations of the harbour of Greenock, the kindling of fire on board any vessel, while in the harbour, is prohibited under a penalty. Notwithstanding this regulation, the master of the Janet [574] (as it was alleged by the appellants,) kindled* a fire on board of her while in the harbour, which communicated to the vessel and her cargo. Part of the cotton wool was consumed, the remainder damaged; and a loss sustained of £572 17s. 2d.

For this sum, with interest and expenses, the appellants brought an action against the respondents, as owners of the gabbert, before the High Court of Admiralty. The Judge Admiral pronounced the following interlocutor: "Having advised, etc. finds, that the pursuers have condescended on no law, bye-law, fact, or circumstance which can have the effect of subjecting the owners of the gabbert or lighter in question, in any part of the damages pursued for: therefore in respect of the statute 26th of his present Majesty, cap. 86,* assolzies the said owners, finds them entitled to their expenses, and decerns." "Note.—This interlocutor has nothing to do with M'Gibbon, the master."

This judgment having been brought under the review of the Court of Session, the Lord Armadale, Ordinary, pronounced the following interlocutor: "Having considered the mutual memorials, and whole proceedings in the reduction, repels the reasons thereof; and in the suspension finds the letters orderly proceeded, and decerns: Finds expenses due, and appoints an account thereof to be given in." To this interlocutor his Lordship afterwards adhered. The Appellants having presented a petition, reclaiming against these several [575] interlocutors to the First Division of the Court, on the 16th May 1811 the following interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lords having heard this petition, refuse the prayer thereof, and adhere to the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary."

Against these interlocutors of the Judge Admiral on the 1st of January, 1808, of the Lord Ordinary on the 22d January, 14th February, and 7th March 1811, and against the interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session of the 16th May 1811, this appeal was presented to the House of Lords.

For the Appellants:—Mr. Wetherell, and Mr. Adam.

Carriers of goods by sea or land are bound to make good all loss or damage sustained on goods entrusted to them, unless such loss or damage is produced by the act of God, or the King's enemies.

It is argued that the loss claimed was occasioned by fire; and by the 26th of the King, cap. 86, owners of ships or vessels were exempted from loss arising from fire on board such ships or vessels. But it is plain, as well from the preamble as from the enacting clauses in the statute, that it is applicable to ships and vessels employed in general commerce, and not to craft employed in transporting goods upon canals and navigable rivers.

It requires a large capital to fit out a ship of considerable size for sea, and it was a great discouragement to invest money in this way, that when owners were, by accidental fire, deprived of their own property, they were liable to others for the value of such property as might at the time be on board their vessels. To remove this discouragement, which was [576] supposed to operate against the increase of our shipping, was the declared object of the Legislature in passing the statute in question, and similar motives have induced the Legislature to pass several other acts for the relief of ship owners. But had it been the intention of the Legislature to extend this statute to common carriers by water, the same policy must have induced them to extend it to carriers by land also; in so far as the fitting out a waggon of the first class, with a suitable team of horses, requires the investment of a larger sum of money, than fitting out a gabbert, flat, or lighter, of the first class; and the same observation applies to waggons and gabberts of smaller dimensions. When, however, it is considered how many millions worth of property is annually transported by means of inland navigation, and how very much the safety of that property depends upon the judicious selection of servants to conduct it, owing to the continual opportunities such men have of neglecting their duty, it can never be supposed, that if the legislature had intended to release, to so very great an extent, the responsibility of common carriers, it would have been left to courts of law to have made this out by implication.

If there was at any time room to doubt the intention of the legislature in passing the act, it is now removed; for in an act passed in the 53d Geo. III. cap. 159, for the farther relief of ship owners, and for amending the act of the 26th Geo. III. and in which the same precise terms are used to describe the persons for whose benefit the act is passed, it is expressly provided by "sec. 5th, that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, [577] to the owner or owners of any lighter, barge, boat, or vessel of any burden or description whatsoever, used solely in rivers or inland navigations, or any ship or vessel not duly registered according to law."

Although the act of the 26th Geo. III. had extended to the owners of gabberts or lighters, it would have been altogether inapplicable to the present case. For, as by the regulations of the harbour of Greenock, made under the authority of an act of parliament, the kindling of fire on board of vessels in the harbour is prohibited, there is therefore an implied contract between the owners and masters of all vessels, and the shippers of goods on board of such vessels, that fire shall not be unlawfully kindled, while such vessels remain in the harbour; and as the loss in the present case can be directly traced to the breach of this contract, the respondents would not be entitled to shelter themselves under an act of parliament, intended only to protect innocent sufferers from extraordinary loss by accidental fire.

* See the terms of the act, post, p. 576.

For the Respondents:—Sir Samuel Romilly, and Mr. ———

The defence is founded in this case entirely on the clause in the act of parliament of the 26th Geo. III. cap. 86, s. 2, which is an effectual bar to the appellants claim. This clause is in the following terms: "And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that no owner or owners of any ship or vessel shall be subject or liable to answer for, or make good to any one or more person or persons, any loss or damage which may happen to any goods or merchandize whatsoever, which from and [578] after the 1st day of September 1786, shall be shipped, taken in, or put on board of any such ship or vessel, by reason or means of any fire happening to or on board the said ship or vessel."

When the words of an act of parliament are ambiguous or equivocal, an inquiry may be made into the objects of the legislature in passing the act, for the purpose of ascertaining its meaning. But when the language of a statute is clear and intelligible, it is altogether incompetent to refuse effect to the enactment by reference to any supposed views of the legislature in making the law. In this instance it cannot be said that there is any ambiguity in the clause, unless the appellants can make out that a gabbert is not a ship or vessel.

The express object of the statute as set forth in the preamble, is, "to promote the increase of the number of ships and vessels, and to prevent any discouragement to merchants and others from being interested and concerned therein, which is likely to happen from the responsibility to which they are now exposed." It is clearly within the policy of the act, that the provision should extend to gabberts. It is certainly an object of policy to increase the number of such vessels. Seamen may be both trained and employed in such vessels. In truth, the men who navigate them, might be, and frequently have been, of the most essential service on the coast of the Clyde. Besides, an establishment of lighters is necessary to support the trade and business of larger vessels. And therefore it would be peculiarly inexpedient to impose such a responsibility on the owners of gabberts as would discourage them from [579] entering into this species of trade, and throw the transport of goods from place to place into the hands of land carriers.

In the next place, the owners of gabberts stand in as much need of this protection from the statute as the proprietors of larger vessels. If the act was intended, as it unquestionably was, to protect the owners of vessels from a heavy responsibility on account of the inattention and negligence of their servants, the benefit of it must be given to every owner whose vessel is not actually under his own charge. The accident by which a vessel is set on fire must always happen in a moment. But an owner residing in Glasgow, while his gabbert is in Greenock, Dumbarton, or at many miles distance from him, has plainly as little control over the master or crew as if the ship were in the West Indies.

The regulation of the magistrates of Greenock could not (in whatever terms it had been conceived) alter the enactments of a public statute: and, in the present case, merely imposed a small pecuniary penalty upon the master in case of non-observance.

The Lord Chancellor, after having stated the facts and the pleadings in this cause, as before set forth, proceeded thus:—

Several points were argued in this case: first, what was the law of Scotland with respect to the liability of carriers in general? In the next place, that whatever might be the liability of carriers in general, the regulations, with respect to the harbour of Greenock, which prohibited the kindling of any fire on board any vessel, would make the owner of [580] any gabbert liable, whatever might be the liabilities, according to the general law of Scotland. The decision proceeded expressly upon the supposition that the statute of the twenty-sixth of his present Majesty had exempted the owners of this sort of craft, as falling under the denomination of a vessel, from damages, in respect of the loss sustained. There was a great deal of argument at your Lordship's bar, upon the meaning of that statute of the 26th Geo. III. and after hearing that argument, it was conceived, that it was a case in which it might be proper to have the assistance of his Majesty's Judges, and to have it argued before them. The case has therefore stood over a considerable time; but it has been found utterly impossible, such is the pressure of business on the Judges in the Courts below, to procure their attendance upon this cause. I have, however, looked very anxiously into the acts of parliament on this subject, and I have had the assistance (though not of all the Judges,) of the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, who happens, in the course of his practice, to be particularly conversant with the meaning of this act of parliament, relating to ships and vessels, and I have no hesitation in saying, that I am of opinion, that that act of the twenty-sixth of his Majesty, cap. 86, relates only to ships and vessels usually occupied in sea voyages, and that it is not an act of parliament which gives protection in case of small craft, lighters, and boats, and so on, concerned in inland navigation. The result is, (if that is a right opinion, and I really do not entertain any doubt about it), that if the judgment in the Court below has proceeded upon the supposition that this [581] statute protected the persons against whom the claim of damages was made, from being liable as owners of a gabbert, in that respect this judgment must be considered erroneous.

There remains behind, the question, what is the extent and nature of the liability of Scotch carriers? Our law, with respect to English carriers, cannot decide that, nor the point how far the regulations of this particular harbour of Greenock, would make the master or owner of a vessel liable. It appears to me that the right course will be, to find that the gabbert or lighter called the Janet, mentioned in the pleadings in this cause, is not to be considered a ship or vessel, within the intent and meaning of the statute of 26th Geo. III. cap. 86, and with that finding, to refer the cause to the Court of Session, to review the interlocutors complained of, and to do what is just and right, consistent with this finding; that will enable the Court of Session to find, whether, by the law of Scotland independent of this statute, or any regulation relating to the harbour of Greenock, it will come to a different result.

Die Lunae, 12 Julii 1819.

The Lords find, that the gabbert or lighter, the Janet, mentioned in the pleadings in this cause, is not to be considered as being a ship or vessel, within the intent and meaning of the statute of the twenty-sixth of his present Majesty, cap. 86. And it is ordered, That with this finding, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to review the interlocutors complained of, and to do therein as may be just, and as is consistent with this finding.

ENGLAND.

IN ERROR FROM THE COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

WILLIAM EYRE.—Plaintiff in Error; THE GOVERNOR AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND,—Defendants in Error [8th July 1819].

[See Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, ss. 9, 57.]

In actions upon bills of exchange, containing counts in contract upon the bills, and a separate count for interest, not expressed to be by contract, but apparently sounding in damages, if the plaintiff obtain interlocutory judgment upon demurrer to the replication, it is not necessary that the damages should be assessed by a jury. The Court, on motion of course, may refer it to the Master to compute, or without reference may itself compute the damages in respect of interest; and the plaintiff may enter up judgment, upon the respective counts in contract and for interest, without remittitur as to the excess of the aggregate sums laid in those counts beyond the sum of principal and interest computed, and for which he enters up judgment.

This was an action brought in the Court of King's Bench by the defendants in error, against the plaintiff in error, upon two bills of exchange. The declaration consisted of seven counts: the first, on a bill of exchange for the sum of £973 4s.; the second, on a bill of exchange for the sum of £1278 13s. 6d.; the third count was indebitatus assumpsit for £2500 for money lent and advanced; the fourth, indebitatus assumpsit for £2500 for money [583] paid, laid out and expended; the fifth, indebitatus assumpsit for £2500 for money had and received; the sixth, indebitatus assumpsit for £300 for interest; and the last, indebitatus assumpsit for £2500 for money due on the balance of an account stated. The defendants in error obtained interlocutory judgment in the Court below, on demurrer to the replication; and after an assessment made under a reference to the Master by order of the Court below, and without the intervention of a jury, entered up judgment, on the first, second and six counts, for the sum of £2299 9s. 3d. damages, and £56 0s. 9d. costs, remitting all damages on the third, fourth, fifth and last counts of the declaration. Against this judgment a writ of error was brought upon the following grounds; first, that the different sums claimed by the two first and sixth counts of the declaration, upon which the judgment was taken, amounted to the sum of £2551 17s. 6d. whereas the judgment was only taken for £2299 9s. 3d. leaving a sum of £252 8s. 3d. parcel of the several sums claimed by the said two first and sixth counts of the said declaration, without any adjudication whatever; whereas the defendants in error (the plaintiffs in the Court below) ought either to have taken judgment for the whole of the sums mentioned in the three counts upon which they have taken judgment, or have entered a remittitur as to the balance, as they have done as to the third, fourth, fifth and last counts of the declaration, or have released such balance: so that if this judgment be not erroneous, there is nothing to prevent the defendants in error from bringing a new action for [584] the sum of £252 8s. 3d. and subjecting the plaintiff in error to the costs of such new action. Secondly, that as the sixth count of the declaration is not founded upon any written instrument or express contract, but sounds in damages only, such damages ought to have been assessed by a jury, and that the Court below had no authority to assess the same without the consent of the plaintiff in error, the defendant in the Court below.

For the Plaintiff in error, Mr. Denman.

Every judgment given in a court of law ought to be final and conclusive between the parties, as to all matters which appear to be in dispute, and claimed by the party suing in the action in which such judgment is given; but the judgment given in this case in the Court below is not final and conclusive as to the matters which appear, by the pleadings in this cause, to have been in dispute between the parties in this suit; but on the contrary, a sum of £252 8s. 3d. which appears to have formed part of the matters in dispute between the parties in this cause, remains undisposed of by the judgment.

Although the Court below might have assessed damages on the two first counts of the declaration, they being and appearing to be upon contract by written instruments, and for the payment of specific sums of money, it had no power to assess damages of its own authority, and without the intervention of a jury, upon the count of the declaration which sounds entirely in damages.

[585] For the Defendants in error, Mr. James Parke and Mr. Winter.

The count for interest may be by contract, for any thing that appears in the declaration. The question is, whether the Court below has the power to assess damages for interest without inquiry by a jury? That they have such power generally, appears by many authorities; inquiry is only to inform the conscience of the Court. The plaintiff in error confounds the power with the practice of the Court. In Holdipp v. Otray, 2 Saund. 106, it was decided to be the course of the King's Bench, in an action of debt, where the plaintiff has judgment by default or confession, to tax the damages for the detention of the debt, as well as the costs, and that interest may be included in the damages. In the note to that case by Serjeant Williams, the subsequent authorities are collected; and upon the ground of those authorities the practice has been established. The last case was in the Exchequer Chamber, 4 Term Rep. 148, Gould v. Hammersley. Upon interlocutory judgments, the Court will grant an order of reference to the Master to compute interest, in cases similar to the present.

In reply: The defendants in error might have had damages for interest; they need not have taken judgment on the count for interest, or they might have entered a remititur on that count.

During the argument the Chancellor expressed some doubts as to the practice, and put the following [586] case: Suppose the declaration had consisted of one count for £100 for interest only,* and after non assumpsit pleaded, there had been judgment by default, could the damages in such case have been assessed by the officer of the Court? The counsel for the defendant in error answered, that in such case the Court might refer it to the officer to compute the interest.

On the 8th of July 1819 the judgment of the King's Bench was affirmed, without observation.

[587] The first ground assigned for error was but slightly noticed in the argument for the plaintiff in error, and the counsel for the defendants in error merely asserted that there could be no remititur.

The principal and interest, for which judgment is entered up, exceed the amount of the sums laid in the two first counts. If, therefore, the damages for interest could not be taken under the general breach, at the close of the declaration, (which was not suggested in argument,) and if the Court had no power to assess damages on the count for interest, the course, it seems, would have been to enter a nolle prosequi upon the count for interest, and a remititur of all damages assessed beyond the amount laid in the two first counts.† But the Court having power to assess damages on the count for interest, then it is similar to the common case, where the jury give less than the damages laid in the declaration, in which case no remititur is ever entered for the excess. It is only in cases where the jury give larger damages than the plaintiff has claimed by his count, that a remititur is required, as ‡ where damages were laid at £10 in the declaration, and the verdict was for £13, the judgment was reversed: But the Court said, that if the plaintiff had released the excess of damages beyond the sum laid in the declaration, and entered up judgment accordingly, that would have been good.§ So where several damages were assessed against the defendants, it was held in judgment that the plaintiff might enter a remititur, or take judgment de melioribus damnis, which operates as an election of the greater and waiver of the lesser damages.||

[588] The second point was argued, and apparently decided upon the authority of Holdipp v. Otway, and the precedents cited in the note to that case by the late learned editor of Saunders. But the jurisdiction asserted in that case and the

* See the dictum in the Anon. case, 1 Ventr. 330. (cited post. 599.) which seems to warrant the doubt expressed by the Lord Chancellor, unless the practice can be sustained upon something less available than the extensive authority of ancient precedents. The certainty of the demand is the criterion suggested by that case. Upon the ground (as stated in the report), the Court in that case observed, that the damages being uncertain, could not be set in a court of equity, but by a jury; and as to their own powers to assess damages on judgment by default, they took a distinction between actions of debt, where the demand is certain, and actions of trespass or upon the case, where the matter lies wholly in damages. In the former case they said the Court had such power, but not in the latter.

If, therefore, the action, in the case put by the Lord Chancellor, can be said to lie wholly (i.e. substantially) in damages, the Court, according to the authority of this precedent, has no power to assess the damages. If it is in a technical sense only nominally, and not substantially, that the action is said to lie in damages, being in fact in the nature of an action of debt (in deb. assumpsit) for a sum certain, or which becomes certain by mere computation, then the power of the Court is founded upon the certainty of the demand, as contradistinguished from a demand which lies wholly in damages.

notes, is much larger than required for the decision of the case now reported, and extends far beyond the modern practice of the Courts. According to that case and the notes, the Court has unlimited power in actions of trespass and assumpsit, as well as covenant and debt, where judgment is taken upon demurrer, by default, confession, etc. to assess the damages, with the assent of the plaintiff, if they think fit. The writ of inquiry is said to be merely gratuitous, to inform the conscience of the Court, and the Judges may dispense with that information, from pre-knowledge or other cause, or at discretion. This doctrine is rested upon ancient authorities, which if now to be considered as law, warrant the proposition to the full extent in which it is stated, and other authorities are not wanting to carry the doctrine to the extreme of uncontrolled jurisdiction, as to the power of assessing damages without the interference of a jury in all actions where the defendant does not take issue on the facts and conclude to the country, and in cases of assault, mayhem and trespass, of increasing and abridging damages after a verdict.

In the argument for the defendant in error, the practice of the Courts is said to be confounded with their power. The proposition is a little obscure; but it may be conjectured from the authorities cited in the argument, that it was intended to intimate, that the powers of the Courts are much more extensive than might be supposed, from the limits within which the Judges have in practice bounded their jurisdiction. It is therefore highly material to ascertain the boundaries of these dormant powers, as they are supposed to exist upon the authority of ancient precedents. If the cases cited in the note to Hollipp v. Otway, as suggested by the argument, are [589] authorities for the power as distinguished from the practice, then in trespass for breaking and entering a dwelling-house, accompanied with circumstances of great aggravation,* where judgment passess by default, or confession, or upon demurrer, the Courts have power to assess the damages; and if they have such power in trespass, there seems to be no reason why the power should not be universal.

The law of England, where it is not regulated by statute, stands upon the decisions of the Courts; and it is a point of the highest consequence to the subject, to be able to distinguish, among ancient precedents, which have the force and authority of law, and which have fallen into abeyance by disuse.

The practice of the Courts is adapted to the convenience of suitors, and is perfectly understood. But it is suggested that there is a latent undefined power, not to be confounded with, and therefore not controlled or abrogated by this practice. If such a power exists, it may be exercised. It is therefore expedient for those who are concerned in the administration of justice, to inform themselves as to the extent of this impending power, and the authorities upon which it rests.

In Hollipp v. Otway, an action of debt was brought upon a bill obligatory. Error was assigned, that the Court had taxed damages, on occasion of the detention of the debt; but it was decided, that upon a judgment in debt by default, such damages might be so taxed with the assent of the plaintiff. The cases cited by the learned editor are, Bruce v. Rawlins, 3 Wils. 61, 62, which contains the dict. of Wilmot, C. J. on judgment by default in trespass for breaking, etc.; Hewitt v. Mantell, 2 Wils. 372-4, dict. of same Judge upon assumpsit; Thelluson v. Fletcher, Doug. 316, dict. of Buller, J. as to actions upon covenant for payment of a sum certain; Blackmore v. Fleming, 7 T. R. 446-7, where in an action of debt, Lawrence, J. [590] said it was at the option of the plaintiff to refer it to the Prothonotary to tax interest by way of damages, or to have a writ of inquiry of damages; Roe v. Apsley, 1 Sid. 442; where upon a judgment of debt, after some doubts raised by the Chief Justice, an order was made in the Court of Common Pleas, referring it to the Secondary without a writ of inquiry to tax damages; 11 H. 7. 5, 6; Bro. Default, 105; 1 Roll. Abr. 571-3; Ognell's case, 3 Leon. 213; and in actions on the case upon promissory notes, where judgment passed by default, Rashleigh v. Salmon, 1 H. Blac. 252; Andrews v. Blake, Ib. 529; Longman v. Fenn, Ib. 541; and Shepherd v. Charter, 4 T. R. 575, where the same practice prevailed.

These are the cases cited in the note upon Hollipp v. Otway, and they seem to be confirmed by dicta and practice in other cases.

In the case of Sir Francis Goodwin v. Welsh and Over, Yelv. 151, upon a declaration in trespass for goods taken, concluding for damages, non sum informatus pleaded, and judgment for plaintiff, the damages were assessed by a jury upon writs of inquiry; and upon motion to prevent filing the writ, because the property in the goods was not proved on the inquiry, the Court held that the value only was material to be proved, according to the requisition of the writ; and they added, that they themselves as Judges, if they so pleased in these cases, might assess damages without directing any writ of enquiry, for the writ issued only quia nescita quae damna; but if the Judges will trouble themselves with the assessment of damages, they have the power to do so.

* See Bruce v. Rawlins, 3 Wils. 61, 62, post. 591.

So in actions of debt on a judgment, and for damages pro detentione debiti, the jury or the Court assess interest on the sum recovered by the first judgment, up to the time of the judgment in the new action; as in equity it is computed to the time when it is supposed the Master's report will be confirmed.

In Mallory v. Jennings, Fitzg. 162. it was held that [591] the omission of a writ of inquiry after judgment by default, was cured by the statute for the amendment of the law 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 2. See also the Year Books, 14 H. 4. 9; 3 H. 6. 29; 19 H. 6. 10; Green v. Heurne, 3 T. R. 301; 2 Stra. 1145; Dufroy v. Johnson, 7 T. R. 473.

According to these authorities, consisting of decisions as to the action of debt, and the dicta of Judges in cases of trespass and other actions, the power of the Courts, as distinguished from their practice, appears to extend to actions of assumpsit and trespass, as well as debt for a sum certain.

In Bruce v. Rawlins, (which is one of the cases cited in the note to Holdipp v. Otway), the action was for a violent trespass committed by custom-house officers, who wantonly entered the house of the plaintiff, broke open his boxes and drawers, and caused great alarm to his wife and family. After a verdict upon a writ of inquiry, application was made by the defendant for a new writ. Upon that occasion, Wilmot, C. J. said, "This is an inquest of office to inform the conscience of the Court, who, if they please, may themselves assess the damages."

If this dictum is not to be questioned, the power must be still further distinguished from the practice; for by other cases, not cited in the note to Holdipp v. Otway, nor in the argument of the case now reported, but of equal efficacy in point of authority as precedents, the jurisdiction is extended to almost every species of civil action; and if the authority of old cases will justify the exercise of such a power, similar authorities might warrant the exercise of powers by the Courts to diminish or increase damages after a writ of inquiry executed, and even after a verdict given by a jury upon trial of an issue.

The early reports furnish many precedents to show that damages assessed upon a writ of inquiry may be increased or abridged at the pleasure of the Court. Two reasons are given—First, "For that as the Justices might [592] have awarded damages without the writ of inquiry, the inquisition thereupon is nothing more than an inquest of office for their information."—Secondly, Because an action of attainder does not lie against the jury on account of the damages assessed upon a writ of inquiry. 14 H. 4. 9; 3 H. 6. 29; Bro. Abr. Dam. pl. 7; 19 H. 6. 10.

Upon the same principles it was held, that if the plea be sent to be tried in a foreign county, damages might be increased by the Court, because the jury there have not full knowledge of the fact. 1 Rol. 572. l. 50. So in account, 10 H. 6. 24 b. and in debt upon obligation, 1 Roll. Abr. 572. l. 50. It was held also, 1 Rol. 573. l. 5, that where the Court may assess damages without a writ of inquiry, they may increase them after a writ of inquiry, upon demurrer, or judgment by default, or upon the view of any Justice of the Court in petis, 1 Rol. 572. l. 22; and where they can increase, they may mitigate damages. 1 Rol. 572. l. 25, 28; 573. l. 7.

These doctrines, and most of the examples of the power of the Court to increase and diminish damages, are collected and stated by C. B. Comyns, in his Digest, tit. Damages, as existing law. In other sections of the same title (Damages, E. 1 and 2) he states the law (so far as appears, upon his own authority or experience,) with this distinction:—"In all cases where the issue is tried by a jury, and damages are recoverable, the damages ought regularly to be assessed by a jury; if they do it not where damages *only are recoverable, the verdict shall be void; but where there is judgment without any issue tried, damages shall be assessed by the Court, or by a writ of inquiry." In the doctrine, as thus qualified by Comyns, it does not distinctly appear how far it is in the option of the Court either to issue the writ of inquiry, or in every species of action where there is judgment without issue tried, to assess the damages themselves.

In actions for battery, amounting to mayhem or tres-[593]-pass for a great wound, and even common trespass, the Courts not only after assessment upon a writ of inquiry, but even after a verdict limiting the damages, have exercised a power of abridging or increasing the damages. Their powers, therefore, as distinguished from their practice, if ancient authority stands unaffected by disuse, is much more extensive than the argument for the defendant in error supposed or contemplated.

In Jones's Rep. B. R. 183, it was held that the Judges, even of inferior Courts, have the power to increase the damages upon a view of mayhem; although Justices at Nisi Prius were held to have no such power. 1 Roll. Abr. 573. pl. 1. In a series of cases, extending from the Year Books to the reign of Geo. II. it was held, that the Judges of the superior Courts, having before them a certificate of the evidence indorsed upon the postea by the Judge before whom the issue was tried, and upon report, if tried, by one of the Judges of the Court, and a view of the wound, may increase the damages assessed by the jury; Bro. Dam. pl. 47; 1 Roll. Abr. 572. pl. 8; Cook v. Beal, Ld. Raym. 177; and even without view, if a Justice of the Court in which the action is depending has had a view and reports. Bro. Dam. 49; 1 Roll. Abr. 572. pl. 9.

It is said also, admitting that the Court have no direct power yet even in trespass, if the damages assessed by the jury are excessive, the Court may stay judgment until the plaintiff enters a remittitur as to part, or releases them, and reduces the damages to a reasonable sum. Bro. Dam. pl. 7; Bro. Judges. pl. 22; and the Year Books, qua supra.

In a great variety of other cases, the Courts have exercised the power, directly or indirectly, of reducing or increasing the damages after inquiry, or verdict by a jury. In trespass for taking goods after verdict for £20 they increased them to £40. 1 Roll. Abr. 572. pl. 1. So in cases of mayhem, the power has been exercised frequently, and without hesitation; as in 1 Roll. Abr. 573, upon appeal of mayhem, the damages assessed by the [594] Jury at 20 marks, were, upon view and information of surgeons, increased to £100. In another action, the verdict being for £18 at the day in Bank, the plaintiff showed the mayhem in Court, and prayed an increase of damages; and they were increased to £40. Bro. Dam. pl. 86; 39 Ed. 3, 20. In trespass for cutting off a right hand, the damages upon view were increased from £50 to £100. Tripcony's case, Dyer, 105. For a thumb cut off, they were increased from £40 to £100. Mallet v. Ferrers, 1 Leon. 139. In trespass for a wound in the hand, upon affidavit of a surgeon, and certificate of the Judge who tried the cause, that it was the same wound as alleged and proved at the trial, the damages were increased. Latch, 223. For a broken arm the Court refused to increase the damages, because the manner of the beating was not set out. Sty. 345. So it is said, unless the Judge certifies, or there is proof that the wound is the same for which the action is brought, the Court may refuse. 1 Sid. 308. But where battery and mayhem were alleged, though the manner not set out, the damages were increased from 10s. to £40. Hardres, 408, by Hale, C. J. For the loss of two fingers, upon a view, the damages were increased from £5 to £100. Freeman, 173. The Court refused to increase the damages, where the word maihemavit was omitted in the declaration. 1 Vent. 327. Semb. contra Hard. 408. But the doctrine was overruled in Cook v. Beal, 1 Ld. Raym. 176, where it was said to be sufficient, if, by the description, the wound appears to amount to mayhem, or even if it amount to a corporal hurt which is apparent. In that case it is stated that the plaintiff had nearly lost the sight of one of his eyes.

The most modern case, in which such a power has been exercised, is Burton v. Baynes, Barnes, 153. It was an action for an assault, battery and mayhem. On the trial a verdict was given for the plaintiff, damages £11 14s. In Mich. term, 7 Geo. II. the Court was moved to [595] increase the damages. A rule to show cause was granted, and upon view of the party, examination of a surgeon, ore tenus in open Court, and hearing counsel on both sides, the damages were increased by the Court to £50. In Theale v. Faughan, 1 Wilson, 5. 16 Geo. II. upon a similar application in a similar action, the Court refused to increase the damages; but Lee, C. J. said, "There is no doubt the Court can increase the damages in this case upon view of the party maimed."

These are decisions and dicta too recent, perhaps, to permit us to consider the law as entirely obsolete or abrogated by disuse: and in a recent book of practice, (Tidd, p. 903.) which the practitioners at common law are accustomed to quote, (and justly) with the highest respect, this doctrine, as to the power of the Court to increase the damages upon a view, etc. in mayhem, is stated as existing and unabrogated law. The counsel, for the defendant in error, in arguing the case now reported, seem to have had in theory some sort of basis to ground their suggestions as to the powers of the Court, since decisions upon this head, and judicial assertions of law, are yet standing unimpeached on the records of the Courts, and no otherwise affected as rules of law, than by modern disuse, and the adoption of a new practice.

If ancient authorities, therefore, selected partially or taken promiscuously, are to decide what are the powers of Judges to assess, abridge or increase damages, those powers, according to theory and former practice, appear to be alarmingly extensive; for the decisions above cited show that the Court, or a Judge, in the special cases stated, after a writ of inquiry, or after trial and verdict, may, upon examination and view, without further trial or a new writ of inquiry, increase the damages assessed upon the former trial or inquiry. The law is undoubtedly so existing, if ancient authority and assertion of authority are sufficient to sustain such a jurisdiction, or unless it can be maintained that those authorities are contradicted by better precedents, either of decisions upon the [596] points at issue in those cases, or principles stated by the Judges who decided them; or finally, unless those extraordinary powers have been abridged by contrary practice or lost by disuse.

If we are to consider the practice as distinguished from and controlling the power, the jurisdiction of the Courts to assess damages, has, for a great length of time, been confined to cases where the demand of the plaintiff in the action is certain, or depending upon a mere computation of figures. In all other cases damages are assessed upon writ of inquiry, where the defendant does not take issue on the facts. Where by the form of pleading, the action is brought to a trial, and a verdict given; from the reign of George the 2d, (and early in that reign) it has been the practice of the Courts to grant a new trial if the damages appear to be excessive; and where the damages are alleged to be too small, it is said to be a settled rule with the Courts not to grant a new trial, except under very special circumstances, as mistake of law by the sheriff or jury, miscalculation, etc. See Mauricet v. Brecknock, Doug. 494; Markham v. Middleton, 2 Stra. 1259; Woodford v. Eades, 1 Stra. 125. 1 Chitty's Rep. 644. and 729; 2 Chit. 219. In the course of the last ninety years, there is no recorded instance of any exercise of power by the Courts to increase or abridge the damages assessed by a jury upon verdict or writ of inquiry. And in a modern case, the Court of King's Bench has refused to alter verdict to increase the damages in respect of interest upon a promissory note. Du Belloy v. L. Waterpark, 1 Dowl. and Ryl. 16.

How far the authority of ancient decisions has been affected by desuetude, it might be hazardous to assert. The decisions in The King v. Woolff, 2 B. and A. and other recent cases which might be cited, are sufficient to show that mere disuse furnishes no ground to infer that ancient decisions are obsolete. Contrary practice, and the frequent refusal of the Courts to exercise the powers, put the matter on a different footing.

[597] If neither disuse, nor long practice, nor the self-denial of the Courts, has been sufficient to affect the right to exercise these singular powers, it becomes expedient to examine the precedents upon the authority of which the right is supposed to rest, and the power as distinguished from the practice of the Courts.

The decisions are various in their character, and to a certain extent, inconsistent with each other. The question then occurs, whether any consistent principle of jurisdiction can be extracted from the decisions, notwithstanding this apparent discordance. The doctrine that the Court, with the assent of the plaintiff, has the power to assess the damages where there is judgment upon demurrer, by confession, default, etc. seems to rest upon a principle of pleading. In the case of judgment by default, as the defendant does not, by pleading to issue upon the facts, appeal to the decision of a jury, he is supposed to acknowledge, or not to controvert, the demand of the plaintiff, as stated in his declaration: and when he takes issue upon the law, i. e. demurrer, he admits the facts, and among the rest the damages laid in the declaration, to the whole of which, in theory of law, the plaintiff may be considered as entitled. But if the plaintiff assents to a fair estimation of his damage (which by many authorities is held to be an indispensable condition), the Court may assess the damages by their own judgment, or direct a writ of inquiry to issue. This is stated to be the conclusion of law, where the defendant confesses the action. 1 Roll. Abr. 578, pl. 6, referring to 29 Ed. 3. 13: Bro. Dam. pl. 25. So it is laid down by ancient authorities, that if there be judgment upon demurrer the justices may award damages without a writ of inquiry. Bro. Dam. pl. 194, referring to 14 H. 4. 39, 40. And upon a plea in justification of a rescous, damages to a certain amount having been alleged in the declaration, judgment was given for the plaintiff upon demurrer to the plea, the Court deciding that the plaintiff [598] was entitled to the damages alleged, because the defendant did by his plea confess the trespass, and did not deny the damages to be as alleged. 1 Rolle's Abr. 578, pl. 1. 5: 21 Ed. 3. 4 b. and 40 b. In some cases, however, the Courts, even in ancient times, have refused to act upon this principle, where the action was of such a nature as to make the claim of the plaintiff to damages a matter of opinion. See Bro. Dam. 55, 56. This principle of pleading seems, therefore, by the authority of many cases, to have been so far qualified, that the plaintiff was compelled by the Courts to waive his theoretical damages in cases where the inquiry and compensation were matter of opinion, and to submit the estimation of the real damage suffered to the decision of a jury, or the judgment of the Court.

Upon a careful examination of the ancient precedents, it will be found, that with the exception of the cases of assault, battery and mayhem, the jurisdiction of the courts to assess damages in actions where the damages are uncertain, has been exercised with much doubt and hesitation: and the right to such jurisdiction has not, unfrequently, been denied by the Judges.

Notwithstanding some decisions and many sayings to the contrary, it might, perhaps, without much hazard, be asserted, that the sound principle to be extracted from the best of the old authorities is, that the certainty or uncertainty of the plaintiff's demand, arising out of the nature of his declaration, and appearing upon the record as to the amount of damages, are the true tests by which the question is to be decided, whether the Court may assess the damages, or whether the case must be referred to a jury. That such a principle existed and was acknowledged in early times, appears distinctly exemplified by the following cases.

In the Year Book, 10 H. 6. 24 b. 84, it is said, damages may be increased by the Court, where the principal demand is certain, as in account; so in debt upon an obligation [599] where the deed is denied. 1 Roll. 572; 14 H. 4. 19 b.

In an action of debt for foreign money, which was averred to be of a certain value, a verdict was given for the plaintiff, but no damages were assessed. The Court awarded a writ of inquiry: and gave, as their reason, that the value of foreign money is no more known to the Justices than the value of twenty quarters of wheat would be. But they said, that if the action had been for money current, they might have awarded damages without a writ of inquiry, the value of current money being known to them. Bagshaw v. Playn, Cro. Eliz. 536.

In another case, (Anon. 4 Ventr. 330.) where application was made to the King's Bench for a prohibition to restrain proceedings in the Marches by English bill, to recover upon the promise of the defendant to pay the debt of a stranger, being in the nature of an action upon the case; notwithstanding a custom alleged, and the reservation of such customs by the stat. 33 H. 8. the prohibition was granted, upon the ground that where damages are uncertain, they cannot be set in a Court of Equity, but by a jury; and upon that occasion it was said by the Court, that if there be judgment by default in an action of debt, the Court, as the demand is certain, does sometimes award damages without a writ of inquiry, but never in actions of trespass or upon the case, because these two actions will lie wholly * in damages.

* See Comyns Dig. quâ supra, p. 592.

So it has been decided, that in all actions where the demand of the plaintiff is certain, as an action of debt, the damages assessed by the jury, who tried the issue joined in the action, may be increased by the Court. Bro. Dam. pl. 137, 139; Bro. Costs, pl. 28.

In Thorngate v. Reeve, 29 and 30 Eliz. B.R. cited in a note to Dyer, 105 a. it is said, if in debt on bond, etc. the jury give no damages, the Court may assess the [600] damages, because the debt is certain and the plaintiff's loss apparent.

In other cases where the demand was uncertain, the power of the Court to assess damages has been denied upon the same principle.

In a case of local trespass the power of the Court was denied. 27 H. 8. 2.* So where the Court has not certain knowledge of the cause by the record or other apparent matter, as in an action for slander, though the defendant justify, it was held that the Court could not increase damages. 1 Roll. 572, K. 2. D. 2. Ma. 105. 15. So in trespass for trees cut. Id. 572, K. 13; 3 H. 4. 4;* 1 Brownl. 204. So in replevin. 3 Leo. 213. Ognell's case,* where the Court take the distinction, by declaring that for the avowant they might assess damages without a writ of inquiry, because it is for delay in nonpayment of rent: but for the plaintiff in replevin, they said they could not do so, since he is to recover for the taking of his cattle, of which the Judges could take no notice: for the damages might be greater or less, according to the value of the cattle, and the circumstances of the taking and delaying them.

In Bro. Abr. Dam. pl. 40; 3 H. 4. 4. it is suggested, that in trespass for cutting trees there is no direct power in the Court to increase or abridge damages, because the Court cannot come at a certain knowledge of the damages; and upon this principle the Court refused to increase the damages in trespass for cropping trees. So it is said that damages upon verdict cannot be increased or abridged by the Court, for that the remedy is by attain. Bro. Abr. Dam. pl. 7. In some cases, however, it appears that the Court did not adhere to the principle with perfect consistency, or being aware of a defect of authority, they resort to contrivance, and assert a power to directly to compel the plaintiff to remit part of his damages, by refusing to give judgment but upon the terms of reduce-[601]-tion, if in the opinion of the Court the jury have given excessive damages. Bro. Abr. Judges, pl. 22. The right, however, to exercise such powers, as sometimes assumed by the Courts, has frequently been denied (obviously upon the ground of uncertainty) in actions upon the case for words, as well as other actions. Jenk. Cent. 68,* pl. 29; Dyer, 105, Bonham v. Lord Stourton; Harkins v. Sciety,* Pabner, 314; and in Tong v. Formaby, E. 43 Eliz. B.R. the Court refused to increase damages in an action for trover and conversion; Sayer, 77; but they said it would have been otherwise if it had been of money, the value of which is known to the Court.

In modern cases the principle has been more distinctly avowed.

In Robinson v. Bland, after argument upon special verdict, interest was given by the Court up to the time of the judgment, the action being upon a contract for repayment of a sum certain. So upon judgment by default, in an action of covenant upon a deed of indemnity, the Court considering that it was not a mere question of computation, because the defendant might, before the sheriff and jury, show satisfaction or part satisfaction of the debt, from securities and effects of the principal, the reference to the Master was refused, and a writ of inquiry awarded. Denison v. Mair, 14 East, 622.

Among the ancient authorities, being so numerous and so little consistent,† if those last selected may be considered as furnishing the true principle of jurisdiction, the cases cited in the note to Holdipp v. Otray tend to establish a doctrine with too much latitude; for if the Courts have now power to assess damages in an action of trespass for a forcible entry into a house, and illegal outrage committed by officers of the revenue, according to the precedent cited in the notes to that case, there seems to be no reason why they should not assess damages in [602] actions for assault, libel, slander, or criminal conversation, nor why the doctrine founded on the principles of pleading should not prevail, that when judgment passes after demurrer, confession, default, etc. the plaintiff is entitled to the full damages laid in his declaration. In such case he may choose to retain them without inquiry, (for it is only with his assent that the Court can interfere,) although it were in an action for words, and £10,000 are claimed for damages by the count.

* See these Cases inserted at the end of this Note, at large.

It seems, therefore, a point of some doubt whether the power can now with propriety be distinguished from the practice of the Courts, and whether, on the principles avowed in the best of the ancient authorities, the power ought not to be confounded or identified with that practice.

The decision in the case now reported, as no observation was made in giving judgment, might be supposed to proceed upon the authorities cited in the argument for the defendant in error, and to establish the unqualified proposition advanced or suggested in that argument, or to be inferred from the authorities on which it rested. But in ex parte Greenway, 1 Buck. 418, the Lord Chancellor, in the course of his observations, is reported to have said, "During the late sessions (1819) there was a very learned argument before the House of Lords, in which it was clearly made out, by the authority of cases of great antiquity, that a Judge, where it is a matter of mere computation, may give interest, but yet such interest is in the nature of damages." In this observation, the Lord Chancellor, with that circumspect discretion which is the consummation of his great legal erudition, seems to limit the generality of the proposition within the narrow compass of actual practice. But the authorities as they were cited, and the inevitable result of the argument for the defendant in error in the case reported, is to establish a much broader position.

The extent of jurisdiction which belongs to the several Courts is a subject of most important inquiry; and it is [603] highly material to ascertain to what extent the doctrine in question is applicable or may be carried. Ancient authorities ought to be equally binding in all cases where they are not abrogated by contrary decisions. If the precedents cited in the argument of the case reported, and other similar precedents of equal authority, are to furnish the rule of law, and fix the boundaries of jurisdiction, the Courts of common law are now in possession of most extensive and alarming powers. But if we are not to be launched upon the wide ocean of obsolete precedents in search of the true principle and doctrine—and the jurisdiction is limited according to the restricted terms used in the observation of Lord Eldon, in ex parte Greenway: If the anonymous case, 1 Ventr. 330, and other precedents before noticed, are sufficient to prove that the certainty of the demand depending upon computation and not upon variable opinion, is the circumstance which creates the authority, or if practice, as the measure of power, is made the criterion and boundary of the jurisdiction to be exercised by the Courts, a more safe, convenient, and consistent principle of jurisdiction is established.

By the case of Hollipp v. Otway, and the authorities cited in the note of Serjeant Williams (if they are to be considered as existing law), the jurisdiction must, in theory at least, be carried far beyond the limit which modern Judges have prescribed to themselves in practice, but far short of the extent, to which, upon the authority of ancient precedents, as valid and efficient as that principal case, and those cited in the note, the Courts are entitled to exercise jurisdiction.

Such is supposed, arguendo, to be the theory of the law concerning the powers of the Courts, as distinguished from their practice; but the doctrine is founded upon inferences too partially drawn from unsifted authorities.

In modern practice, the exercise of the power has been confined to cases of interest upon bills of exchange or promissory notes, or in actions where the sum due appears [604] with certainty upon the face of the contract, as stated on the record, or is mere matter of computation. This power, in the case of bills and notes, is equally exercised by the Court, whether interest is expressly reserved or not. The interest is given, indeed, in contemplation of law, as damages for detention of the debt; but this proceeds upon mere technical reasoning. The expression of the Chancellor in ex parte Greenway is, that it is in the nature of damages.

Interest upon a bill, when over due, by the custom of merchants, is due upon the contract by implication at least; and by the custom, interest upon a bill is as much a part of the contract, though not expressed, as the principal sum. The computation directed by the Court to be made by its officer in the cases of bills of exchange, in substance, undoubtedly proceeds upon this implied contract for interest at the legal or current rate; otherwise the damages, in such case, would vary according to circumstances, and the certainty which furnishes the ground of reference would not exist. Taking the contract, independently of the custom of merchants, to be for the payment of a sum certain at a given day, or upon demand, interest, according to the rule of law, is due from the day when the money is payable, or from the demand.

Upon this principle, in Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burr. 1085, where a bill of exchange was given for money lent, Lord Mansfield said, although it was void in law as a security, it showed the intention and agreement of the parties, that the money should carry interest if not repaid within the time expressed in the bill; and the Court, upon a special verdict, gave interest to the time of the judgment.

If these may be assumed as the true grounds on which the power of the Court to assess interest is exercised, an inquiry important in principle arises with respect to the practice in bankruptcy, not to permit proof of interest upon bills of exchange in which interest is not expressly reserved, and the late decisions resting upon that practice (in Cameron v. Smith, [605] 2 B. and A. 305; and ex parte Greenway, 1 Buck. 418), in which it was held that interest, accrued upon a bill of exchange before the act of bankruptcy, cannot be added to the principal, so as to constitute a valid debt, for a petitioning creditor.

If the two questions depend upon the same principle, and if they were untouched by decision, and unaffected by practice, it might appear surprising that such doctrines should ever have been established. The main objections to the admission of proof of interest, where it is not reserved by the contract, seem to be the following: viz. that interest, being a compensation for the use of money, or detention of a demand, where it is not matter of express contract, is not a debt, but in the nature of damages, to be assessed by a jury, and that Commissioners of bankrupt have no power to assess damages.

As to the first branch of the objection, in the case of Herries v. Jamieson, Lord Kenyon appears almost in terms to lay down the general proposition, that an action of debt is maintainable for interest, notwithstanding the decision of Lord Hale in Searman v. Dee, 1 Vent. 198. "that no action of debt lies for interest of money, but it is to be recovered by assumpsit in damages;" and supposing it to be recoverable by assumpsit, according to the admission of that case, it seems that the technical rigour of pleading has been relaxed since the days of Lord Hale; and now it is held, that wherever indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable, debt is also maintainable. Walker v. Witten, Doug. 1. It might therefore, not without some show of authority, be said, that interest is, in contemplation of law, as much in the nature of debt as of damages; and so in fact the matter seems to be treated by the Courts in the cases above cited, where judgment passes by default, etc. For if interest upon a bill of exchange were not regulated by the custom of merchants, and by that custom reduced to a matter of certain computation; if it were truly and substantially, in such sense, a question of damages as to depend on variable opinions, the Court in practice [606] would decline the office of giving their opinion as to the damage, and, according to many cases, have no authority to do so.

Again, debt is said to lie upon every contract in deed or in law. Com. Dig. tit. Debt. A judgment, therefore, being by implication of law (not otherwise), a contract by the defendant to satisfy the plaintiff, according to the terms of the judgment, debt is the form of action in such case. So if the judgment be, in a Court of London, by special custom, debt lies in the superior Courts, although the original action could not have been brought there. 1 Roll. 600, l. 45. So debt is said to lie, although there be only an implied contract, as upon a balance found due to one of the accounting parties upon account taken. 1 Roll. 598; l. 47. So if a bailiff pays more than he has received, debt lies for the surplus. Id. ib. l. 50. So for money paid by A. to the use of B. (though without his command) 1 Roll. 597, l. 25. Yelv. 23. (Sed vide semb. contra, 1 Roll. 597, l. 25.) So debt lies upon various customs. See Com. Dig. Debt, A. 9. and Lord Hale said, (Hard. 486.) that debt lies for every duty created by the common law or by custom. Now interest, by the custom of merchants, and by the acknowledged rules of law and equity, is due upon bills of exchange from the time when they are made payable; such interest, therefore, is due by custom, and it is due by implied contract.

But suppose the technical difficulty to be valid in law, and insuperable, the next objection is, that Commissioners of bankrupt cannot assess damages. This is not strictly accurate: for to a certain extent they do assess damages: where interest is reserved upon a promissory note, and the rate of interest is not expressed, but left to the implication of law or custom, the Commissioners are driven to the exercise of their powers of computation. The parties, to a certain extent, have agreed as to what shall be the liquidated damage for the detention of the debt, that is to say, that interest shall be paid: but there is no express agreement as to the rate. [607] In such case, the Commissioners supply that which the parties have in words omitted, viz. the rate of interest: they exercise a judgment, therefore, to imply the rate; and when they compute the sum due in respect of the rate and the time, (two points not expressed or settled on the face of the contract,) they so far assess damages, if mere calculation is rightly so called. The implication of a rate of interest, where no rate is expressed, is founded upon custom and statute, which constitute the law. The same custom and the same law give interest upon a bill from the day appointed for payment. If the cases are similar in principle and fact, the results should be similar; yet in one of the cases an implication is raised, and a power of computation is exercised, in the other it is refused. So although there be no contract, yet if the payment of interest in particular trades and transactions is customary, as upon a settlement and balance of account, and especially if on former settlements interest was paid, a contract is implied, and interest is calculated by the Commissioners from the time of the settlement, and at a rate assumed to be according to the contract of the parties. In such cases, interest upon interest has been allowed. Ex parte Champion, 3 Bro. C. C. 436. The Commissioners, therefore, do not seem altogether to want those powers of computation, which are exercised by the Courts, or their officers, in similar cases; but they refuse to put their powers in action, unless the creditor has stipulated for interest nominatim or unless there be a custom or transaction, or custom and transaction, from which an agreement can be implied.

Suppose, that upon a balance of account bearing interest by custom or implication, the debtor gives to the creditor a bill of exchange in the common form; according to the present practice, no proof is allowed upon the bill which represents the balance; but if the bill is lost, destroyed, or cancelled, and there is no evidence of its existence, interest immediately becomes proveable. Surely this is a singular inconsistency.

[608] The creditor holding a bill which is over due has a right to interest by his implied agreement, founded on the custom of merchants and the principles of law. This right being, in case of bankruptcy, the amount of the dividend in respect of that interest, by means of the practice in question, is transferred from him to the whole body of creditors, who profit by his exclusion, and the bankrupt himself, if there is a surplus, pockets that amount of interest which, by implication and custom, he contracted to pay, and which, from him at least, is certainly due. Many cases might be put, as where a trader is largely indebted upon bills and notes actually due, in which he might be a gainer by bankruptcy to a very large amount, and at the expense of his creditors. This does not appear to be fair dealing with the bill-creditor, or equal justice as between him and his fellow creditors, or as between him and his bankrupt debtor.

The question, as unprejudiced by practice, whether the law is fairly exercised, as regards such bill-creditor individually, and without regard or relation to others, must be tried by a review and consideration of the statutes relating to this subject: by the operation of a commission of bankrupt: the mode in which it affects the right of creditors: and what benefits and privileges are conferred by these statutes upon the bankrupt and the creditors respectively.

The act 34 and 35 H. 8. c. 4, only barred the creditor of such portion of his debt as should be paid under the provisions and powers of that statute, and left him in possession of his remedies for the recovery of the residue. The same provision is made by the 13 Eliz. c. 7. s. 10: and the 1 Jac. 1. c. 15. s. 3, re-enacts the like orders, benefits and remedies as to the traders therein described, as were provided by the 13 Eliz. c. 7. s. 11. The 21 Jac. 1. c. 19, reciting that divers defects were daily found in the former statutes, etc. in the power given to the Commissioners for distributing the bankrupt's estate, &c. to the undoing of many clothiers [609] (by whom the subjects are set on work), etc. for remedy thereof, it is enacted that the former statutes, etc. shall be in all things largely and beneficially construed and expounded, for the aid, help and relief of creditors, etc. and by sect. 3 of this act, the same benefit and remedies are provided as by the former acts. By sect 9, of the same act, for the better distribution of the bankrupt's property among his creditors, the Commissioners are empowered to examine them on oath as to the truth and certainty of their debts.

So that the early statutes relating to bankruptcy appear to have the interest of the creditors only in contemplation. They treat the bankrupt as a fraudulent debtor and criminal; and in the title, preamble, and body of these acts, the relief intended and proposed to be given is for the creditor only. Every doubt as to his rights is to be expounded in his favour, if possible; and after receiving a dividend upon his debt, he is left in possession of his legal remedies for what remains unpaid.

By the provisions of the two first statutes, which are re-enacted by the third, the effects of the bankrupt are to be sold, and ordered for the payment of the creditors according to the quantity of their debts. (34 and 35 H. 8. c. 4. s. 1. 13 Eliz. c. 7. s. 2.) Here it is to be remarked, that the provision is for payment of debts, and no other word being used in these acts, it is material to ascertain whether this was intended in a technical sense. That it could not be so intended, is almost conclusively proved by the reservation of the rights and remedies of creditors after payment of dividends, and until their whole demand is paid. If any part of the claim of a creditor, as interest upon a bill of exchange over due, or upon money lent, remained unpaid by distribution of the effects under the commission, or provisions and powers of these recited acts, the creditor might have brought his action for the amount. It would therefore, so far as the bankrupt was concerned, have been nugatory, whilst such right and remedy existed, to have made a [610] distinction between principal and interest in assorting the dividend, as if the one were a debt contemplated by the statute, and the other only a demand or unliquidated claim, in respect of the detention of the debt, to be compensated in damages; and in truth, if nothing but debts, technically so called, were to be considered in distribution, a bill of exchange, and many other claims then and now undoubtedly proveable under a commission, were not debts in a technical sense, but choses in action, and according to this strict construction of the word, could not have been proved at all.

In this state the law of bankruptcy, as it regarded the rights and remedies of creditors, continued from the reign of Henry the 8th to that of Queen Anne.

The stat. 4 and 5 Anne, c. 17, reciting that bankruptcies happen not so often from losses or misfortune, as from the fraudulent design of evading the just "debts and duties" of creditors, after providing that bankrupts not surrendering and conforming, as required by the statute, shall suffer death as felons, enacts (s. 7.), that those who do surrender and conform shall have an allowance out of the effects, and be discharged from all debts due and owing at the time (of the bankruptcy); and in case such bankrupt shall be arrested, prosecuted, or impleaded for any debt due before (the bankruptcy), such bankrupt shall be discharged upon common bail, etc. This act has expired, but the clause is repeated verbatim in subsequent statutes also expired, and is re-enacted in the same words by the 5 Geo. 2. c. 30. s. 7.

Now in all acts made in pari materia, and particularly in all the clauses of one and the same act, the same word must have the same meaning. It would be a singular rule of construction to establish, that in one clause a word should have a given meaning, and in another clause of the same act, being used with the same unqualified context, might have a different meaning. In the preamble to the 11th and 5th Anne, c. 17, the debts and duties due and owing to creditors are mentioned as the [611] subjects in contemplation, for the securing which, a remedy is to be provided by that act. But all the other statutes of bankrupt, in the clauses which relate to the investigation and proof of the claims of creditors, speak only of "debts." The 5 Geo. 2. c. 30, being in most respects a transcript and compilation of the former statutes, adopts the same enactments in the same words. In the preamble it speaks of bankrupts by extravagance, etc. having contracted great debts, and absconding with their effects in order to oblige their creditors to accept a composition for their debts, etc. By section 25 of the same act, creditors are allowed to prove their debts without contribution, etc.; and the bankrupt, by section 7, is discharged from all debts, etc. in the same terms as by the expired statute of the 11th and 5th Anne.

Here I presume it cannot be disputed, that the debts contemplated in the preamble of these acts, and the debts in the clauses relating to proof and discharge, are the same things in genere et specie. If debts are technical things in the preamble, they must be technical also throughout the act: and if interest due upon a bill of exchange, before and at the time of the bankruptcy, cannot be proved, because it is held not to be a debt technically, but to sound in damages: then as the bankrupt is discharged only from debts (technically also) due and owing at the date of the bankruptcy, a very serious question might have arisen, whether interest due upon a bill of exchange was a claim discharged by the certificate, and whether, if debts are not held in construction of the act to comprise such damages as are due for the detention of money, an action might not be brought for interest due upon a bill after the bankruptcy, and notwithstanding the certificate, especially as it has been pronounced by a Judge of considerable authority, that "debts proveable under the commission, and debts discharged by the certificate, are convertible terms." See Barnford v. Burrell, 2 B. and P. Dict. of Buller, J.

[612] Considering this as a point of practice, all questions may now be precluded by decision: but, for the sake of consistency in construction, there was a time when it deserved better consideration in courts of justice: and it may even now be not undeserving of the attention of the legislature, upon a revision and consolidation of the bankrupt laws. That interest upon bills of exchange under the earliest of the statutes concerning bankruptcy, should not have been admitted to proof, may not be surprising, because the law-merchant, as it relates to bills of exchange, was, at that time, strange to our courts of justice, and not very clearly understood or recognized. In the days of Lutwyche it was held that none but actual merchants could draw a bill of exchange. 891. 1585. And at the time when Ventris and Salkeld reported, it seems to have been seriously debated, whether a person, not a merchant, making a bill of exchange, should be bound by it according to the usage of merchants. In the King's Bench the decision was in the negative: but upon argument in the Exchequer chamber, that judgment was reversed: and this judgment of reversal was reversed upon writ of error in Parliament. The decisions, therefore, in these early times, as to bills of exchange, and the interest due upon them, whether by Courts of justice or Commissioners of bankrupt, ought not to excite our surprise. But that no provision should have been made upon the subject in the comprehensive statute which was framed and passed in the commercial age of George the Second, is truly matter of astonishment.

If the claim of the creditor, in respect of interest, although recoverable only as damages, is discharged by the certificate under the term "debt," then it must be supposed, that the legislature, which took away the remedy of the creditor by action, intended to deal justly with him by substituting an equal or a better statutory remedy. It is in this sense, probably, that a commission [613] of bankrupt has, by the highest authority, been frequently described as uno flatu, an action and an execution. If it were so intended for the benefit of creditors, as a more speedy and certain remedy against failing traders than the slow process of a suit at law, ought it not, in the construction of the statutes, to be intended with respect to all debts (or claims) discharged by the certificate, that the creditor is to have the same right of proof under the commission, as if he had commenced and prosecuted his action through all its stages, till he had obtained its fruit by execution executed. If the statute had not deprived the creditor of his legal remedy he would, in the course of process, have obtained the usual reference to the Master to compute interest, etc. upon his bill: or, according to the authorities cited in the case now reported, the Judges themselves might have assessed the damages without reference. If this be so, and the statute gives to the creditor, as it must be admitted, the substituted remedy of a commission, and empowers him to prove his debt, how could it be supposed that the debt contemplated was any other than that for which an action might have been brought, and for which, by virtue of the statute, the creditor has execution at once?

So the Commissioners having power to investigate and admit (if genuine) the debts of creditors, under a statute which transfers to them and their assignees all the effects of the bankrupt, to be distributed among the creditors rateably, as if they had brought their actions and obtained execution, ought it not to have been intended that they had the same power as Judges have in actions prosecuted by creditors? or that the statute, in giving the effect of execution, supplied by intendment of law all the intermediate necessary steps to make the claim of the creditor effectual.

There is another point of view in which this subject may be considered. Commissioners of bankrupt, as well as the Chancellor, are held to have an equitable [614] as well as a legal jurisdiction, which they exercise in various cases; as where a verdict has been obtained at law for a pre-existing debt, if the Commissioners have reason to doubt the propriety of the verdict, or if there be equitable grounds sufficient to intercept the fruit of the verdict, though per se unimpeachable, they may reject the proof of the debt standing upon such verdicts. Ex parte Butterfill, 1 Rose, 172. So (probably) as to a judgment also, if equity would restrain execution against the bankrupt defendant. These are large powers which Commissioners of bankrupt habitually exercise—powers with which the computation of interest upon a bill of exchange is hardly to be put in competition; and it has been decided by a Judge of great eminence, that notes and bills of exchange payable on a certain day, or upon demand, not being paid on that day, or upon demand, shall carry interest in equity. Per Grant, M. R. Lowndes v. Collins, 17 Ves. 27. Here the objection will be renewed, that Commissioners, though they may exercise a judgment as to the validity of a debt, cannot assume a jurisdiction to assess damages. But in truth, it is, in the latter case, the mere exercise of the faculty of numeration, and this is the ground, and the only ground in practice, upon which the Judges assess damages (if it must be so termed), by reference to their officer in the case of judgment by default, etc. in a suit upon a bill of exchange. To assimilate the assessment of damages in such a case, with the assessment of damages in cases of assault, libel, slander, trespass, or any case of tort, may be sheltered under the technical definitions of law, but is an affront to common sense and to the established practice of the Courts.

It is, moreover, to be remarked, as applicable to the equitable jurisdiction of the Commissioners, that where there is any impediment to the remedy at law, equity removes it, or administers relief. Now if the claim of interest is barred by the certificate, and cannot legally be admitted [615] to proof under the commission, because the Commissioners have no power to assess damages, might not a creditor, without incurring the charge of gross sophistry, contend that the statute and commission are impediments to his legal claim by action, and under the authority of Lowndes v. Collins, appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of the Commissioners, to admit his proof for interest?

Of the debts usually proved under a commission, some carry interest by contract: Upon some, interest is allowed by implication from former transactions, or from the custom of trade. In the case of other debts, as by bond, etc. interest (if not provided) is obtained under the shelter of penalties imposed by the instrument of contract; and in those which, perhaps, in all commissions are the most numerous class, viz. debts for goods sold and delivered, the tradesmen-creditors have taken care, in the price charged, to have ample remuneration for interest and profit, sometimes to the amount of cent per cent upon the prime cost—all these debts are admitted to proof without scruple. But if the words "with interest in case of nonpayment when due" (which are never inserted, because by the custom of merchants they are implied upon all bill transactions) are not to be found in a bill of exchange, the unfortunate holder, upon a technical fiction, which is evaded or surmounted by another technicality in the Courts of Justice, is excluded upon a commission of bankrupt, from his claim of interest for which, by the law-merchant, and the law of the land, an implied contract was made in the formation of the bill.

The injustice done to the holder of a bill, as between him and his fellow creditors, is obvious; but as between him and the bankrupt, in case of a surplus, it is flagrant injustice. Let it be supposed that a trader is indebted £200,000 to creditors, upon bills of exchange in the ordinary form, which are overdue, and his only debts: let it be further supposed that he holds notes and other securities, bearing interest, to the amount of £200,000, which are his only effects; upon all these [616] securities interest is received for him by his assignees; then, after discharging the debts, and paying the expenses of the commission, the bankrupt pockets the surplus, composed of interest, which, if the commission has been long in operation, will be a considerable sum, and the bill-creditors are left, perhaps, to supply their necessities, occasioned by the bankruptcy, by borrowing money to the amount of their respective debts proved under the commission, and paying interest upon the loans from the time when their respective bills became due to the time when they receive their dividend. Can such a result have been intended by statutes made professedly for the benefit of creditors?

Lord Hardwicke, according to the report in Ex parte Bennet, 2 Atk. 527, said, that "the fund (in bankruptcy) was a dead fund; and in such a shipwreck, if there is a salvage of part to each person, it is as much as can be expected." But here is a case, occurring partially in many bankruptcies, where the fund, in respect of interest, is dead to the creditors, but living to the bankrupt; where the creditors suffer shipwreck, and the bankrupt looks on with complacency from his retreat on the shore.

That the Commissioners of bankrupt should now, after inveterate practice, undertake to begin so important an alteration in the administration of the bankrupt law, is not to be expected or desired; but when the statutes of bankruptcy are under revision, the subject may deserve consideration.

The following are some of the Cases cited in the foregoing Note. The two first are close Translations from the Year Books.

Year Book, 3 H. 4. 4. Trespass was brought against a man for trees cut, who pleaded that he was not guilty; and he was found guilty to the damage of 40s. and they taxed the costs of the writ at 5s. Whereupon [617] Culpepper, for the plaintiff, prayed that the damages might be increased; and then Thirning said, that he had spoken of this matter to all his companions, and also to the Justices of the King's Bench, and it seemed to them that it lay within our cognizance and discretion as to the costs of the writ, and this we may well have full power to increase: but as to the damages for the trees cut, by no means; for that this lies not within our cognizance.

At the end of the case as it stands reported, the following observation and authorities appear: "Where the Judges increase and abridge damages, see M. 19 H. 6. 16; T. 32 H. 6. 1; M. 38 E. 3. 30; M. 39 E. 3. 26; M. 22 E. 3. 11. 30; 20 Lib. Ass. plac. 30; P. 8 H. 4. 23; 7 H. 4. 31."

Year Book, 27 H. 8. 2. In trespass quare clausum fregit, the defendant pleaded in bar. Whereupon the plaintiff demurred, and it was adjudged no plea. Wherefore a writ issued to inquire of the damages, and damages were found to the value of five marks. Wilby prayed the Court that they would abridge the damages, for (as he alleged) the truth was, that the plaintiff was not dammified to the value of twelve pence, and this proceeding being only an inquest of office, he said the Court may increase or abridge the damages at their discretion. But Fitzherbert, Shelley and Englefield interposed, and said, "that cannot be done as to the damages; you have never seen this in your life: as to the costs, it lies in our discretion, but damages cannot be increased upon a local trespass." Wilby again suggested that the Court might have assessed the damages to the plaintiff without any writ of inquiry, and would have inferred the power from that circumstance. But Englefield interposed, and repeated, "this cannot be done upon a local trespass which is done in pais," and assigned as a reason that they could have no knowledge of it; and this doctrine Fitzherbert and Shelley did not deny.

Hawkins v. Sciety, Palmer, 314. In an action upon the case for calling the plaintiff a bankrupt, upon the general issue it was found for the plaintiff, and £150 damages given. And because of these great damages, the Court, from some circumstances, reduced them to £50; but afterwards, upon great advice, they revoked this, and were not willing to [618] change the course of law, and resolved to leave such matters of fact to the finding of a jury, who better know the quality of persons and their condition, and the damage they may have sustained by such disgrace. But otherwise where the action is grounded upon a cause which may appear to the view of the Court, upon which they may judge, as in mayhem, etc. and Dyer, 105. acc. and so they gave judgment for £150, according to the verdict.

In Jenkins, Cent. 68. ca. 29. the law is thus laid down: In a writ of trespass de clauso facto, the jury found damages: the Judges can neither increase nor abridge them. So it is where there is a writ to inquire of damages in trespass; 27 H. 8. 2. So it is in an action on the case for slander, where the jury taxes damages. So in an assize. But it is otherwise upon a writ of inquiry of damages in debt, mayhem, detinue, covenant, battery, the Court may increase or diminish the damages assessed by the jury. 9 H. 6. 2; 19 H. 6. 18; 11 H. 4. 10. 61; Dyer, 105; 14 H. 4. recordare; 13 E. 3; Fitz. Damage, 28; 41 E. 3. 19.

In the margin is the following entry: 3 H. 4. 4; 22 E. 3. 1; 19 E. 3. 65; 8 H. 4. 17. by all the Judges of England.

Ognell's case, P. 30 Eliz. 3 Leon. 213. In replevin, the plaintiff being nonsuited, the Court were of opinion, upon a question made, that they might assess damages for the defendant without a writ of inquiry, because they accrue to the avowant for the delay in nonpayment of the rent. But if judgment had been given for the plaintiff, the Court said they could not assess the damages, for he ought to recover for the taking of his cattle, of which the Judges could not take notice; for the damages might be greater or less, according to the value of the cattle, and the circumstances of the taking and delaying of them.

REPORTS OF CASES heard in the House of Lords, upon Appeals and Writs of Error, and decided during the Session, 1820. By RICHARD BLIGH, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. II.

ENGLAND.

WRIT OF ERROR FROM THE COURT OF KING'S BENCH BETWEEN

RICHARD JESSON, JOSEPH HATELY, WILLIAM WHITEHOUSE, JOSEPH WALTON, EDWARD DANGERFIELD, the elder, and THOMAS DANGERFIELD, —Plaintiffs in Error; and JOHN DOE, on the several demises of EZEKIEL WRIGHT, JOHN WRIGHT, THOMAS WRIGHT, GEO. WRIGHT, ISAAC WRIGHT, WILLIAM WRIGHT, the younger, LUCY WRIGHT, MARY WRIGHT, DANIEL WRIGHT, ELIZABETH MOSLEY, and THOMAS STOKES,—Defendants in Error [15th June, 1820].

[2] DEVISE.—To W. (a natural son of the testator's sister) for life, and after his decease to the heirs of his body in such shares and proportions as W. by deed, etc. shall appoint; and for want of such appointment to the heirs of the body of W. share and share alike as tenants in common; and if but one child the whole to such only child, and for want of such issue to the heirs of devisor. Held—that an estate tail vested in William by this devise.

The rule is, that technical words shall have their legal effect, unless from subsequent inconsistent words it is clear that the testator meant otherwise.

Semble—that under such power an appointment to an only child, before others born, is effectual.

Whether a power, under which all children have an interest, can be destroyed by forfeiture. Quaere.

Doe v. Goff, 11 East, 668, held not to be law.

This was an ejectment brought in the Court of King's Bench against the Plaintiff in Error, to recover the possession of tenements in the county of Stafford.

This cause came on to be tried at the assizes for the county of Stafford, holden at Stafford, on the 16th day of March, 1815, before the Honourable Mr. Justice Dallas, when the jury, by the consent of the parties, found a special verdict.

The special verdict states,

That one Ezekiel Persehouse, being seized in fee of the premises set forth in the declaration, made and published his last will in writing, on the 24th of April, 1773, executed and attested as the law requires, for passing real estates by devise, and that thereby, among other things, he gave and devised [3] the premises in the declaration mentioned, with the appurtenances, in the words following:

"I give and devise unto William, one of the sons of my sister Ann Wright, before marriage, all that messuage, tenement, or dwelling-house, malt-house, stable, buildings, garden, hereditaments, and premises, with their and every of their appurtenances, situate and being in the parish of Tipton, otherwise Tibbington, and county of Stafford, now in my own possession: and all those two dwelling-houses, barn, shops, buildings, gardens, hereditaments, and premises, situate in the said parish of Tipton, otherwise Tibbington, now in the occupation of John Law, and Timmins: and also all those seven closes, pieces or parcels of land, or ground, to the said two dwelling-houses and buildings adjoining, or nearly adjoining, and belonging, with their and every of their appurtenances, now in my own possession: to hold the same premises unto the said William, son of my said sister Ann Wright, for and during the term of his natural life, he keeping all the said dwelling-houses and buildings in tenantable repair: and from and after his decease, I give and devise all the said dwelling-houses or tenements, buildings, garden, lands, hereditaments, and premises, with their and every of their appurtenances, unto the heirs of the body of the said William, son of my said sister Ann Wright, lawfully issuing, in such shares and proportions as he the said William, in and by any deed or writing, deeds or writings, or in and by his last [4] will and testament, in writing, to be by him duly executed, in the presence of three or more credible witnesses, shall give, direct, limit, or appoint the same: and for want of such gift, direction, limitation, or appointment, then to the heirs of the body of the said William, son of my said sister Ann Wright, lawfully issuing, share and share alike, as tenants in common, and if but one child, the whole to such only child. And for want of such issue, I give and devise all the said dwelling-houses, buildings, lands, hereditaments, and premises, to my right heirs for ever, charged and chargeable, nevertheless, with and for the payment of one annuity or yearly sum of £20, of lawful money of Great Britain, half yearly, to my said sister, Ann Wright, and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life: the first half-yearly payments thereof to begin and be made by the said William, son of my said sister, Ann Wright, at the end of six months next after my decease, or by such other person or persons, who, according to the true intent of this my will, may be seized of the said dwelling-houses, buildings, lands, hereditaments, and premises: and when and so often as the said annuity, or any part thereof, shall be behind and unpaid by the space of twenty days, next after the same ought to be paid, as aforesaid, that then, and at any time then after, it shall and may be lawful to and for my said sister, Ann Wright, or her assigns, into and upon the said dwelling-houses, buildings, lands, hereditaments, and premises, or any of [5] them, or any part thereof, to enter and distrain: and such distress and distresses to sell and dispose of to satisfy and discharge all such arrearages, with the costs and charges of taking, keeping, and disposing of the same."

The special verdict then states, that the said Ezekiel Persehouse died on the same day, seized of the said premises, without altering his will; and that, upon the death of the said Ezekiel Persehouse, Thomas Stokes, Ann Wright, and Elizabeth Persehouse, were his co-heirs, of whom Ann Wright and Elizabeth dying, respectively, Daniel Wright and Elizabeth Mosley succeeded, as heirs, which said Thomas Stokes, Daniel Wright, and Elizabeth Mosley, are three of the lessors of the Plaintiff.

The special verdict further states, that immediately after the death of the said Ezekiel Persehouse, the said William Wright named in his will, entered in the said premises, and became seized of such estates as legally passed to him under the will of the said Ezekiel Persehouse: and that, afterwards, on the 13th December, 1774, he married one Mary Jones, by whom he had issue, Edward Wright, Elizabeth Wright, Lucy Wright, Ezekiel Wright, John Wright, Thomas Wright, George Wright, Isaac Wright, Mary Wright, and William Wright, the younger, born in the above order, of whom Elizabeth, afterwards, on the 23d February, 1798, died without issue: and Lucy, Ezekiel, John, Thomas, George, Isaac, Mary, and William, the younger, are the other lessors of the Plaintiff.

The special verdict further states, that after-[6]-wards, by certain indentures of lease and release, executed respectively, on the 16th and 17th January, 1800, the said premises were conveyed by the said William Wright, and Mary, his wife, and the said Edward Wright, their eldest son, to Robert Long, as tenants, to the precipe.

to the intent that a common recovery might be suffered, for the purpose of barring and extinguishing all estates tail, and all remainders and reversions, of and in the said premises; and, that a recovery accordingly was afterwards suffered as of the Hilary Term following, wherein the said William Wright, and Mary, his wife, and Edward Wright, were vouched to warranty, and entered into the warranty, and defended their right in the usual way; whereupon a writ of seizin afterwards issued and was executed.

The special verdict then states the entries of the several and respective lessors of the Plaintiff, on the premises, and their seizin, according to law; and the several demises to John Doe, the Plaintiff in Ejectment, who entered and was possessed, until the Plaintiffs in Error entered on the premises and ejected him thereout.

This special verdict was argued in Court in Easter Term, 1816, the Plaintiff below arguing that William Wright, the devisee, took an estate for life only, with remainders to his children for life, respectively, as tenants in common, while the Defendants below contended that the said William Wright took an estate tail. The Court gave judgment for the Plaintiff below.*

[7] Against this judgment a writ of error was brought. The principal error assigned was, that the Court below, by their judgment, had decided, that "William Wright took only a life-estate under the will of, etc., with remainder to his children for life; and that the recovery suffered by William Wright, Mary, his wife, and Edward Wright, was a forfeiture of their estate. Whereas the Plaintiffs in Error contended, that the testator intended to embrace all the issue of William Wright, which intention could only be effected by giving William Wright an estate tail, for which purpose the words of the will are fully sufficient."

For the Plaintiffs in Error—Mr. Jervis and Mr. Sugden.

It was the intention of the testator to include all William's issue, and sufficient appears on the face of the will to enable a court of law to effectuate his intention. The decision in the Court below attributes this meaning to the testator.—That if William had only one child born who survived him, such child should take the whole estate for life; but if he had twelve (for example), and eleven died in his lifetime, the surviving child should have only a twelfth of the estate for his life. Is this a probable intention?—Again, if he had twelve children, and they all died in his lifetime leaving issue, according to this decision none of the issue could take? If their parents, indeed, had lived, they might have been supported out of the estate, but if their parents chanced to die in William's lifetime, they could derive no benefit from [8] the estate. William was an illegitimate child, and yet the testator thought fit to provide for him and all his unborn children. If we consider the probable duration of their lives, it is not likely that the testator intended to stop there, with all the risks attending such a limited bounty, and then to give the estate to his heir at law. What is the value of such a gift? To the devisees it is highly important, that the estate should not go over until a total failure of all their issue, but to the heir the value of a reversion in fee after a life estate to a young person with remainders for life to all his children is trifling. Suppose that twelve children had survived William, is it a probable intention, that upon the death of each a share should fall to the heir, who would thus perhaps be a long series of years acquiring all the shares in the property.

The testator has given the estate to the heirs "of the body of William lawfully issuing." Those words clearly include all the posterity of William. But it is said that he has translated his words to mean children. There is no doubt but that he intended the children to take. But the translation is too narrow. It makes the testator say that William's children shall take only for life, and that none of their children shall take after them. What warrant is there for this in the will? Can it be argued, that because under the latter words in the will, had they stood alone, William's children would merely have taken estates for life, therefore, they shall in this case take only that quantity of interest, although the testator has expressly given the property to [9] the heirs of William's body, which would include all his possible heirs? The testator intended William to take for life, and he intended all his issue to take. But he intended his children to take as purchasers; and it is manifest that he considered, (although erroneously in point of law,) that his intention to include all William's possible issue would be effectuated if the children did take as purchasers. The argument assumes this shape, that because he intended the children to take as purchasers, and has not repeated words of inheritance, they can only take for life as tenants in common.

It seems impossible to contend, that William under this power might not have appointed an estate of inheritance * to a grandson, or more remote issue, born in his lifetime, and this of itself decides the case. This, it is argued, the rule of perpetuity forbids. It may be admitted, that he could not appoint to a child, with remainder to the issue of that child, to take as a purchaser; but where, as in this case, the power is to appoint to heirs of the body a class of unborn persons as [10] purchasers, it may be exercised by appointing, in the first instance, to a grandchild as a purchaser. The rule of perpetuity forbids only a possibility upon a possibility—as an appointment to an unborn son, with remainder to an unborn son of the son. Appointments to grandchildren as purchasers, under powers in marriage settlements, are of every day's practice. It is immaterial that in this view of the testator the children, etc. must take by purchase—that must be of necessity: they could not take under the power from William.† It is indeed said, that as issue taking under a power must take by purchase, this shows the words were used in that sense. If this were conceded, it would remain to be shown, that used as words of purchase, they were not intended to include more than the first line of generation, and merely to give to them life estates as tenants in common.

Let us consider this proposition. A devise to A. and the heirs of his body; of course he takes an estate in tail. A similar devise with a power to A. to appoint to any of the heirs of the body. Is it possible to contend that this right to defeat the estate so given to him, and to make those take by purchase, who, if the power remained unexercised, would take by descent, can [11] vary the construction of the devise to A. in tail? The supposed case is not different in principle from the present. In the one the estate tail is given in the first instance, but defeasible by exercise of the power; in the other the limitation in tail follows the power. It is immaterial whether it precedes or follows. In the former case the children would take by purchase when the power should be executed in their favour. If the power remained unexercised, the heirs of the body would take by descent. So in this case—where the first limitation is to William for life, with remainder to the heirs of the body of William, according to his appointment, remainder, in default of appointment, to the heirs of his body, etc. If the power is exercised, the heirs being appointees take by purchase; if no appointment is made, the estate descends to the heir to whom it is limited. The words, notwithstanding the power, may operate as words of limitation.

This case was decided in the Court below, upon its own merits, without reference to authorities; but the decided cases are strong authorities against the judgment. In the case of Scale v. Barter (2 Bos. and Pull. 485), which was a devise of all the testator's lands to his son, John, and his children lawfully to be begotten, with power

* The power is to appoint to heirs of the body of William in such share and proportions as William shall appoint, not in such manner and form, (as well as in such shares and proportions,) according to the power in the King v. the Marquis of Stafford, 7 East, 521; nor for such estates according to the power of devise given in Leonard Lovie's case: nor is it a power to dispose of the estate, as the donee should think fit, as in Liefe v. Saltingtone. It may be said, that an appointment to a living grandson of William, and the heirs of the body of the grandson, would be an appointment to the heirs of the body of William. In this sense of the argument, "estate of inheritance" means estate tail. On this point see farther, [2 Bli.] p. 23, and note.

† At this part of the argument, the Lord Chancellor observed, as to the distribution under the power, that, although the words heirs of the body, in a legal construction, could apply to one person only, it might be contended, where a power was given to appoint to heirs of the body, that it meant a class of persons. The ulterior limitation to one child, in default of appointment, might operate as a description of the person, and would not conclusively prove that no estate tail was intended to be given.

to settle the same, or any part thereof, by will or otherwise, to them or any of them as he should think proper; and for default of such issue, over—it was held that John took an estate tail, and that this construction [12] was not weakened by the power. The power, it was said by Lord Alvanley, in delivering the judgment of the Court, had some operation, since it enabled the devisee to dispose of the estate to his children without going through the forms of a recovery. But the power, because it enabled John to make his children take by purchase, did not make it imperative on the Court to give the estate to the children by purchase in all events, and to confine them to life estates as tenants in common. So in the case of Doe, d. Cole v. Goldsmith (7 Taun. 209. 2 Marsh. 517), which is reported by Taunton, vol. vii. p. 209, but more strongly to the point in question in 2 Marshall, 517; upon a devise to F. G. and his assigns for life, and from and immediately after his decease to the heirs of his body in such shares, etc. manner and form as he should appoint, and in default of such heirs of his body then from and immediately after his decease to J. G. it was held by the Court, as matter beyond doubt, that the testator intended that all the heirs of F. G. in a line of succession, should be extinguished before J. G. should take by the limitation over, and, therefore, that an estate tail by implication must be held to arise to F. G. because there was no other way to perpetuate the succession in the manner intended. There was no distinct limitation, as in this case, to the heirs of the body of the tenant for life in default of appointment. That expression occurred only in the clause giving the power, and the words introducing the devise over, and the referential word such is to be found in that case as in this. In Doe v. Goldsmith, the intent to give an estate tail was implied from the words preceding the limitation over. Here is a distinct gift in words having a fixed legal operation.

The Lord Chancellor. The gift is to the heirs of the body share and share alike as tenants in common.

Mr. Sugden. If it can be made consistent with other words in the will, to give the children estates for life only,—then they must take by way of purchase, as tenants in common. But the words, share and share alike, may be construed by reference to the power which contains an implied or possible gift, under which they would take as tenants in common.

Lord Chancellor. If I had lived 200 years ago, I should have had no doubt that such limitations, as we see in this will, would have given an estate tail. But your argument supposes, that the donee of the power might appoint among grandchildren, etc. to the remotest posterity. That I should have thought impossible, if I had lived 200 years ago.

Mr. Sugden. Keeping within the rule of perpetuity, he might have appointed to any the remotest heir of the body.

It may be admitted, that if “heirs of the body” means children,—such heirs or such issue, must mean the same thing. The same words cannot have different meanings, in the different parts of a will. But the supposed virtue of the word such, [14] did not avail in Doe v. Goldsmith, where it must have been held an executory devise;—whereas, in this case, it is clearly a contingent remainder.

The inconvenience of the supposed intention has been already noticed. If only one child should be born, they imagine the testator meant that he should take the lands for life. If twelve children, and eleven died infants, according to one construction, the survivor would take the whole:—according to another construction, he would take only a twelfth part. If the eleven died, leaving families, the families would take nothing. It was argued in the Court below, that under the will, cross remainders for life were to be implied, as among the children of William. But this argument was adverse to the interest of the heir at law, by whose counsel it was urged. It may be necessary to ascertain on which of the counts in the declaration they have entered up the verdict.—Some are on the demise of the children, some on that of the heirs at law. The judgment itself does not furnish the information.

Mr. Taunton. Lord Ellenborough said, that as there were counts on the demise of the heir at law, as well as the children, it was unnecessary to enter into the argument, as to the cross remainders, which might be material, as between the two sets of Plaintiffs; but was immaterial, as between them and the Defendants.

Lord Redesdale. Is Edward Wright living?

Mr. Sugden. Edward the son is living as well as the father. They put it as a forfeiture of the life estate.

[15] Lord Redesdale. If it is a forfeiture by Edward the son, it must be because he took under the appointment; and so it must be argued as a forfeiture of the whole.

Lord Chancellor. Were other children living at the time?

Mr. Sugden. That appears only by inference to be drawn from the special verdict. The word "afterwards" in that part of the verdict which states the conveyance, does not conclusively mean in point of time, after all the facts before stated in it.

Lord Redesdale. Could the power be destroyed by forfeiture where all the children have an interest?

Mr. Sugden. Such a question is now depending before the Vice-Chancellor,* and probably will go farther.

Lord Redesdale. How could it be destroyed by such instruments as these? It must be by some instrument expressly renouncing it. How can a man, having a power for the benefit of children, destroy it?

Lord Chancellor. The appointment ought to be stated. It appears by the verdict, that Edward [16] was the son of William. How does it appear that the appointment did not take effect in his favour before any other child was born?

Mr. Taunton. In the special verdict there is no appearance of appointment.

Lord Chancellor. We sit here to decide on cases as they appear on the record.†

Mr. Taunton. On the trial, the appointment could not be proved; and it was agreed that it should be put out of consideration. The recital of a fact in a deed is no evidence against strangers. A fortiori, the mere description, cannot be evidence against the Plaintiffs in the action.

Lord Redesdale. Would not this instrument (in the absence of any other) operate as an appointment?

Mr. Taunton. It was executed alio intuitu, merely to make a tenant to the praepice.

Lord Chancellor. The making Edward a party to the deed, is evidence that they did not choose to deal with William, as having an estate tail; and therefore took in Edward as having such estate. The question is, whether William so acting towards Edward, the deed of William must not operate as an appointment.

[17] Mr. Sugden. A recital has in Chancery been held to be an appointment. (Wilson v. Pigott, 2 Ves. J. 351.) A covenant to levy a fine has been held not to operate as a destruction of the power,‡ because the court looks to intention. So even where a fine has been levied,§ A deed of covenant cannot so operate, because it imports an intention that something more should be done. And where a deed, declaring the uses (after the fine levied), was executed, in the manner required by the power, it was held, that the deed and fine taken together, operated as an appointment.¶ Admitting that the description alone does not make the son appointee, yet it may operate to show an intention of appointment, and being followed by the declaration of uses in the deed of recovery, they altogether operate as an execution, and not as a destruction of the power. This is a stronger case than that of Lord Leicester, and others of that class. There the ground was intention, to be inferred from the nature of the transaction. But here is an express declaration, operating as

* Smith v. Death, before the Vice-Chancellor, who delivered his judgment on the 19th of June, 1820. The decision was that the power could be destroyed. The same question was argued, but not decided, in West v. Berney, before the Vice-Chancellor in Hilary Term, 1819.—See Sugden on Powers, pp. 80, 81, third edition.

† No appointment is stated in the special verdict; but, in the printed case of the Plaintiff in Error, William is described as appointee in tail general. Upon this point see the observations of the Lord Chancellor in giving judgment, pp. 51, 52. This part of the argument is preserved on account of the judicial observations.

‡ The Earl of Leicester's Case, 1 Vent. 278. It is also reported under the name of Wigson v. Garrett, or Garrad, 2 Lev. 119. Raym. 239. 3 Keb. 366, 189, 510, 536, 572.

an appointment to the son. There is nothing on the face of the verdict to show that any other child was living at the date of the appointment. The subsequent birth of issue, in such circumstances, could never defeat the estate of the son. The difficulty which occurs in other cases, where there [18] are not contingent remainders, does not arise in this case.

The argument that the children took mere life estates, is sufficient to destroy the Respondents' case. There is no authority extant, in which the words, "heirs of the body," in such a case as this, have been cut down to life estates. The children have always been held to take the inheritance.

The authorities cited in support of the adverse claim are not applicable to this case. In Goodtitle v. Herring (1 East, 264), the limitation to the "heirs male of the body," was in a subsequent part of the will clearly explained, nay, even expressed to mean sons. In this case we have no such expression or explanation. In Archer's case (Rep. 66), the limitation was to the next heir, in the singular number, and words of limitation were superadded, viz. to the heirs of the body of that next heir. In Cheek v. Day,* the devise was to the heir in the singular number, and words of inheritance in fee were grafted upon that limitation. In Walker v. Snow (Palm. 359), the same circumstances occurred, and it was, moreover, clearly a description of the person. Lisle v. Gray (2 Lev. 223. Raym. 278) was nearly similar to Goodtitle v. Herring (1 East, 264), where the words heirs male of the body, were explained by the will, to mean sons successively. So in Lawe v. Davies (2 Ld. Raym. 1561), occurred the [19] same explanation by subsequent words of the limitation to the heirs lawfully to be begotten. In Doe v. Laming,† not only were there superadded words of limitation in fee grafted on the limitation, to the heirs of the body; but, moreover, the devise was to heirs of the body, as well males as females; and being of lands in Gavelkind, those words could not operate by way of limitation, but must of necessity, in order to effectuate the intent of the testator, operate by way of purchase. For the limitation, as it stood expressed, included issue who could not take by descent.

In this case the testator by the word such, might mean to refer to children: children might have been the issue contemplated. But he had before expressed, and it must be presumed he intended an entail that all the issue of William might inherit. Here, therefore, are incompatible intentions, and the general must prevail against the particular intent. So in the case of Coulson v. Coulson (2 Stra. 1125. 2 Atk. 246, et vid Hodgson et ux v. Ambrose. Dougl. Rep.), it was argued, from the interposition of trustees, to preserve contingent remainders, that the testator contemplated, and intended to raise contingent remainders to be preserved, and probably it was so. But the general rule prevailed in that case, notwithstanding such probable particular intent to be inferred from that provision and limitation.

William being an illegitimate son, he and his children were strangers to the testator. This has in all [20] such cases furnished an argument upon the gift, over in default of issue. The words operate as a gift to the heir at law. But when vested, he is in at law by descent. The question is, whether the testator ever intended it should go to his heir at law, whether by descent or by devise, until all the issue of the illegitimate son were extinct.

As to the words "among the heirs of the body, share and share alike, as tenants in common, etc." they have in many cases been rejected, where it has appeared that the testator intended to give to the whole line of the issue. It is necessary in such cases, to hold it to be an estate tail, to guard against the inference from the want of any express limitation or implication of cross remainders among the children, so as to give the estate of a child dying without issue, to the survivors. The cases show that it ought not to be implied that the father takes for life only, unless the court can raise such further implication, as to give the whole estate to all the children. In Doe v. Smith (7 T. R. 531), the devise was to M. A. and the heirs of her body, as tenants in common, which was held to give an estate tail, notwithstanding those latter words, and the reasoning of Lord Kenyon in delivering judgment in that case, is applicable to, and decisive of this case. Again, in Doe v. Cooper (1 East, 229), the devise was expressly to R. C. for life only; and after, etc. to the issue of R. C. as tenants in common; and in case R. C. should die without leaving lawful issue, to E. H. and her heirs. The court held [21] that an estate tail by implication vested in R. C., because cross remainders among the children could not be implied; and although it was admitted by the judges, that it appeared to be the particular intent of the devisor that R. C. should take only an estate for life; yet that intent, being inconsistent with the general and paramount intent, that all his issue should inherit the entire estate before it went over, was disregarded. The words of the will in that case were, on the one hand, much stronger for a tenancy for life; on the other, much weaker for a tenancy in tail, than the words of this will. In Frank v. Storen (3 East, 548), which was a devise to B. F. for life, without impeachment of waste, and with power to jointure; and after, etc. to the issue male of his body and their heirs; and in default of such issue, to R. F., etc. It was held an estate tail in B. F., although the issue or children, apparently were made the stock of a new line of heirs, and the first estate was given expressly for life, with powers not wanted by a tenant in tail. In that case also, the particular intent was disregarded; and the recovery was upheld, by which the children were disappointed. So in Franklin v. Lay,* lately decided, although superadded words of inheritance occurred in that case also, the same principles of decision were upheld. In Mogg v. Mogg (1 Meriv. 654. Some of the children were unborn), where the first devise was to children for life, and the remainder to the issue of the children [22] and their heirs, as tenants in common; and in default of such issue over,—it was held on the doctrine of Cy-pres, where the limitations would otherwise have been void as a perpetuity, a devise to the children, as tenants in common in tail, with cross remainders. In Mogg v. Mogg, the limitation was void, as against the policy of the law, and the Court might on that account have refused to interfere. Here is no such impediment, and the children cannot otherwise than by giving an estate tail to the parent, take such interest as the testator intended. If, according to the argument, the children would take estates only for life, the necessary consequence is, that the parent must take an estate tail; otherwise the intention of the testator is frustrated. He intended to provide for the issue, and they would have no provision.

If the gift had been to "children," instead of "heirs of the body," the same argument would have arisen. The word children, when used as a class, gives the same interest. That appears by the authority of the Court of K. B. in Doe v. Webber (1 B. and A. 713), a case in which there was a devise to M. H. and her heirs; and in case M. H. should die and leave no child or children to J. B., etc. The Court held that child or children meant issue, not confined to immediate, but extending to the remotest descendants. Such was the opinion of that Court upon a question, whether it was an estate tail, or an executory devise; whether the words child or children, in the contingent clause, introducing the remainder over, reduced the fee before [23] given to an estate tail. Upon which point, nothing is to be collected in that case, except from the words introducing the devise over itself. But in this case, it is an express devise in tail; and the intention clearly appears not to give any estate to the heir at law, until the remotest issue of W. are extinct.

As to the intention, the Respondents have argued nothing. They rely on the rigid legal construction of the words. They contend, 1. that under the power, the heirs of the body must take as purchasers; and if so, as children. 2. That in default of appointment, they take as tenants in common; again, as they argue, as children. Lastly, they say, the limitation introducing the remainder over, viz. in default of such issue, directly refers to "child," the last antecedent; and therefore issue in that place means children as before. To the first argument, the answer is, that the donee might have appointed to any of the heirs of the body, considering them as a class. Which of the words come first, and which last, is immaterial. The power is to appoint to heirs as purchasers, and not as descendants. Such a power cannot break the estate tail; it would not do so if the devise were to children.

* Before the Vice-Chancellor, 3rd May, 1820, not reported.—See the note at the end of the report of this case.

Taking the word to be "children," according to their construction, he might appoint to any of his descendants. Liefe v. Saltingstone.^{*} Under the power in this case, William might have [24] given the estate in fee † to a person filling the character of heir of the body. It is said that there are no words empowering such appointment. But the authority last cited proves that words of inheritance are not necessary, even if the devise had been to "such children," etc. In Doe v. Goldsmith, ‡ the devise was to F. G. for life, and after, etc. to the heirs of his body, etc. as F. H. should appoint; and in default of such heirs of his body, then immediately after his decease to J. G. In that case heirs of the body must mean children, if they do so in this; and so it was argued. Yet the court held it to be an estate tail by implication. Such a power was never adjudged to defeat an estate tail. §

As to Doe v. Goff, where the devise was to M. and the heirs of her body, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants: but if such issue should die before he, she, or they respectively attain the age of twenty-one, then to J. M. and his heirs, it was held an estate in the children, in common in tail, chiefly upon the effect of the [25] words preceding the limitation over. As to Gretton v. Howard (6 Tau. 94), the devise was to A. H. she first paying all my just debts, etc.; and after her decease, to the heirs of her body, share and share alike, if more than one; and in default of issue, to be lawfully begotten by me, to be at her own disposal. The case was decided on the peculiar language of the will importing that the gift was not after an indefinite failure of issue. Doe v. Corey (in the K. B.), which is not yet reported, depends on the principle of Doe v. Laming (2 Burr. 1100). The children themselves, in each of those cases, by the effect of the superadded words, took a fee as the stock of a new inheritance. In Seward v. Willoch, || the estate was given to the issue expressly for their lives only. The ground of decision was, that the will shewed a single intent to create a succession of estates for life, not warranted by law. And it could not be modelled as an executory devise, as in Humberstone v. Humberstone, ¶ in Chancery. But here the devise does not confine the estate to the children, to an interest for life; but, on the contrary, clearly means to give an inheritance.

It is argued, that he meant the children to take, if more than one, because he gives to one child, if there should be but one. No doubt that was his [26] intention, and that they should take as purchasers; but he also intended that children's children, to the last generation, should inherit before the estate should go to the remainder-man. In the case of one child, he meant that the one child should take

* 1 Mod. 189. In that case the devise was to the wife for life; and "by her to be disposed of to such of my children, etc.;" and the judges being a majority who decided the case, relied on the word "dispose," as implying such a power as the testator himself had, which was to dispose of the fee.—See the next page.

† Upon the general question, whether a fee simple may be given under a power to appoint among the heirs of the body, issue, children, etc. without any additional words to extend the power. See Sugden on Powers, 9. c. s. 10. In the King v. Marquis of Stafford, the Court said they would not determine the general question, but relied on the efficacy of the words manner and form. The power in Phelps v. Hay had the same words. Sugden on Powers, Appendix, No. 18.—See ante, p. 9.

‡ 7 Tau. Rep. 209, and 2 Marsh. Rep. 517. Mr. Sugden added, arguendo, that the case was free from prejudice, because Doe v. Jesson was not cited or noticed. V. Post, 44.

§ That remainders in default of appointment are not suspended or kept in contingency by powers annexed to, or which accompany preceding estates. See Cunningham v. Moody, 1 Ves. 174, Doe v. Martin, 4 T. R. 39.; and the same doctrine as to personal property, 1 Ves. 210. 2 Ves. 208. Amb. 365.

|| 5 East 198. This was a devise to A. for life; and after him to his eldest, or any other son after him for life; and after them, to as many of his descendants, issue male, as shall be heirs of his or their bodies, down to the tenth generation, during their lives.

¶ 1 P. W. 332. This was a devise to trustees to convey, etc. to children of unborn children for life, which the Court, upon doctrines of equity modelled, by decreeing conveyances to existing children for life, and to unborn children in tail, etc.

the inheritance; and a limitation to children, or a child, as a class, is sufficient to give such interest. It is said, that in the power enabling appointment to the heirs of the body, there are no words of inheritance; and that, therefore, the appointment of an estate of inheritance is not authorized by the power. But it is settled, that where there is a devise to the heir, although there are neither words nor intent expressed to give him the inheritance, and although the estate vests in him by purchase, as a person described, yet he may take the whole inheritance. Burchett v. Durdant * was decided on this principle. The objection was taken in that case, for the want of words of inheritance; but the [27] Court held it was a fee † in the person described, as heir of the body now living. Such limitation operates doubly; first, to point out the person, then to give the inheritance. That is an authority depending upon three judgments in the courts below, and two in this house. The children, therefore, in this case, must take an estate of inheritance, and for that purpose, William must take an estate tail. In Wharton v. Gresham (2 Black. Rep. 1083), although the devise was to sons,‡ one branch only of issue, the Court held, that the tenant for life had an estate tail. In Hodges v. Middleton (Douglt. Rep. 415.—See post, p. 38), the words child or children are used throughout the will, the limitation over is on failure of children, not issue. The Court collects the intention to give the parent the inheritance, from the use of these words as a class. So in Jones v. Morgan (1 B. C. C. 206), Lord Thurlow held, that where children are to take as a class, they must take as heirs.

As to the argument founded on the word such, and its reference to the immediate antecedent child; the words are "for want of such issue;" and the fair construction, even grammatically, is not by a narrow reference to the last preceding object designated, but generally to all the limitations, to "heirs, issue, or children." Reading all the clauses of the will together, it means in default of all the issue before named or specified. It is said, the testator himself has explained what he means [28] by heirs of the body. But he does not say that children only are to take as heirs of the body; but that they are to take in the first instance, the first in the order of succession. So in Robinson v. Robinson (1 Burr. 38, and 2 Ves. 225), and Pierson v. Vickers (5 East, 548), the word such occurred, following the word "son" in the first, and "sons and daughters" in the latter case. Yet the Court held in both those cases, that the word "such" referred to issue generally, and was not restricted to sons and daughters. So also in Doe v. Goldsmith.

The question, whether cross remainders are to be implied between the children as tenants for life, ought to be decided for the satisfaction of the Plaintiffs in Error, if the judgment is against them. It ought to be ascertained by the judgment, which of the Plaintiffs below are entitled, that the Plaintiffs in Error may know the grounds on which they are deprived of the estate, if that should be the result.

The words heirs of the body having, in the present case, been considered to mean children, the subsequent words, "and for want of such issue," were held by the

* This case is reported in a former proceeding between different parties, but upon the same question and title, in 1 Ventr. 334, under the name of James v. Richardson. Upon the writ of error in the second proceeding it is reported, 2 Ventr. 311, under the name of Burchett v. Durdant; and upon the point urged in the above argument, the Court certainly held that G. D. took an estate tail, upon the ground that heirs is nomen collectivum. But the Court further held, "that in case the first words, (viz.) heirs of the body now living, would carry but an estate for life to G. D. yet the subsequent words would make an entail in him, (viz.) and to such other heirs, male and female, as he should hereafter happen to have of his body. This would clearly vest an entail in G. D. he being heir of the body of Robert, and surviving Robert." This case is also reported by Keble, 3, 832. Pollexfen, 457, Jones, 99, Levinz, 2, 232, and Raymond, 330, as between James and Richardson; and in Carthew, 151, Skinner, 205, and Comberbach, 153, as between Burchett v. Durdant.

† This must be understood fee-tail, for such was the decision.

‡ It was to A. and his sons in tail male; and for want of such issue over, and A. had no issue at the date of the will, or at the death of the testator.—See Wilde's case, 6 Rep. 16.

judges in the Court below to refer only to children; for such, it was said, is a word of reference. But why, it may be asked, not extend it to the heirs of the body, to whom the estate was expressly given? There is certainly considerable evidence, on the face of the will, that the testator intended that William's children should take by purchase; but there is stronger evidence that he meant them to take such an estate as they could transmit to their issue, so as to include all, "the heirs of the body of William issuing," for want of which [29] only he intended the estate to go over to his own right heirs. Some stress was laid upon the circumstance that the estate was expressly devised to William for his life. But that circumstance has been disregarded in similar cases, even where the strong negative words only and no longer have been superadded. But it is material in this view, that it shows, by opposition, that he did not intend the children to take life estates only. "To William for life, and after his decease to his children." Had he intended them also to take for life only, he would, of course, have said so. Lord Mansfield often truly observed, that when a man gives a house to one, he always means to give the entire interest in it, the same as if he had given him a horse. To effect this intention the Courts have gone great lengths, to supply by other words and implications, the want of express words of inheritance. This is the only case in which express words of inheritance have been cut down to life estates only, and this in order to effectuate a supposed intention, which in itself is absurd, and evidence of which is wanting on the face of the will.

It is said, the provision and devise, if one child, to that one, includes the other case, viz. of there being more than one, in which case they were all to take. Granted. But still it remains to show, that, because the children were to take, they were to take life estates only. "If but one child, the whole to that one child," i.e. the whole estate, and also the testator's interest in it. This is what the testator meant, although his meaning cannot in this way be effectuated. The gift over, "for want of such issue," afforded irresistible evidence of the [30] intention that the estate should not go over until a general failure of William's issue. The force of those words was taken away by considering them to apply only to children. The will, as it stands by force of the decision in the Court below, is certainly a very different disposition from that which the testator intended to make.

The will made by the judgment in the Court below is to William for life; remainder to his sons and daughters as he shall appoint, but not giving them more than life estates: in default of appointment, to his sons and daughters share and share alike for their lives; and if there shall only be one child born, the whole to that one for life; and after the death of each child, his or her share over.

It was only by this construction that it was possible to weaken the force of the words "for want of such issue." Lord Northampton has observed, that "for want of such issue," means for default of such issue. There is something, he adds, of peculiar force in this expression, and the law supposes the inheritance already attached in the first taker, but liable to be defeated by a subsequent event, his dying without issue (T. R. 227, note). So Mr. Justice Lawrence said, in Pierson v. Fickers (5 East, 552), that these words are always construed to mean an indefinite failure of issue, unless restrained by other words. In this case there are no such words, nor any authority in the books for the construction which has been put upon the words actually used by the testator.

It is immaterial whether the words were heirs of the body or children, in either case the intention [31] would be equally apparent to pass the inheritance. A tenancy in common is incompatible with an estate tail in the parent, but that does not prove that the testator intended the children to take for life only.

The following rules may be safely laid down:

I. That a devise may, in favour of the intention, include all a man's possible issue, although in terms only a particular class is included.

II. That if words are used which denote an intention to give the estate to the children by purchase, they shall take in that character, where they can take by force of the will, such an estate as will include all the issue, so that the estate may not go over before a total failure of issue.

III. That although such an intention is apparent, yet where the general intention, viz. to include all the issue, can only be effectuated by vesting an estate tail in the parent, he shall take that quantity of interest in opposition to the words of the will. The particular intent of the testator shall be sacrificed in favour of his general intent.

The leading authority on the first rule is Robinson v. Robinson (1 Burr. 38, and 2 Ves. 225). There the testator devised his estate to Lancelot Hicks, for and during the term of his natural life and no longer, provided that he altered his name to Robinson, and lived at his house of Bodlyne. And after his decease to such son as he shall have lawfully to be begotten, taking the name of Robinson; and for default of such issue then, I bequeath the same to my cousin, Wm. R. and his heirs for ever. The judges certi-[32]-fied that Lancelot must by necessary implication to effectuate the manifest general intent of the testator, be construed to take an estate in tail male, he and the heirs of his body taking the name of Robinson, notwithstanding the express estate devised to him for his life and no longer.* This cause was decided the same way in the Court of Chancery; and afterwards, upon great consideration, was affirmed in the House of Lords (3 B. P. C. 180). It was the leading authority upon which Lord Kenyon decided many similar cases, all of which will be over-ruled, if the children in this case shall be held to take for life only.

The power in this case is in favour of the Plaintiff in Error; but we may strike out the power, without weakening the effect of the other words, upon the authority of Seale v. Barter (2 Bos. and Pull. 485).

In Robinson v. Robinson, the limitation, after Lancelot Hicks' decease, was to such son as he shall have lawfully to be begotten, taking the name; and for default of such issue over.

Will any lawyer attempt to distinguish the cases, with a view to show that Mr. Robinson intended to include all Mr. Hicks' issue, and that Mr. Pershouse did not intend to include all Mr. Wright's issue.

The case of Robinson v. Robinson is a decisive authority also in favour of the general construction of the words "for want of such issue." According to the decision of this case in the Court below, the will in Robinson v. Robinson [33] should have been construed as giving an estate for life in Lancelot, with remainder to his first son for life, with remainder over. There no words like heirs of the body intruded themselves. It was not necessary to take away the force of any words, but merely to put a plain construction on the words which the testator had actually used; and they were simply to Lancelot for life, then to such son as he should have, and for default over.

In the case of Picerson v. Fickers (5 East. 548), which was decided by Lord Ellenborough, C. J. Lawrence, J. Grose, J. and Le Blanc, J. the limitations were to the testator's daughter, Ann, and to the heirs of her body lawfully to be begotten, whether sons or daughters, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and in default of such issue, to his sisters for their joint lives; remainder to a trustee to preserve contingent remainders: and after the decease of either of them, to all and every the child and children of, etc. whether sons or daughters, and their heirs and assigns for ever, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; it was held that Ann took an estate tail, notwithstanding the argument, that the testator had explained heirs of the body to mean children, viz. sons and daughters. How, said Lord Ellenborough, do you get rid of the words, "in default of such issue?" Such, it was insisted, had reference to sons and daughters. The testator, it was said, meant the estate to go over, if Ann left no sons or daughters living at her death. But [34] Mr. Justice Lawrence asked, what is there in the will to confine the words, "in default of issue," to issue living at the time of Ann's death? Because, (it was answered,) a fee was before given to the children;† but the learned Judge added, "these words are always construed to mean an indefinite failure of issue, unless restrained by other words." This is a decisive authority. Where is the distinction between the cases! The devise here, it may be said, is expressly to W. for life; whereas, the other devise, is in one sentence to Ann and the heirs of her body. But we have seen, that an express devise to a man for his life and no longer, is in these cases immaterial. It is immaterial, Lord Thurlow observes, in Jones v. Morgan, that the testator meant the first estate to be an estate for life. "I take it that in all cases the testator does mean so. I rest it upon what he meant afterwards. If he meant that every other person, who should be his heir, should take, he then meant what the law could not suffer him to give, or the heir to take as a purchaser. All possible heirs must take as heirs." If then we discard as utterly unwarranted by law this distinction, the next difference is, that the testator, in the supposed explanation of what he means by "heirs of the body," in the one case speaks of children, in the other of sons or daughters. Children is a stronger expression in favour of an estate tail than sons or daughters. Sons or daughters, it may be said, mean males or females. No doubt [35] they do; but considered, as the words in our case have been in the judgment below, they mean males or females who are "sons and daughters," not males and females who are grandsons and granddaughters. Besides, in Pierson v. Fickers, the testator had expressly in a subsequent part of the will said, that, when speaking of sons or daughters, he meant children, and children only. For in the devise over to the children of his sisters in fee, (who took strictly by purchase,) he says, "to their children, whether sons or daughters." Did this mean whether grandsons or granddaughters? If not, how was that meaning collected in the prior part of the will, except from the very words which are found in the present case, and lead to the same construction. But in our case, it may be urged, that the testator says "if only one child," etc. The same thing is implied in Pierson v. Fickers, for it is quite clear that if there had been only one child, he was as competent to take as an only child in our case would be. In both of the cases there was a manifest intent to include all the issue. In the case of Pierson v. Fickers, that intent was effectuated in the face of obstacles which do not occur in this case. It is impossible that the decisions in the two cases can stand together.

* And (it should be added, to complete the proof of the proposition,) the express devise to his son.

† Not so expressly to the children of the daughter.

The case of Doe and Burnsall (6 Term Rep. 30) was relied upon as supporting the judgment in the Court below, but there the children took the fee; the words being large enough for that purpose; and therefore that case, like many others, must be classed under the second rule above noticed, and cannot govern a case [36] in which, if the children do take by purchase, the consequence may be, that neither they nor their issue may ever derive any benefit whatever from the devise.

The only cases which were relied upon in favour of the words "for want of such issue," being construed "and after the deaths of the children," were Hay v. Lord Corentrey (3 Term Rep. 83), and Denn v. Page (and the note). But those cases differ, toto calo, from the present. There, after a regular provision for sons in tail, a limitation was added to daughters without words of inheritance; and for want of such issue over. That is not an improbable disposition, and cannot be compared with this case. Upon the judgment in Denn v. Page, Lord Kenyon has made the following observations (in Dacre v. Dacre, 8 T. R. 116):—"The case of Denn d. Braddon v. Page, has been relied on by the Plaintiffs in Error, where Lord Mansfield intimated an opinion that there was a blunder in the will. I find myself pressed by whatever fell from so great a judge, and it is always with doubt and distrust of my own mind that I differ from him in opinion; but I am not prepared to say that there was any blunder in that will. There the deviser gave to S. Nash, the son of T. and M. Nash, for life, remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, remainder to the first and other sons of S. Nash, and the heirs male of his and their bodies; then having provided for the male heirs (who are generally the favourites in cases of land-[37]-ed property), it is not improbable that it should occur to the testator to provide for the present generation, and therefore he devised to all and every the daughters of the body of T. Nash, by his then wife, and for default of such issue, to the right heirs of T. Nash for ever. Now, when there is nothing in the will to lead to such a supposition, why should it be supposed that that was a blunder which brought forward the daughters of sons in preference to the issue of the sisters. I have known many cautious testators make limitations in their wills like that." In the above case clearly all the children took by purchase; the sons express estates of inheritance, the daughters estates of freehold only. It was not a gift to children generally, but to daughters, a particular class of issue. And the words, "for want of such issue," were satisfied by the previous estates of inheritance in the sons, and the life estates in the daughters. It never occurred to any judge that that case clashed with Robinson v. Robinson, or Pierson v. Vickers, which are clear and decisive authorities, that in a case like this, the words, "for want of such issue," mean a general failure of issue.

This is the first case in the books in which the force and operation of the words "heirs of the body" have been so frittered away; but even if it be conceded, that the testator has explained the words heirs of the body to mean children, yet it would equally follow, that all the posterity of William were intended to take.

In Wilde's case (6 Rep. 16, Mo. 397) there was a devise to A. for life, [38] remainder to B. and the heirs of his body, remainder to Rowland Wilde and his wife, and after their decease to their children, Rowland and his wife then having a son and a daughter, it was ruled that "they took joint estates for their lives: but if A. devised to B. and his children or issues, and he hath not issue at the time of the devise, the same is an estate tail." According to Moore's report, Popham, and Gawdy, held that Wyld took an estate tail, notwithstanding that he had children living at the time of the devise, though Fenner and Clench thought it was only an estate for life, all agreed that it was an estate tail if no children. In the present case William had no children at the time of the devise or at the death of the testator.

So a devise "to William for the term of his life (as in the present case), and after his decease to the men children of his body; and if William die without man child of his body," then over was held to be an estate tail in William (1 And. 13). There are other authorities to the same effect.

The case of Hodges and Middleton (Doug. 431), bears closely upon this, if the words, heirs of the body, are to be read as children. There the devise was of real estate to A. and at her death to her children, and in case of failure of children, over. A. had issue living at the death of the testatrix, and at the date of the will. The Court inclined to think that A. took in tail, but if she took only for life, they held that the children would take in tail. It is a powerful authority against the decision in the present case.

So in Seale v. Barter (2 B. and P. 485), where the devise was [39] to the testator's son John and his children, lawfully to be begotten, with power for him to settle the same on them; and for default of such issue, over. John had no issue at the date of the will, and it was held that he took an estate tail.

No answer was attempted to be given to these authorities, which directly prove that William Wright became entitled to an estate tail under Pershouse's will.

It is not necessary to demonstrate that the intention cannot be effectuated under the second rule. It is clear, that, if the children are to take by purchase, they cannot take all the interest which the testator intended. The very decision in their favour gives them merely life estates as tenants in common, which in event might not give to them any beneficial interest. In all the cases which it is possible to cite from the books, where the heirs have been held to take by purchase, the words of the will were sufficient to give them an estate, which would include all the issue for whom the testator intended to provide. There are several cases accordingly, in which, although the children taking by purchase, would take an estate tail; yet that construction was not adopted, because cross remainders could not be raised between them.*

The consequence of the exclusion of the case from the second rule, is, that it falls within the third. Certainly the intention that the children should take as tenants in common is incompatible with an estate tail in the parent; but it has long been the settled law of the land, that that circumstance shall give way to the general [40] intention to include all the issue. King v. Burchall (Ambl. 379, 4 T. Rep. 296), Doe v. Applin (4 T. Rep. 83), Doe v. Smith (7 T. Rep. 531), Doe v. Cooper (1 East. 229), and Pierson v. Vickers (5 East. 518), have decided this point beyond the reach of controversy. It will be conceded, that all William's possible issue can only take through him. He therefore, to effectuate the testator's manifest general intent, must be held to take an estate tail.

For the Defendants in Error: W. E. Taunton and C. Puller.

The ejectment was brought on behalf of the children; and an attempt was made

* As to implication of cross remainders, see post, [2 Bl.] p. 17, note to argue the case, on the ground that cross remainders were to be implied among the children. But as the heirs were made parties to the action in a distinct count, the Court refused to hear that argument; and the judgment was entered up on the count for the heirs, which might be applied in favour of the children. If cross remainders can be implied, the entry of the judgment is wrong. But this does not affect the substance of the case. The proposition to be maintained is, that William took only an estate for life, with remainder for life to the children. On the other side they contend that the testator had two intentions, and that one is paramount; viz. that the estate shall not go to the ultimate remainder man, until after an indefinite failure of issue. There is no such paramount intent. The testator designates the class of persons among whom the power is to be exercised, and gives the estate over, on failure of the ob-[41]-jects of the power, if they should not be living at the death of the tenant for life. That the words "heirs, or heirs of the body," have not always their strict technical meaning in so extensive a sense as the Plaintiffs in Error contend, it is sufficient to quote Archer's case (1 Co. 66). That case is not indeed applicable in terms, which can rarely happen in the case of a will. But it may be cited to prove that there is no such essential virtue in the word heir, that it must carry the estate to all generations. Walker v. Snow (Palm. 359), Lisle v. Gray (2 Lev. 223, Raym. 278), White v. Collins (Com. Rep. 289), Lawe v. Davies (2 Lord Raym. 1561), Doe v. Laming,* and Goodtitle v. Herring († East. 264), may be adduced in proof of the same proposition.

In Lawe v. Davies, the devise was to B. and his heirs, lawfully to be begotten, that is to say, to his first, etc. sons successively to be begotten of the body of the said B.; and the heirs of the body of such first, etc. sons successively, etc. remainder over. That was held an estate for life in B. notwithstanding the subsequent limitation, to the heirs of the body of, etc. In the cases before cited, the words heirs of the body, or words equivalent, were contained in the instrument creating the limitations. Yet persons designated by those words were held to take by purchase. These words therefore may give less than the inheritance. In Goodtitle v. Herring, Lord Kenyon, speaking of [42] the technical force of those words, in delivering judgment, says, "it never has been decided that those words might not be otherwise explained in a will by the testator himself. They were so explained in Lawe v. Davies:" and afterwards he adds, "In former times indeed, greater strictness was attributed to the meaning of the words, 'heirs of the body.'" Here those words, as they are explained by the testator, are descriptive of the class of persons among whom the power was to be exercised; and it is the manifest intent of the testator, that if no such objects should be living at the decease of the tenant for life, the estate should go to the remainder-man.

The words of the will are to be weighed and considered, and also the fact that William was a natural son of the sister of the devisor. If the will had ended at the words "heirs of the body," where it occurs in the limitation over, for want of appointment, William, though the previous estate is to him expressly for life, would undoubtedly have taken an estate tail. As to the argument founded on Seale v. Barter (2 B. and P. 485), if it is supposed to show that such a power of appointment is sufficient to give an estate tail, no such thing was decided in Seale v. Barter; nor do we argue that such power of appointment cannot possibly subsist with an estate tail, or that it is inconsistent with its nature. The limitations in Seale v. Barter are very different from the limitations in this case. In Seale v. Barter the question arose upon the codicil, which the Court held ought to be construed without reference to, or not to be [43] controlled by, the will. By the codicil the estates were devised to J. S. and his children, lawfully to be begotten, with power for J. S. to settle the same on such of them as he should think proper; and for default of such issue, to, etc. Such a devise, without doubt, gave an estate tail to the son, no child of J. S. being in existence at the date of the will, or the death of the testator: and the Court properly held, that the power given to defeat or abridge the estate tail by appointment, did not of itself destroy that estate.

In this case there is no paramount intention that the estate should not go over, but upon indefinite failure of issue. The words "heirs of the body" must receive a limited construction. The testator himself translates the words, and shows what persons he means by "heirs of the body." In the first instance, clearly he must mean the children. If so, can he in the subsequent use of the same words mean something different? To make the will consist with the construction attempted by the Plaintiffs in Error, a multitude of words must be struck out of the instrument, "Share and shure alike, as tenants in common; and if but one child, the whole to such only child." All these words must be expunged. According to their construction, the former clause of these words is inconsistent, and the latter superfluous.

* 2 Burr. 1100. † 1 Black Rep. 265. et vide 3 Durnf. and East's Rep. a note on this case.

The words, "in default of such issue," must refer to the issue contemplated, as objects of the power of appointment, not issue indefinitely. Between a devise over to right heirs, and to a stranger, there is a material distinction. In the former case the party dies virtually intestate: for the devise is in-[44]-operative; the heir takes by descent. But where the devise is to A. B. and then over to a stranger, he can only take in the event specially provided by the testator. An heir at law is not to be disinherited, but by express words or necessary implication. A special object of bounty must bring himself within the intent of the testator. Here the plain intent is, that if there should be no children of William, the estate should go over to the sister. "Heirs of the body" cannot here consistently mean all generations of issue, as in case of an estate tail. The donee of the power could not have appointed so as to give indefinitely to his issue for ever. William, (for instance,) could not have appointed to his eldest son, grandson, great grandson, etc. The clear intent was, that he should limit to the children living at or before his death. Could he pass by the existing generation, and appoint to a future descendant, however remote? That is forbidden by the law against perpetuities.

The provision in default of appointment for the special event, if there should be but one child, that he should take the estate, manifests the intent of the donor, that the power should be exercised among children. There is but one case adverse to this construction, Doe v. Goldsmith (7 Taunt. 209). It is an extraordinary argument to say that case is free from prejudice, because former cases were not there cited. That is rather a ground to impeach the authority of that case. If there is plain demarcation of the objects to which the words heirs of the body are applied, the power of appointment cannot be extended beyond them. The [45] limitation over, is not in default of the issue of William, or generally, but in default of such issue, i.e. the particular objects of the appointment.

"Heirs of the body," in the clause conferring the power, and the limitation in default of appointment, means such heirs within a limited time, the life of William, the donee of the power. In default of such issue, can only mean such specific issue as before designated. There is, therefore, a total absence of the supposed paramount intention to give the estate over, only upon indefinite failure of issue. If so, the secondary, as it is called, being in fact the only intent, must prevail.

There are no words of limitation superadded, and consequently the children must take for life, according to the doctrine established in Hay v. Earl of Coventry (3 T.R. 83). There the limitation was to F. C. for life, remainder to her first and other sons in tail male; and in default of such issue, to the use of all and every the daughters of F. C. as tenants in common; and in default of such issue to his right heirs. That it is to "children" in one case, and daughters in the other, makes no difference in principle, and the limitation, over, is in the same words. The argument in that case, was not that it was to be presumed the testator did not mean to give an estate tail to the daughters, because he had expressly given one to the sons; but on the contrary, that the gift to the sons furnished a presumption of a similar intention as to the daughters, as appears by the judgment of Lord Kenyon, in which, upon this point he says, "I cannot find any words in the will to warrant [46] such a construction. If indeed, the word such had not been introduced in this clause, we might, perhaps, have said, that as issue is genus generalissimum, it should include all the progeny. But here the word such is relative, and restrains the words which accompany it."

In White v. Collins (Comyns. Rep. 289), the first limitation was to F. for life, and after his death to the heir male of his body for life; and the limitation over was for default of such heir male. It was held to mean such as before mentioned, that is, an heir male who was to take for life. In the present case, for want of words of inheritance, it is, by construction of law, an estate for life in the children. That circumstance does not, in principle, make it different from the case of White v. Collins, where the estate is given to the heir expressly for life. These are cases directly applicable, as authorities to the words of this will.

In the cases cited on behalf of the Plaintiff in Error, there was a paramount intent sufficient to over-rule the secondary intent. Robinson v. Robinson is the strongest of that class of cases, having words clearly indicating the intent, that the remainder should not take effect, but upon failure of all the issue of the particular tenant. The word used in the devise in that case, was son in the singular number. It was argued that the word was intended as nomen collectivum, meaning all the heirs for ever, and that the limitation over was to be construed and guided by that intent. In the certificate that argument was adopted: and it is to be noticed that in Robinson v. Robinson, the tes-[47]-tator at the end gave to L. H. the perpetuity of certain presentations in the same manner as he had given his estates.

In Wharton v. Gresham (2 Blac. Rep. 1083), there was an express limitation in tail.

As to the dictum quoted from Jones v. Morgan, there is no doubt that to enable all the heirs to take by descent, the ancestor must have an estate of descendible quality. That principle is not denied; but the words of the will in that case were different from the words in this.

In Bunnet v. Lord Tankerville (19 Ves. 170), the limitation over was in case of dying without issue of the body, referring to the words heirs of the body, which had been used before. The intent that all the issue should succeed in turn, could not be effectuated without giving an estate tail to the parent, which necessarily enlarged the estate for life. In Doe v. Aplin, Chandler v. Smith, Doe v. Cooper, and Pierson v. Fickers, the intent is clear, that the estate should not go over, but upon indefinite failure of issue. And it is to be observed, that in all those cases, the limitation over is to a stranger, who is a gratuitous object of the testator's bounty, and must bring himself within the clear intent. In this devise the limitation over is to the heir.

Frank v. Storin is the case of an estate tail by implication. So in Colson v. Colson, Mogg v. Mogg, and Doe v. Webb,* which were decided on special [48] grounds. In Burchett v. Durdant, the first question was whether the first limitation by way of use was executed. The decision was, that the use was not executed. But the authority of the case on that point has since been questioned.† A limitation to permit A. to receive, etc. would be a use executed. The second point in that case was, whether the remainder was contingent or vested, it being to the heir of B. now living. There was a son living at the date of the will and death of the devisor. Under such circumstances, the court held it a description of the person, and a vested remainder.

In Hodges v. Middleton (Doug. 431), the word "estate" occurred in the first limitation, and it was given over on failure of children, that is, of children indefinitely, which creates an estate tail by implication, upon the same principle as the words issue, etc. Lief v. Saltingstone is not applicable. The power in that case was altogether different. The decision in that case established only this doctrine, that a power of appointment may extend to an appointment in fee. That is not inconsistent with an estate for life in the donee, but the contrary. By a decision in favour of the Plaintiff in Error, the doctrines of implication would be carried beyond all former bounds. Here the words of the will clearly import the immediate children of the tenant for life. These were manifestly the heirs of the body in the [49] contemplation of the testator. He has so explained himself.

* 1 Tau. Rep. 231. The question in this case was upon a devise to F. and M. and A. and the heirs of their bodies respectively as tenants in common, whether cross-remainders could be implied between three devisees. It was decided in the affirmative, on the ground of manifest intent appearing in the will that the estate should not be divided, but upon the limitation over go as an entirety.—See Roe v. Clayton, 6 East. 668, 1 Dow. 384.

† By Lord Holt in Broughton v. Langley, 2 L. Raym. 873, 2 Salk. 679.

Gretton v. Haward (6 Tau. 94), Goodtitle v. Woodhull,* Doe v. Goff,† are all authorities in favour of the Defendant in Error, applicable generally in language and in principle, if not in precise circumstance. As in those cases, so in this, "such issue" must mean such descendants of William, to whom he might, and by the will it was intended, he should appoint, that is, children. No paramount intent is to be collected from the circumstances of the case. The fact that William was an illegitimate son, is adverse to his claim.

The Lord Chancellor (at the conclusion of the reply). "It is a general rule of law, to be collected from a consideration of all the cases, that a particular intent expressed in a will, must give way to a general intent. It is surprising that so much pains should have been taken to establish such a rule, the effect of which is, usually, to enable the first taker to destroy both general and particular intent. The words heirs of the body, prima facie, mean all descendants; and it is likewise a rule of law, [50] that all descendants should take under these words, unless they are clearly qualified and restricted by other words so as to give them a more limited sense. The great judicial difficulty arises in the application of these rules to the words of each will. I cannot admit that all the cases cited have been well decided: but it was hardly to be expected that judges should agree in the decision of all these cases; for the mind is overpowered by their multitude, and the subtlety of the distinctions between them. These difficulties make it the more necessary that we should deliberate before we determine this case. The decision ought to accord with former authorities, if possible; but, at all events, we must adhere to the established rules of legal construction." Cur. adv. vult.

The Lord Chancellor (on moving the judgment). The question to be decided in this case is expressed in the words to be found in the errors assigned, the principal of which is, that the Court, by their judgment, have decided "that the said William Wright took only a life estate under the said will of the said E. Pershouse, with remainder to his children for life; and that the recovery suffered by the said William Wright, and Mary his wife, and Edward Wright, was a forfeiture of their estate. Whereas, the said R. Jesson, J. Hatley, W. Whitehouse, J. Watton, E. Dangerfield the elder, and T. Dangerfield, allege for error, that the testator intended to embrace all the issue of the said William Wright, which [51] intention can only be effected by giving to the said William Wright an estate tail, and the words of the will are fully sufficient for that purpose." I will not trouble the House by going through all the cases in which the rule has been established; that where there is a particular and a general intent, the particular is to be sacrificed to the general intent. The opinion which I have formed concurs with most, though not with every one of those cases. A great many certainly, and almost all of them coincide and concur in the establishment of that rule. Whether it was wise originally to adopt such a rule might be a matter of discussion; but it has been acted upon so long, that it would be to remove the landmarks of the law, if we should dispute the propriety of applying it to all cases to which it is applicable. There is, indeed, no reason why judges should have been anxious to set up a general intent to cut down the particular, when the end of such decision is to give power to the person having the first estate, according to the general and paramount intent to destroy the interest both under the general and the particular intent. However, it is definitively settled as a rule of law, that where there is a particular, and a general or paramount intent, the latter shall prevail, and courts are bound to give effect to the paramount intent.

This is a short will. The decision in the Court below has proceeded upon the notion, that no such paramount intent is to be found in this will. Here, I must remark, how important it is, that, in preparing cases to be laid before the House, great [52] care should be taken not to insert in them more than the words of the record. In page 3 of the printed case delivered on behalf of the Plaintiffs in Error,

* Willes, 592. The devise, in that case, was to a son for his life, and to his male children for their lives, and to the male children descending from them. The Court held, it was a life estate only in the son.

† Upon the citation of Doe v. Goff, Lord Redesdale observed, that the words there, "if such issue should depart this life before twenty-one," etc., were insensible, if the estates are given to the children for life. The estates in such case would go over, whether they die before or after.—See the judgment, post, [2 Bli.] p. 58.

are to be found the words "appointee in tail general of the lands, etc. thereafter granted and released of the second part." These words are not to be found in the record. I mention the fact, because, if this is to be quoted as an authority in similar cases, it may mislead those who read and have to decide upon it, if not noticed. According to the words of the will, it is absurd to suppose that the testator could have such intention as the rules of law compel us to ascribe to his will. "I give and devise unto William, one of the sons of my sister Ann Wright before marriage, all that messuage, etc. to hold the said premises unto the said William, son of my said sister Ann Wright, for and during the term of his natural life, he keeping all the said dwelling-houses and buildings in tenantable repair." If we stop here, it is clear that the testator intended to give to William an interest for life only. The next words are, "and from and after his decease, I give and devise all the said dwelling-houses, etc. unto the heirs of the body of the said William, son of my said sister Ann Wright lawfully issuing." If we stop there, notwithstanding he had before given an estate expressly to William for his natural life only, it is clear that, by the effect of these following words, he would be tenant in tail; and, in order to cut down this estate tail, it is absolutely necessary that a particular intent should be found to control [53] and alter it as clear as the general intent here expressed. The words "heirs of the body" will indeed yield, to a clear particular intent, that the estate should be only for life, and that may be from the effect of superadded words, or any expressions showing the particular intent of the testator: but that must be clearly intelligible, and unequivocal. The will then proceeds, "in such shares and proportions as he, the said William, shall, by deed, etc. appoint." This part of the will makes it necessary again to advert to the extraneous words inserted in the case of the Plaintiffs in Error, and to caution those who prepare them. "Heirs of the body" mean one person at any given time: but they comprehend all the posterity of the donee in succession: William, therefore, could not strictly and technically appoint to heirs of the body. This is the power, and then come the words of limitation over in default of execution of the power: "and for want of such gift, direction, limitation, or appointment, then to the heirs of the body of the said William, son of my said sister Ann Wright, lawfully issuing, share and share alike as tenants in common."

It has been powerfully argued (and no case was ever better argued at this bar), that the appointment could not be to all the heirs of the body in succession for ever, and, therefore, that it must mean a person, or class of persons, to take by purchase: that the descendants in all time to come could not be tenants in common; that "heirs of the body," in this part of the will, must mean the same class of persons as the "heirs of the body," among whom he had before given the power to ap-[54]-point; and, inasmuch as you here find a child described as an heir of the body, you are therefore to conclude, that heirs of the body mean nothing but children. Against such a construction many difficulties have been raised on the other side, as, for instance, how the children should take, in certain events, as where some of the children should be born and die before others come into being. How is this limitation, in default of appointment in such case, to be construed and applied? The Defendants in Error contend, upon the construction of the words in the power, and the limitation in default of appointment, that the words "heirs of the body" mean some particular class of persons within the general description of heirs of the body; and it was further strongly insisted that it must be children, because, in the concluding clause, of the limitation in default of appointment, the whole estate is given to one child, if there should be only one. Their construction is, that the testator gives the estate to William for life, and to the children as tenants in common for life. How they could so take, in many of the cases put on the other side, it is difficult to settle. Children are included undoubtedly in heirs of the body: and if there had been but one child, he would have been heir of the body, and his issue would have been heirs of the body: but, because children are included in the words heirs of the body, it does not follow that heirs of the body must mean only children, where you can find upon the will a more general intent comprehending more objects. Then the words, "for want of such issue," which follow, it is said, [55] mean for want of children: because the word such is referential, and the word child occurs in the limitation immediately preceding. On the other hand, it is argued, that heirs of the body being the general description of those who are to take, and the words "share and share alike as tenants in common," being words upon which it is difficult to put any reasonable construction, children would be merely objects included in the description, and so would an only child. The limitation "if but one child, then to such only child," being, as they say, the description of an individual who would be comprehended in the terms heirs of the body; for "want of such issue," they conclude, must mean for want of heirs of the body. If the words children and child are so to be considered as merely within the meaning of the words heirs of the body, which words comprehend them and other objects of the testator's bounty, (and I do not see what right I have to restrict the meaning of the word "issue") there is an end of the question. I do not go through the cases. That of Doe v. Goff is difficult to reconcile with this case—I do not say impossible; but that case is as difficult to be reconciled with other cases. Upon the whole, I think it is clear that the testator intended that all the issue of William should fail before the estate should go over according to the final limitation. I am sorry that such a decision is necessary: because, when we thus enforce a paramount intention, we enable the first taker to destroy both the general and particular intent. But it is more important to maintain the rules of law, than to provide against the hardships of particular cases.

[56] Lord Redesdale. There is such a variety of combination in words, that it has the effect of puzzling those who are to decide upon the construction of wills. It is therefore necessary to establish rules, and important to uphold them, that those who have to advise may be able to give opinions on titles with safety. From the variety and nicety of distinction in the cases, it is difficult, for a professional adviser, to say what is the estate of a person claiming under a will. It cannot at this day be argued, that, because the testator uses in one part of his will words having a clear meaning in law, and in another part other words inconsistent with the former, that the first words are to be cancelled or overthrown. In Colson v. Colson, it is clear that the testator did not mean to give an estate tail to the parent. If he meant any thing by the interposition of trustees to support contingent remainders, it was clearly his intent to give the parent an estate for life only. It is dangerous, where words have a fixed legal effect, to suffer them to be controlled without some clear expression, or necessary implication. In this case, it is argued, that the testator did not mean to use the words, "heirs of the body," in their ordinary legal sense, because there are other inconsistent words; but it only follows that he was ignorant of the effect of the one or of the other. All the cases but Doe v. Goff decide that the latter words, unless they contain a clear expression, or a necessary implication of some intent, contrary to the legal import of the former, are to be rejected. That the general intent should over-rule the particular, is not the most accurate expression of the prin-[57]-ciple of decision. The rule is, that technical words shall have their legal effect, unless, from subsequent inconsistent words, it is very clear that the testator meant otherwise. In many cases, in all, I believe, except Doe v. Goff, it has been held, that the words "tenants in common" do not over-rule the legal sense of words of settled meaning. In other cases, a similar power of appointment has been held not to over-rule the meaning and effect of similar words. It has been argued, that heirs of the body cannot take as tenants in common; but it does not follow that the testator did not intend that heirs of the body should take, because they cannot take in the mode prescribed. This only follows, that, having given to heirs of the body, he could not modify that gift in the two different ways which he desired, and the words of modification are to be rejected. Those who decide upon such cases ought not to rely on petty distinctions, which only mislead parties: but look to the words used in the will. The words, "for want of such issue," are far from being sufficient to over-rule the words "heirs of the body." They have almost constantly been construed to mean an indefinite failure of issue, and, of themselves, have frequently been held to give an estate tail. In this case the words, "such issue," cannot be construed children, except by referring to the words "heirs of the body," and in referring to those words they show another intent. The Defendants in Error interpret "heirs of the body" to mean children only, and then they say the limitation over is in default of children; but I see no ground to restrict the words [58] "heirs of the body" to mean children in this will. I think it is necessary, before I conclude, to advert to the case of "Doe v. Goff." It seems to be at variance with preceding cases. In several cases cited in the argument, it had been clearly established, that a devise to A. for life, with a subsequent limitation to the heirs of his body, created an estate in tail, and that subsequent words, such as those contained in this will, had no operation to prevent the devisee taking an estate tail. In Doe v. Goff there were no subsequent words, except the provision in case such issue should die under twenty-one, introducing the gift over. This seems to me so far from amounting to a declaration that he did not mean heirs of the body, in the technical sense of the words, that I think they peculiarly show that he did so mean—they would, otherwise, be wholly insensible. If they did not take an estate tail, it was perfectly immaterial whether they died before or after twenty-one. They seem to indicate the testator's conception, that, at twenty-one, the children would have the power of alienation. It is impossible to decide this case without holding that Doe v. Goff is not law.

In this case even admitting it to be the general intent of the testator, to give to William an estate only for life, the remainders to the children, might as easily be defeated, because William might, by agreement with the heir, have destroyed their estates before they arose. Suppose he had had a child who died, and then he had committed a forfeiture, the devisee over would have entered and enjoyed the estate. Suppose he had several children, and some had died, and some had been living, the [59] proportions would have been changed, and after-born children would not have come in to take the shares of those who were dead. These are absurdities arising out of the construction proposed. If the testator had considered the effect of the words he used, and the rule of law operating upon them, he probably would have used none of the words in the will.

Judgment reversed.

Franklin v. Lay. My friend, Mr. Sugden, has kindly furnished me with the following note of this case:—

"I give to my grandson, John Franklyn, all that my moiety or half part of and in all that messuage, tenement, and farm, lands and premises, situate, lying, and being in Great Bromley, in the county of Essex, called the Brush Farm, as the same is now in the occupation of my nephew, Wm. Barnard, of Lawford, in the same county, farmer, to hold the said moiety of the said farm, lands, and premises unto my grandson, John Franklyn, and to the issue of his body lawfully to be begotten; and to the heirs of such issue for ever, but subject and chargeable with the payment of the mortgage of £400 and interest to my brother-in-law, Thomas Barnard, of Lawford aforesaid, farmer. But if my said grandson, John Franklyn, shall die without leaving any issue of his body lawfully begotten, then I give and devise the said moiety of the said messuage, farm, lands, and premises, with the appurtenances, unto my said nephew, Wm. Barnard, and to his heirs for ever. Held to be an estate tail in John." Franklin v. Lay, Vice-Chancellor, May 3, 1820.

IRELAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

MARIA ARABELLA Dowager Marchioness of LANSDOWNE,—Appellant; The Most Noble HENRY Marquis of LANSDOWNE, and WILLIAM Earl of WYCOMBE, a Minor, by the said HENRY Marquis of LANSDOWNE, his Father and Guardian,—Respondents [3d July 1820].

[Mews' Dig. iv. 258; viii. 219, 280, 502. Cited in Holmes v. Holmes, 1830, 1 Russ. and My. 660, at p. 662. See also Graham v. Koble, 1820, 2 Bli. at p. 126 With reference to obiter of Lord Redesdale (2 Bli. at p. 97); see note to Lidwill v. Holland, 2 Bli. at p. 100.]

POWER in a marriage settlement to grant to a wife any annual sum of money, or yearly rentcharge to be tax-free, and without any deduction, and to be issuing out of and chargeable upon lands in Ireland, so that such rentcharge do not exceed, in the whole, the yearly sum of £3000 of lawful money of Great Britain. Held—that a rentcharge appointed under this power is payable in Ireland in the currency of England. But that the appointee is not entitled to have the sum transmitted to England free of the charge of conveyance and exchange properly so called. The lex loci contractus and the law applicable to cases of money charged as a rent payable out of land, where no provision as to the place of payment is made by the instrument, are inapplicable to a case where the instrument itself furnishes the means of interpretation.

In ambiguous contracts the domicile of the parties, the place of execution, the purpose and the various provisions and expressions of the instrument are material to be considered in the construction.

Courts of equity are not bound to adopt the opinion of the courts of law to which a case is sent for advice.

This was an appeal against an order and decree of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, in a suit instituted by the Appellant, for recovery of the arrears of her jointure charged upon the lands of the Respondents.

[61] William Marquis of Lansdowne, the father of the Respondent, Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, being seized, for the term of his life, of several estates situate partly in England and partly in Ireland, with a remainder in tailmale to John Henry Petty, commonly called Earl of Wycombe, his eldest son, by deeds* of lease and release, bearing date the 16th and 17th days of May, 1794, and made between the said William Marquis of Lansdowne, of the first part; the said John Henry Petty, Earl of Wycombe, of the second part; John Cross, of Lansdowne House, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, of the third part; John Willmott, of Bedford Row, in the said county, Esq., and Sir Francis Baring, of London, of the fourth part; and the Right Honourable Henry Richard Lord Holland, and Benjamin Vaughan, of London, Esq., of the fifth part; the greater part of the Lansdowne family estates, situate partly in England and partly in Ireland, (except certain lands in the barony of Ballycowen and King's County, Ireland,) were limited and assured, subject to certain incumbrances, then and still affecting different parts thereof,

To the use of trustees, for a term of five hundred years, upon certain trusts thereby declared, with a proviso, that the said term should cease when the trusts thereof should be satisfied; [62] which trusts have since been satisfied: and subject to the said term:

To the use of the said William, then Marquis of Lansdowne, and his assigns for his life, subject to impeachment for waste, except such waste in cutting down timber as should be committed with the consent of his son, then Earl of Wycombe, previously given by writing under his hand Remainder

To trustees to preserve contingent remainders Remainder

To the use of the said John Henry Earl of Wycombe, and his assigns, for his life, without impeachment of waste Remainder

To trustees to preserve contingent remainders Remainder

To other trustees, for a term of years, to raise portions for the younger children of the said Earl of Wycombe Remainder

To the first and other sons of the said Earl of Wycombe successively in tail male Remainder

To the Respondent, Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, then Lord Henry Petty (second son of the said William Marquis of Lansdowne, and half-brother of the same John Henry Earl of Wycombe), for his life Remainder

To trustees, to preserve contingent remainders Remainder

To the first and other sons of the said Lord Henry Petty successively in tail male, with divers remainders over.

* It has been thought expedient to set forth this settlement with particulars as to the parties, their description, and domicile, and parts of the limitations and provisions not immediately in question, which, at first sight, may appear superfluous. The reason and excuse, for so full a statement, will be found in the arguments adduced in support of the judgment.

In this settlement, after reciting, in effect, that £22,150 remained due to the said Marquis, on [63] account of certain purchases, valuations, and expenses therein mentioned or referred to (and which purchases, valuations, and expenses were all calculated and made according to the currency of money in England), it is further recited:

"That the said Marquis and Earl had valued the manor of Readingstown, otherwise Rahan, the towns and lands of Ballineur, and other lands, situate, lying, and being in the barony of Ballycowen, in the King's County, in the kingdom of Ireland, theretofore the estate of Robert Reading, Esq., at the sum of £28,000 of lawful money of Ireland, of the value of £25,846 3s. 1d. English: and that the said Marquis of Lansdowne and Earl of Wycombe had agreed that the said premises in the said barony of Ballycowen, so valued as aforesaid, should be conveyed to the said Marquis of Lansdowne, his heirs and assigns, in discharge of the sum of £22,150 remaining due to him, subject to the sum of £3696, the surplus of the said sum of £25,846, for which the said premises were valued as aforesaid, beyond the said sum of £22,150: and that the said sum of £3696 should be secured to trustees, to be by them applied in such manner as the said Marquis of Lansdowne and Earl of Wycombe shall direct." And the premises were accordingly so conveyed.

The settlement also contained recitals and confirmations of two mortgages both of lands in Ireland: the one to the Drapers' Company to secure the repayment of £30,000 advanced by them, and secured upon lands in Limerick; the other to a [64] Mr. Mills, to secure £12,000 advanced by him, and secured upon lands in Kerry.

The powers to appoint by way of jointure, upon which the immediate question in this case arose, appear in the following terms:

"Provided also, and it is further declared by and between the said parties to these presents, that notwithstanding any of the uses or limitations hereinbefore limited or contained, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Earl of Wycombe from time to time, and at any time or times either before or after his inter-marriage with any woman or women he may happen to marry, by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments in writing, to be sealed and delivered by him in the presence of, and to be attested by, two or more credible witnesses, or by his last will and testament, to be signed and published by him in the presence of, and to be attested by, three or more credible witnesses, to grant, limit, or appoint to or to the use of any woman or women with whom he the said Earl of Wycombe shall intermarry or take to wife, for the life or lives of such woman or women, and in full, or in part only, of or in the nature of her or their jointure or jointures, and in bar of her or their dower, to take effect immediately after the death of the said Earl of Wycombe, any annual sum or sums of money, or yearly rentcharge or rentcharges, to be tax-free and without any deduction, and to be issuing out of, and chargeable upon, all or any part of the said manors, messuages, farms, lands, tenements, [65] hereditaments, and premises, hereinbefore mentioned, and intended to be hereby granted and released, which are situate in the said kingdom of Ireland (other than and except the said manors, hereditaments, and premises in the said county of Kerry, mentioned in the said second schedule hereunto annexed, or hereunder written), so that such rentcharge or rentcharges do not, during the lifetime of the said Marquis of Lansdowne, exceed in the whole the yearly sum of two thousand pounds of lawful money of Great Britain, and do not, after the decease of the said Marquis of Lansdowne, exceed in the whole the yearly sum of three thousand pounds of lawful money of Great Britain, and so that such rentcharges be subject, and without prejudice to, the aforesaid term of five hundred years, and the trusts thereof. And it is hereby further provided and declared, that in case the said Earl of Wycombe shall, by virtue of the power hereinbefore to him reserved, grant, limit, and appoint to or for the use of any woman or women with whom he may happen to intermarry, any such rentcharge or rentcharges, annual sum or annual sums, as aforesaid, he the said Earl of Wycombe shall have full power, by the same or any other deed, or by his last will, as aforesaid, to give or grant to such woman or women, and her and their assigns, the usual powers and remedies, by distress and entry, for recovery of such rentcharge and rentcharges when in arrear, and to limit all or any of the said manors, messuages, farms, lands, tenements, [66] hereditaments, and premises, chargeable therewith, to any trustee or trustees for any term or number of years, for the better securing the payment of such rentcharge or rentcharges as aforesaid, as to him the said Earl of Wycombe shall seem meet; so as such term and terms of years, in case any such shall be limited, shall be made defeazable on the full payment of the rentcharge or rentcharges thereby secured, and all arrears thereof, and all costs and charges relating thereto.*

To this settlement were annexed three schedules, containing the names of the tenements conveyed, and of the occupiers, and the rents at which they were respectively held, valued in Irish and English currency. This settlement was executed in England.

William Marquis of Lansdowne died in May, 1805; and upon his death, John Henry, Earl of Wycombe, became Marquis of Lansdowne, and succeeded to the family estates under the limitations of the settlement.

John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne married the Appellant in his father's lifetime. By a deed of appointment, bearing date the 20th of February, 1809, executed by him in the presence of, and attested by, two witnesses, after reciting the settlement of 1794, and the power of jointuring contained therein, and also reciting that he had resolved to exercise the said power of jointuring, and by virtue thereof to settle upon the Ap-[67]-pellant during her life, if she should happen to survive him, a clear annuity or yearly rentcharge of three thousand pounds English money for her jointure, and in bar of dower and freebench; and to secure the payment thereof, by the means and in the manner therein mentioned: it was witnessed, that the said John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, in consideration of his love and affection for the Appellant, his wife, and to make a suitable provision for her maintenance and support, if she should happen to survive him, and by virtue and in exercise of the power or authority given or reserved to him by virtue of the said settlement, and of any other power or authority whatsoever vested in, or enabling him in that behalf, did grant, limit, and appoint, that from and after the death of him the said John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, the Appellant, his wife (in case she should happen to survive him), or her assigns, should and might have, receive, and take, during the term of the natural life of her the said Appellant, and for her jointure, and in lieu, bar, and recompense of her dower and freebench, of and in all or any of the freehold, customary, or copyhold estates of the said John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, one annuity or yearly rentcharge of three thousand pounds of lawful money of Great Britain, to be issuing out of, and charged and chargeable upon, all and every the manors, messuages, towns, lands, tenements, and hereditaments whatsoever, which the said John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne had power to charge with a jointure, under, or by vir-[68]-tue, or in pursuance of the said settlement of 1794 (except such hereditaments contained in the said settlement, if any, as had been sold or exchanged, in execution of the power in that behalf contained in the same settlement): to be payable and paid to the Appellant, or her assigns, at the common dining-hall of Lincoln's Inn, in the county of Middlesex, by four equal quarterly payments, etc. in every year, tax-free, and without any deduction: the first payment thereof to begin and be made on such of those days of payment as should happen next after the death of the said John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne; and also, that in case and so often as the said annual rent or clear yearly sum of £3000, or any quarterly payment thereof, should happen to be behind or unpaid, in part or in all, by the space of fourteen days next after any of the said days of payment whereon the same ought to be paid as aforesaid, then and from time to time, as often as it should so happen, it should and might be lawful to and for the Appellant and her assigns to enter into and distrain upon all and singular the said hereditaments and premises thereby charged with the same yearly rentcharge or sum of £3000 or intended so to be, and every of them, or any part or parts thereof, in like manner as in the case of distress taken for rent, reserved by landlords on common demises for years; to the intent that the Appellant and her assigns might be fully satisfied and paid the same annual rent or clear yearly sum of £3000, and every part thereof so in arrear [69] and unpaid, and all costs, damages, and expenses attending the taking such distress and distresses, or to be sustained by reason of the non-payment thereof, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said appointment.

And for the considerations before expressed, and for the more effectually securing the payment of the jointure, the said John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, in further exercise and execution of the power given or reserved to him by the settlement of 1794, did, by the deed now stating, grant, limit, and appoint, that all the manors, messuages, towns, farms, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises thereinbefore charged with the said annual rent or sum of £3000, or intended so to be, with their and every of their rights, members, and appurtenances, should, from and immediately after the death of him the said Marquis, remain and be (subject nevertheless and charged with the said annual sum or yearly rent, and the said powers and remedies for recovering the same) to the use of Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt Jones and John Dent therein described, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of three hundred years, to commence and be computed from the death of him the said Marquis, upon certain trusts thereby declared, for better securing the payment of the jointure on the days whereon the same was thereinbefore made payable.*

[70] This deed also was executed in England; and at the time of the execution thereof all the parties interested therein were domiciled and resided in England.

John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne died without issue on the 14th November, 1809, leaving the Appellant his widow; and upon his death Lord Henry Petty, now Marquis of Lansdowne, his half-brother, succeeded to and entered upon and took possession of all the said estates in Ireland, under the settlement of 1794, the net rents of which estates produced about £30,000 a year.

On the 26th day of October, 1813, the Appellant filed her bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against the said Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, William Earl of Wycombe, his eldest son, the Right Honourable Richard Lord Holland, and Benjamin Vaughan, Esq. Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt Jones, and John Dent, Esq. setting forth the deed of settlement, the appointment, and facts beforementioned, and stating (among other things) that, since the decease of the said John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, four years of the said jointure of £3000 had become due to the Appellant under the said deed of appointment of the 20th day of February, 1809; and that all payments which the Appellant had hitherto been able to obtain on account of it amounted only to a sum of £4350; and further stating, that the said William Earl of Wycombe was tenant in tail, under the said deed of the 17th of May, 1794; and that the Appellant had frequently requested the said Henry Marquis of [71] Lansdowne to pay the arrears of her said jointure, which he had declined doing; and that the Appellant had requested the said Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt Jones and John Dent, to raise and pay the arrears of the said annuity; and charging that the said William Marquis of Lansdowne, and the said John Henry, late Marquis of Lansdowne, resided in England at the time of the execution of the said deed of the 17th of May, 1794, and had always resided, and then intended to reside there, and used the words lawful money of Great Britain where they occur in the deed of settlement in their strict technical meaning; and also charging that in and by the same deed, where mention is made of certain lands in the King's County, which were assigned to the then Marquis of Lansdowne, at a valuation made in Ireland, the amount of the said valuation is expressed to be money of Ireland, in contradistinction to money of Great Britain; and it was by the bill submitted, that, if there be any ambiguity on the face of the said deed, the same ought to receive a liberal construction in favour of the Appellant, and of the powers given to the said late Marquis, who was the owner of the said estates; and that the said William Marquis of Lansdowne and the said late Marquis must have contemplated that the widow of the said late Marquis would continue to reside in Great Britain, and therefore have intended that her jointure should be payable there, and should not be chargeable with the costs of remittance or other expenses attending the payment of it in Ireland; and that, had they intended to depart from the usage, [72] they would have expressed their intention so to do: and therefore praying, that the Appellant might be decreed entitled to the said jointure of three thousand pounds, as money is valued in Great Britain, and to be paid in London, according to the currency of that part of the said United Kingdom called England; and that the jointuring power created by the said deed of the 17th of May, 1794, might be decreed to be well executed by the late John Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, by the said deed of the 20th of February, 1809; and to that end, that it might be referred to one of the Masters of the said Court of Chancery in Ireland, to take an account of what was due to the Appellant upon the foot of her said jointure of £3000 yearly; and that the said Henry Marquis of Lansdowne might, by the decree of the same Court, be compelled to pay the same to the Appellant, when so ascertained; and that the said Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt Jones and John Dent might be compelled to aid and assist the Appellant in recovery of her just rights, according to such powers as they should have, or to permit the Appellant to proceed in their names, as she should be advised, indemnifying them against all costs; and that a receiver might be appointed to receive the rents, issues, and profits of the lands and premises in the said deed mentioned, or a competent part thereof, for payment of the Appellant's said jointure; and that, if necessary, the lands so subject to the Appellant's said jointure, or a competent part thereof, for the said term, might be sold for payment of the said arrears so due to the [73] Appellant; and that all necessary parties might join in making out a title to a purchaser.

The Respondent, Henry Marquis of Lansdowne, by his answer, admitted the marriage of the Appellant with the said John Henry late Marquis of Lansdowne, and the due execution of the settlement of 1794; and he believed that a deed appointing a rentcharge to the Appellant, by the said John Henry late Marquis of Lansdowne in 1809, had been executed in pursuance of the power given him by the said settlement of 1794, and that the same deeds were respectively to the purport stated in the Appellant's bill; and he further admitted, that, on the death of the late Marquis in 1809, he became possessed of the said settled estates, the net profits of which amounted to a considerable sum, and more than sufficient to answer the demand of the Appellant; and that applications had been made to him to pay in British money the charge claimed by the Appellant; and the said Respondent further admitted, that the said Earl of Wycombe, deceased, resided in England when the said deed of 1794 was executed, but denied that he had always resided there.

The Respondent, the Earl of Wycombe (the first tenant in tail of the said estates, under the settlement of 1794, expectant on the decease of his father, the said Henry Marquis of Lansdowne), being an infant by his answer submitted his rights to the protection of the Court.

The answers having been replied to, and issue being joined in the cause, witnesses were examined on behalf of the Appellant and Re-[74]spondents respectively, to prove the execution of the deeds, out of which the question arises, the marriage of the Appellant, and the domicile of the parties.

The cause came on to be heard before the Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, on the 27th of May, 1814, when his Lordship was pleased to order and direct, "That the cause should stand over, with liberty for the parties to proceed to obtain the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, on the question, whether the annuity or jointure so payable to the Appellant, were payable in English or Irish currency, and where the same was to be paid."

A case was accordingly prepared, and argued before the Court of Common Pleas in Michaelmas Term, 1814; and the judges of the said Court, during the same Term, certified their opinion as follows:

"That the jointure of the said Marchioness of Lansdowne, in the said case mentioned, being a rent charged on lands in Ireland, is payable in Irish currency; and that the same is payable in Ireland."

The cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor, on the certificate of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, upon the 8th day of December, 1814, when his Lordship made the following decree:

"That, according to the true intent and meaning, and the legal operation of the deed of the 17th of May, 1794, in the pleadings mentioned, the Appellant is entitled to be paid the rent-[75]charge of three thousand pounds per annum, therein mentioned, according to the currency of money in Ireland, and not according to the currency of money in Great Britain, and is entitled to be paid the said rentcharge in Ireland, and not elsewhere; and the Defendant having, by his answer, offered to pay the same, it was referred to the Master to take an account of what was due upon the foot of the said rentcharge, after all just allowances; and it was further ordered, that all parties should abide their own costs."

Against this decree, and the order upon the original hearing, the appeal was brought praying that the House would so far reverse the said decree, as to direct, "That, according to the true construction of the said deed of the 17th of May, 1794, the Appellant shall be paid her said jointure of three thousand pounds yearly, according to the currency of money in England, and not according to the currency of money in Ireland, and that she shall be paid the same in England."

For the Appellant—The Attorney General and Mr. Heald.

It is a general rule, supported by many authorities, that money is to be paid according to the currency of, and at the place where, the contract is entered into, unless the parties to the contract specially agree otherwise.

In this case the parties to the deed of 17th May, 1794, so far from specially agreeing otherwise, have thereby provided that the annuity shall [76] be paid in lawful money of Great Britain, which must mean English currency. That they had their attention directed to the difference between English and Irish currency, appears from some of the provisions of the deed.

The annuity being charged on lands in Ireland, does not alter the rule before stated: if so, the 14th Geo. III. c. 79,* would appear to be unnecessary. Contracts must be interposed according to the law of the place where they are executed.

John Henry Earl of Wycombe was a purchaser under the deed of 1794, for valuable consideration; and such deed is to be construed in the manner most beneficial to him.

The contract in this case, it must be presumed, had a reference to the country where the parties resided, and for that special reason the words "Great Britain" were introduced. The marriage was, in part, in consideration of the power, and the appointment was according to the power. The Court below seems to have considered the single circumstance that it was a rentcharge payable out of lands in Ireland. They disregarded the fact that the parties were resident in England, and [77] gave no effect to the words "of Great Britain."

The Lord Chancellor. Have you the case sent to the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland? If it states no more than the printed cases it was not worth sending. The deed of settlement speaks of sterling English money, and of money of Ireland, showing an advertence to the distinction. Whatever may be the effect of the lex loci contractus, or that the money is to be paid, as a rentcharge issuing out of lands, in cases where no provision is made by the deed, or instrument of contract: the rules of law arising out of those circumstances are inapplicable to a case where the instrument itself furnishes the means of interpretation. Upon looking at the various expressions of the deed, the first striking question which occurs is, whether sterling English and lawful money of Great Britain do not mean the same thing?

Lord Redesdale. The provision with respect to the £22,150, and the same for £3696, the surplus of the valued estate is clearly English money. There is one respecting the money payable out of the Buckinghamshire estate, which is not expressed to be either English or Irish.

For the Appellant. The contract may be, and apparently is, for lawful money of Great Britain payable in Ireland. By this construction the distinction taken in

* The act was passed to remove doubts which had arisen from the statute, 12 Anne, St. 2. c. 16, as to the legality of contracts made between parties resident in Great Britain, for monies lent at interest beyond 5 per cent. upon the security of lands, etc. in Ireland and the West Indies and the assignment of such securities. It enacts that such contracts and assignments made and executed in Great Britain shall be as valid as if executed in the place where the lands, etc. lie—provided the money lent does not exceed the value of the lands, etc. mortgaged—and it provides that no penalties under the statute of 12 Anne shall be incurred upon such contracts for interest at the rate established in the country where the mortgaged premises lie.

Phipps v. Lord Anglesea (5 Vin. Abr. Condition Q. b. 8. v. post, p. 88) is [78] avoided. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland was of opinion that the money ought to be paid in English currency, but thought himself bound by the certificate of the judges of the Common Pleas. No one of the sums to be paid under the settlement were of Irish currency. The only passage, in which the expression occurs, is in the valuation of lands, where nothing is expressed as to currency. In the provisions for younger children, and power to jointure wives resident in England, it is to be implied that the parties meant English money. In the absence of special provision, it might as well be argued, that the English money lent in England, upon the mortgage to M. is to be repaid in Irish currency. What will be said of the power to Lord H. Petty, which extends over English as well as Irish estates. That cannot be construed to mean Irish currency, and how lawful money of Great Britain can be so construed is difficult to conceive.

Lord Redesdale. There is no lawful money of Ireland; it is merely conventional. There is neither gold nor silver coin of legal currency—nothing but copper.

For the Appellant. The valuation of the lands having been made in Irish currency by Irish surveyors, was afterwards, for the purposes of the settlement, calculated in English currency: that fact appears by the deed itself.

For the Respondents—Mr. Horne and Mr. Abercrombie.

The question turns entirely on the power.

[79] Lord Redesdale. What is the difference between lawful money of Great Britain and sterling money? In the statute (12 Geo. III. c. 105, s. 1), under which the Lord Chancellor receives his salary, the amount is fixed in English money, which is called sterling: that amount is afterwards computed and expressed to be £10,833 6s. 8d. Irish currency. There is no such thing as Irish money: it is Irish currency.

For the Respondents. No distinction is to be taken between lawful money and sterling money. In the case of Phipps v. Lord Anglesea, the clause, providing the jointure for the wife, directed* that the payment should be without abatement, which words are omitted in the provision† as to portions for the daughters; and that part of the case was decided upon the ground that it was to be considered as a sum in gross, and not as a rent issuing out of the lands.‡

The question is not always decided by the place of contract. In Robinson v. Bland (2 Burr. Rep. 1077), where the question was upon a bill of exchange, a contract [80] of a transitory nature, the judges held, that it was demandable only in England, because the parties had a view to payment in England. In this case, it appears, from the very circumstance of limiting the power of charging to lands in Ireland, that the parties had a view of payment in Ireland, although they were resident in England. In Wallis v. Brightwell (2 P. W. 88), the testator demised his lands in Ireland to a trustee for a term of years, in trust, to pay to his wife, during her life, £80 a year out of the rents. A trust, to pay a sum out of rents, is materially different from a charge upon lands; and in that case there was, moreover, the specially noticed in the judgment, that the testator, upon leases of part of his Irish estates, had reserved rent to be paid in London tax-free, which was just sufficient to pay the annuities given by his will. In Saunders v. Drake (2 Atk. 165), the testator residing in Jamaica at the date of his will, but having friends in England as well as Jamaica, gave some legacies to be paid in sterling money; others he gave generally; and Lord Hardwicke decided that the general legacy was payable in the currency of Jamaica. No place of payment being specified in the deed giving the power, the default, if made, and the consequent remedy, could only be in Ireland. They might (and if that had been the intention, would) have provided that the money should be payable in England: not having done so, the case is left to the general operation of the law.

* This appears only by allegation, arguendo, of the counsel for the Defendants, in the case cited, who represent it to be "a rent to be paid at London without any deduction for exchange."—See 5 Vin. Abr. 209.

† The portions for the daughters were to be raised by a term vested in trustees for that purpose.

‡ But Parker, C. who decided the case, commences his judgment, by saying, "the portion ought to be paid here where the contract was made and the parties resided, and not in Ireland where the lands lie charged with the payment;" and he relies upon the intention of the parties.

[81] By the general rule of law (Co. Lit. 210 (b.) 211 (a)), an annual sum chargeable on lands is payable on the land, and in this respect differs from a sum in gross secured on land which is payable to the person, where no place of payment is expressly appointed. In this case the legal effect of the contract is, that the money which the parties to the deed had power to charge upon lands situate in Ireland only, is payable in Ireland, and in Ireland only. There is no personal obligation to pay, nor personal remedy to enforce payment; the power is to charge certain lands, situate in Ireland, with a rentcharge. The whole subject-matter is local by the very nature of the contract. The grantee of a rent charge (and the appointee of a rentcharge is as such grantee) is to demand it where he can find his remedy; that is to say, upon the land (Gillb. on Rents, 8vo. Irish edition). It was argued for the Appellant, that the rule of law is, that contracts are to be judged according to the law of the country where such contracts were made, and that this deed, having been executed in England, was to be construed accordingly; but that rule extends only to personal contracts, and is confined to contracts to be performed within the country where they were made. It is a rule as general and recognised (or an exception to the general rule before stated), that contracts entered into with an express view to the law of another country, and to be performed in another country, are to be judged of according to the law of that [82] country wherein they are to be performed. *Consuetudo, et statuta loci in quem est destinata solutio respicienda sunt. In this sort of contract the parties contracting to settle or limit lands in England and Ireland, and giving the power in question to charge lands in Ireland only, must be implied to have contracted with a view to the law of that country where the lands lie, and upon which the contract was to be performed, and their contract ought to be construed accordingly. Such was the rule according to the civil law. "Verum tamen non ita præcise respiciendus est locus in quo contractus est initus, ut si partes alium in contrahendo locum respexerint, ille non potius sit considerandus. Nam contraxisse unusquisque in eo loco intelligitur in quo ut solveret se obligavit." † —Lord Mansfield adopts the same distinction in Robinson v. Bland.‡ In delivering his judgment, he says, "The parties had a view to the laws of England. The law of the place can never be the rule where the transaction is entered into with an express view to the law of another country, as the rule by which it is to be governed;" and in reasoning on the [83] circumstances in that case, he observes, "Now here the payment is to be in England: it is an English security, and so intended by the parties," and adopts the reasoning of counsel—That Sir John Bland could never be called upon abroad for payment of this bill, till there had been a wilful default of payment in England. The bill was drawn by Sir John Bland, being in Paris, upon himself in England, payable ten days after sight." So in Sir John Champant v. Lord Ranelagh (Prec. Chan. 128). "A bond made in England was sent over to my Lord's correspondent in Ireland, and the money to be paid there, and it was not mentioned what interest should be paid, and the Lord Keeper was of opinion that it should carry Irish interest." Upon a careful review of all the cases, it will be found that whenever the law of the place of contract has been allowed to influence the construction of the instrument, there was nothing local in the terms of the contract as to its performance.

As to the argument raised upon the words "lawful money of Great Britain." British money is current in England; so is it current in Ireland; but not at the same rate. The same constitutional prerogative, which stamps its currency in England at one rate, ascertains its currency in Ireland also at another rate. Money, by the law of Ireland, ought not to be current at one rate, and payable at a different rate, respecting a contract to be there performed. That mixed money, does not import † Hub lib. i. tit. 3, n. 10. The passage quoted occurs in the title "De conflictu Legum," and is specially applied in that place to the subject of marriage contracts. Its general application seems to be borne out by the authority of the last resolution in the "Case of mixed moneys."

‡ 2 Burr. 1078.

English [84] currency, appears from "The case of mixed money;" * which has established the construction uniformly since given to these words in Ireland, as not denoting money according to English currency, but merely money of English coinage. In Ireland these words have a definite meaning.

In granting a power to create a rentcharge to a given amount, the parties cannot well be implied to have intended that a greater rentcharge might be created under the words used, than could be levied by distress on the lands, according to the law of the country where the lands lie: and it is clear law in Ireland, that under a distress and avowry for a rentcharge of £3000 lawful money of Great Britain, no more could be levied than £3000 of Irish currency, although the party might insist upon payment in money of the coinage of England. The common printed forms of bonds and other instruments used in Ireland are in these terms: and yet it never has been attempted to recover upon these instruments according to English currency; so well ascertained is the meaning of the words "lawful money of England." In truth, a different decision on these words would operate to improve considerably the situation of all obligees in Ireland, and to injure that of obligors, who have in all cases signed bonds for payment of lawful [85] money of Great Britain, upon the general understanding and hitherto received legal construction, that these words did not import the currency, but the coinage of the money.

This annuity being charged on Irish land, it must be intended to be Irish money: it could only be recovered by process in Ireland.

These parties certainly understood, and took the distinction between English and Irish money, as appears by the recital of the valuation of part of the lands; but in the clause in question the language is varied. The jointure is limited to £3000 lawful money of Great Britain; but there is no direct power to charge the estate with lawful money of Great Britain. The power is merely to charge; and the words tax-free, and without deduction, relate to the taxes of Ireland.

The Attorney General in reply. The attention of the parties having been called to the distinction, as appears by the valuation, what could they mean, by using the words lawful money of Great Britain, but to distinguish it from Irish currency?

The Lord Chancellor. How would they deal with a recital, that a man having advanced £12,000 sterling, it is provided that he shall receive £12,000? Would they contend he must receive so much less?

The Attorney General. That is precisely the case upon the mortgage to Munday, which is for £30,000. This is no question between landlord and tenant upon a distress for rent. If the power had been to charge dollars, no objection could be raised on the part of the tenant. Is the power given? That is the sole question.

[86] The Lord Chancellor. The power is clearly to charge an annuity of £3000 lawful money of Great Britain. If the donee had exceeded the power, the appointment would have been void at law—in equity it might have been good except for the excess. But what has a court of law to do with that question?

The Attorney General. It was not argued in Ireland that the appointment exceeded the power, which must have been the case if their construction is right.

The Lord Chancellor † It is difficult to imagine how this case found its way into a court of equity, except on the ground of calling upon the trustees to act. If the Appellant is entitled, as grantee of a rentcharge, she might have proceeded to enforce her legal remedy by distress. It is stated that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, after the return of the certificate from the Common Pleas, retained an opinion contrary to that certificate, but made the decree according to it, from deference to the judges of the Common Pleas. In that surely there must be some mistake. For, although it is highly useful in legal questions to resort to the assistance of the courts of law, yet it must be well known to those experienced in the practice of courts of equity, that they are not bound to adopt the opinion of the courts of law to which they send for advice. It has occurred to me to send the same case successively to the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, and not to adopt the opinion (though highly to be respected) of either of those courts.

* Davies' Rep. qua supra. The case of "mixed moneys" is more favourable to the Respondent's argument than it is here represented. For, upon a contract to pay £100 sterling, lawful money of England, it was held in the Privy Council, upon the opinion of the judges, that a tender of mixed moneys was sufficient. See a short abstract of that case in a note at the end of this case.

† At the conclusion of the reply.

[87] If this were the case of a simple charge of £3000 on lands in Ireland, the place of contract, the domicile of the parties, the place appointed for payment, and other circumstances, might require consideration, and would furnish the ground for the decision of the case: but the instrument itself must, in this case, give the rule of decision,—a settlement making various arrangements, some like to the provision in question, others different from it. It was impossible that the Court of Common Pleas should have given a satisfactory opinion upon the question, if the case was sent nakedly to them without a statement of the deed. It will be proper that we should carefully inspect every part of the deed before we decide whether the judgment ought to be affirmed or reversed.

The Lord Chancellor. This is a question, whether, under an instrument purporting to be an appointment, according to a power, of an annuity of lawful money of Great Britain, the sum is to be paid in lawful money of England, at the rate of English or of Irish currency.

Before I state the instrument containing the power, I ought to observe, that, upon looking at the settlement, I perceive it was expedient and proper to raise this question in equity: because, by the deed of settlement, various terms of years were created for various purposes, and the remedy in a court of law might have been defeated, if those terms had been set up to obstruct such proceeding.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, it is said, was of opinion that the annuity was payable in English currency; but thought fit, nevertheless, to direct a case for the opinion of the Court of Common [88] Pleas, in which the question raised, was, whether the annuity or jointure was payable to the Appellant in English or Irish currency, and where payable. The Court, whose opinion was desired, certified, that the jointure being a rentcharge upon lands in Ireland was payable in Ireland, and in Irish currency. The reason for this opinion is to be collected only from the certificate, namely, that it is a charge upon lands in Ireland. We are not informed of any other reason. If that were the simple case, the matter is clear according to settled principles of law. But in this case the question is to be decided by the intention expressed in the deed of settlement. The meaning is to be collected from the words immediately applicable to the point, from the context, and from all parts of the settlement.

This is a power to charge the lands with a jointure of "lawful money of Great Britain." The appointment is made according to the authority, and in the words of the power. The question is whether these words can be said to mean Irish currency. In the naked case of a charge upon lands the law is clear and settled; but upon wills and instruments of marriage contract all the cases cited authorise a distinction. In such cases the intention of the person making the will, and of the parties to the contract, is to be collected from the different parts of the instrument. The case of Phipps v. Earl of Anglesea is to be found in three books (5 Vin. Abr. 209, part 8. 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 220, part 1, 754, part 3. 1 P. W. 696), but is most fully reported in Viner's Abridgment. [89] According to that report, by a settlement made upon the marriage of the Earl of Anglesea with the daughter of the Countess of Dorchester, a term of five hundred years was created in trust to raise £12,000 for the portions of daughters. The parties to the settlement resided in England, and upon a bill filed in Chancery by a daughter, the sole issue of the marriage, and her husband, to have the portion, with the rest of her fortune settled, the first point raised in Court, was whether the £12,000 portion charged by means of the term of years upon lands in Ireland should be paid in England without any abatement or deduction for the exchange from Ireland to England. After hearing arguments, which, in many respects, were similar to those urged in the present case, the Chancellor of that day was of opinion that the portion ought to be paid where the contract was made and the parties resided, and not in Ireland where the lands lay charged with the payment, for that it was a sum in gross, and not a rent issuing out of land; that it was certainly the intention of the parties that the portion should be paid in England, and not to send the young lady into Ireland to get her portion. In that case, as the facts are stated in the report, it was a question simply upon a charge of a sum of money for a portion upon estates in Ireland, there were no such words as sterling, or, as in this case, lawful money of Great Britain.*

[90] It is true, that, in Phipps v. Lord Anglesea, the distinction is taken in the judgment which was urged in this case at the bar, that there it was a sum in gross, and not a rent issuing out of land; but that seems to be in answer to that part of the argument in that case, which is founded on the different expressions of the settlement as to the jointure of the wife, and the portions of the daughters. As to the former, which is by name a rentcharge, it is provided that it shall be paid in London without deduction for the exchange; whereas, in the declaration of the trust of the term created for raising the portion these words are omitted, and it is only said in trust to raise £12,000. Upon this point of the argument the Court seems to have been of opinion, that, in the case of a rent-charge, the addition of such words might be necessary; but that the question as to a sum in gross, (which the portion in that case was considered to be) was to be decided on circumstances, and accordingly the decision rests, in substance, upon the domicile and the presumed intention of parties resident in England, that a portion secured for a daughter should be paid to her in England. That case decides nothing which can rule the present case; and although it may be inferred from that case that the Court thought, that, in the simple case of a rent charged upon lands in Ireland, it would be payable in Ireland, and in Irish currency, yet nothing [91] is to be concluded from the case as to what the judgment would have been in the case of a rent-charge of lawful money of Great Britain.

The case of Saunders v. Drake (2 Atk. 465), shows, that whatever the rule may be in the simple case of a rent-charge,—in a devise the construction must be according to the intention. In that case the testator being domiciled, and, making his will in Jamaica, gave, in the first place, certain legacies to be paid in sterling money, and immediately after two legacies are given by the will, without any direction that they should be paid in sterling money. The person who claimed one of the latter legacies filed a bill claiming payment of his legacy in English currency. Lord Hardwicke, in that case, was of opinion, that the residence of the person devising must decide the question as to the legacies given generally; but where directed to be paid in sterling money, they ought to be paid in the currency of England, although the testator resided in Jamaica. So, if the question now before us had occurred upon an Irish will, the rule established in Saunders v. Drake would authorise our deciding that a legacy, given in the words contained in this power, must be paid in the lawful money of Great Britain, that is, in the currency of England.

In Hallis v. Brightwell (1 P. W. 88), again, it appears, that intention is to furnish the rule of decision. There the testator living with his wife in England, by his will, made in England, devised his lands in Ireland to a trustee for five hundred years in trust, out of the rents and profits to pay £80 per annum to his wife for life. It was argued, in that case, [92] that no place being appointed for payment, and the fund being in Ireland, the annuity ought to be paid in Irish currency, or subject to the charge of remittance; but the Lord Chancellor decided, that the will being made in England, where all the parties to the contract resided, and this being a provision for a wife, it should be intended that the provision was estimated in the money of the country where the will was made. He added, that if one, by will made in England, gives a legacy of £80, it must be intended of English money, and it will be the same thing though charged on lands in Ireland. In that case, although the words are simply to pay out of rents, &c. £80, the intent presumed from domicile and other circumstances prevailed. Must we not, a

* It is singular, that, although (in Viner's report) nothing appears in the statement of the facts of the case, nor in the report of the judgment, of any specification as to the kind of money to be paid, but simply that £12,000 is to be raised; yet, in the argument for the defendant, where the language of the settlement is discussed, and the provisions as to the jointure and the portions are contrasted, this passage occurs: "It is only said (as to the term for raising the portions) in trust to raise and pay out of the premises the sum of £12,000 of good and lawful money of England, &c."

fortiori, where the words are to grant a rentcharge of £3000 lawful "money of Great Britain," presume a similar intent under similar circumstances?

So again, in Pearson v. Garnett (2 Bro. C. C. C. 38, 46, 226, Prec. in Chanc. 201, n.) Lord Kenyon said, he was tied down by the authorities; and held that unascertained or general legacies must be paid in the currency of the country where the will is made.

If this be the rule of law in the case of a legacy, where the party must claim under the voluntary benefaction of the testator, will it not, a fortiori, apply to a case where the party is a purchaser? In this case, it must be remembered, the appointment, under a power given by contract, is of a sum of £3000 a year, lawful money of Great Britain; and such sum must be paid in such lawful money, unless the instrument of contract, in [93] all its other parts, manifests a clear intention to the contrary. Now, without going through the provisions of the settlement, it is enough to say, there is not a page of it in which it does not appear that the annuity to be charged is payable in lawful money of Great Britain.

True, it is a rentcharge, but upon that the only question will be what is the quantum of the rentcharge? How it is reserved is immaterial, whether in guineas, sovereigns, or dollars. It need not be in money at all. If it had been in loaves or oakes, the principle of decision would have been the same. There are throughout the settlement charges on English as well as Irish estates. Can it be said, as to any of these charges, that a different sum is to be paid to the person entitled, according to the site of the estates out of which the money is drawn? In those instances, where Irish estates only are charged, the situation and conduct of the parties, and the language of the instrument of contract, show that they meant English currency. In the schedule annexed to the settlement, the Irish estates are valued according to Irish currency, and then it is reduced to English. If the parties have, in the schedule, recognised the distinction, and shown an intention to compute in English currency, how can I understand that they make no distinction, or have a different meaning in the body of the deed? Even in the body of the deed the distinction is taken and acted upon with respect to the compensation given to the Marquis of Lansdowne.

The question, looking at the whole deed, is whether the power is duly exercised by granting a [94] rentcharge of £3000 of lawful money of Great Britain. If the power gave him authority to do so it is sufficient.

It is said to be the practice in Ireland, (but I never heard of a decision to the effect,) that a bond given for £3000 lawful money of Great Britain could be discharged by paying £3000 of Irish currency.

In this case the decision must be grounded upon the construction of the instrument before us.

There is a point remaining to be noticed, which did not form part of the argument at the bar of the House, although it is included in the certificate, and adopted by the Court of Chancery: namely, the question, whether the annuity is to be paid in England or in Ireland. Upon this, it is to be observed, that the power is to charge Irish lands with so much lawful money of Great Britain. It is not, however, such a power, that it is necessarily to be inferred that the money must be paid in England. The appointment directs it to be paid in Lincoln's Inn Hall; but we can only decide that the power is well executed, so far as it charges on the lands a sum of £3000 lawful money of Great Britain. As to the cost of exchange, the appointee may be liable to that deduction. I found my opinion upon the short reason, that, by the appointment, £3000 of lawful money of Great Britain is given according to the power, and that such a provision, from the expressions and the whole frame of the contract, seems to have been contemplated by the parties.

Lord Redesdale. There is no doubt, that, according to the intention of the parties, and the legal operation of the appointment made under [95] the power, this rentcharge is to be paid in lawful money of Great Britain, and at the rate of English currency.

No part of the deed of settlement furnishes a ground to infer that the money to be charged should be paid in Irish currency. As to exchange the case is different. The currency is always the same: the rate of exchange depends on circumstances, which may cause a gain or loss upon payment in either country. If the proceeding had been by distress, a tender of 3000 sovereigns would have put an end to the distress, and the tender must have been where the proceedings took place. The right of demand and payment was certainly in Ireland. In that part of the appointment, which directs payment in Lincoln's Inn Hall, the donee has exceeded his power. The proceeding in equity, and not by distress, was necessary in this case, because the term of five hundred years might have been interposed and defeated the distress; but a court of equity could only decree payment of the sum charged into court, or to the individual, suing by his agent, in lawful money of Great Britain. The court could not decree that 3000 sovereigns should be sent to the claimant in England. There is, therefore, no doubt that the money is payable in Ireland. The question then is, whether the money is payable in Irish currency which is not expressed, or in lawful money of Great Britain which is expressed in the deed? In all cases of a similar description upon legacies, where the word "sterling," or some word equivalent has been used, the money has been held payable in English cur-[96]-rency, even although the testator was resident out of England. In some particular cases* it has been inferred, from circumstances, that the money was payable not only in English currency but also in England: but there is no ground for such inference here. The decree itself drops the words "lawful money of Great Britain," which was a necessary omission to make it consistent. To have said that £3000 of lawful money of Great Britain should be paid in the same sum of lawful currency of Ireland, would have been contradictory, for the one would exceed the other by eight and a half per cent.

The decree orders that all parties shall abide their own costs, which is contrary to the provision of the deed; but no alteration can be made here in that respect, as it is not made the subject of appeal.

Lord Lauderdale. If lawful money of England is paid in Dublin, the only deduction to be incurred would be the price of the purchase of a bill, or the cost of conveyance. There is a great difference between paying a sum in English money in Dublin, and paying the same sum in Dublin, according to the difference of exchange, in which the value of the Irish currency is computed.

The Lord Chancellor. Upon looking at the cases, it appears that the appeal extends to the question of costs; and as the term given, according to the power to secure the annuity, provides for the payment of all "costs and charges relating thereto," we think the reversal ought to be with costs. As to the other points it will be sufficient to reverse the decree on further directions. The reference to [97] the Court of Common Pleas was according to the course of a court of equity, and ought not to be impeached.

Lord Redesdale. Care should be taken, in framing the cases, to show what are the points of appeal. No one could have imagined, from reading these printed cases, that the reference to the Common Pleas was a ground of appeal.

July 3, 1820.—Ordered and adjudged, that the decree of the 8th of December, 1814, so far as it orders, adjudges, and declares, that according to the true intent and meaning, and the legal operation of the deed of the 17th of May, 1791, in the pleadings mentioned, the Appellant, is, and she was thereby decreed, intitled to be paid the rent charge of £3000 per annum therein mentioned, according to the currency of money in Ireland, and not according to the currency of money in Great Britain, and so far as it orders, adjudges and decrees, that, the Respondent having offered to pay the said rent charge accordingly, it should be referred to one of the masters of the said court of chancery, to take an account of what is due on the foot of the said rent charge after all just allowances, and that all parties should abide their own costs; be and the same decree is hereby so far reversed. And it is declared, that according to the true intent and meaning, and the legal operation of the said deed of the 17th of May, 1791, the rent charge therein mentioned, of £3000 of lawful money of Great Britain, is to be deemed a rent charge of £3000 of lawful money of Great Britain, and not a rent charge of £3000, according to the currency of money in Ireland, and that according to the express words of the said deed of the 17th of May, 1791, the term of years thereby authorised to be created for better securing the payment of such rent charge, was to be made defeasible only on full payment of such rent charge, and all arrears thereof, and all costs and charges relating thereto: and it is further ordered and adjudged, that the Appellant is entitled under the deed of the 20th of February, 1809, to an annuity, or yearly rent charge of £3000 of lawful money of Great Britain, to be issuing out of and chargeable on the lands in the said deed mentioned, and to all costs and charges sustained by non-payment thereof, and the Respondent having offered to pay the said rent charge as a rent charge of £3000 according to the currency of money in Ireland, and not as a rent charge of £3000 of lawful money of Great [98] Britain, it is further ordered, that it be referred to the master to whom the said cause stands referred, to take an account of what is due to the Appellant, on the foot of the said rent charge, as a rent charge of £3000 of lawful money of Great Britain, after all just allowances, and of all costs and charges sustained by non-payment thereof, and particularly so much of the costs of this suit as have been occasioned by non-payment of the said rent charge: And it is further ordered and adjudged, that so much of the said decree as declares that the Appellant is entitled to be paid the rent charge to which she is entitled, in Ireland, and not elsewhere, be affirmed, and that as to so much of the costs of this suit as have been occasioned by her claim to be paid the said rent charge in England, the parties do bear their own costs.

In the case of mixed monies, as reported by Sir John Davies, the contract was by bond, upon condition to pay at a future day £100 sterling, current and lawful money of England, at the tomb of Earl Strongbow, in Christ Church, Dublin. The bond was executed in April, 13o Eliz. upon a purchase of wares, by a merchant of Drogheda, from one Gilbert, of London, and at a time when the pure coin of England was current in Ireland. Before the day of payment specified in the bond, Queen Elizabeth, in order to pay the troops of the royal army which had been many years employed in Ireland, in the suppression of Tyrone's rebellion, caused a great quantity of mixed monies, with the stamp of the Arms of the Crown, and the inscription of her Royal style, to be coined in the Tower of London, and transmitted to Ireland, and a proclamation was issued, bearing date the 24th of May, 43o Eliz. declaring those mixed monies to be lawful and current money in the realm of Ireland, and commanding all her subjects and others using traffic and commerce in that kingdom to receive those monies in payment of debts, etc. Brett, the obligor, tendered the mixed monies in payment, and whether the tender was sufficient to save the forfeiture of the bond, was the question, which was brought before the privy council, where Gilbert, being a merchant of London, exhibited a petition against Brett, for the speedy recovery of his debt. Upon advice of the judges, the council resolved that the tender was sufficient.

See 1 Eq. Ca. C. 36 (E). Under that title, pl. 2, the correctness of the Report in 2 Vernon 395, of the case of Lord Rinchagh v. Sir J. Champant, is doubted, and in Prec. in Ch. 108, where the same case is reported: it is said that Irish interest was allowed. See the Authorities on this head, collected in Mr. Raithby's Edition of Vernon, ii. 395.

IRELAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

THOMAS LIDWILL, Esq.—Appellant; WILLIAM HOLLAND P.—Trustee and Executor of THOMAS LIDWILL, Esq. deceased, and others,—Respondents [17 May, 1820].

[Mews' Dig. x. 1572. See Sug. Law of Prop. pp. 463, 464. On the point as to evidence in printed cases (2 Bli. p. 124, note *) see Annual Practice, vol. ii. Part vii. Directions for Agents, rr. 23 et seq; Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, sup. 2 Bli. at p. 97; Stacpoole v. Stacpoole 1816, 4 Dow, at p. 222; Dillon v. Parker 1833, 1 Cl. and F. at p. 304.]

By a marriage settlement, containing the usual limitations, the husband, having a life estate in reversion, expectant upon the death of his father, was empowered when in possession under the limitations of the settlement, to revoke, etc. as to so much and such part of the premises conveyed, "as shall be then in possession of any one or more tenants, by virtue of any one or more lease or leases, whereon a rent or rents, not exceeding £300 by the year in the whole, shall be reserved, etc. so as there shall not, at the time of such revocation, be less than twenty years, or three lives, unexpired of such lease or leases." The clause of the settlement conferring the power concluded, with a declaration, that it was the true intent and meaning of the parties that the husband should, at any time during his life, after he should come into, and be in the actual possession of the premises (settled), have absolute power and dominion over so much thereof as should be of the clear yearly value of £300 sterling, and be at full liberty to dispose of the same in such manner, and to such uses and purposes, as he should think proper.

The husband (donee of the power), after the death of his father, when he was in possession under the trusts of the settlement, by a deed of revocation, purporting to be an execution of the power, and reciting that certain lands therein specified then produced a clear yearly rent of £3000 or thereabouts, revoked the uses of the settlement as to those lands, and appointed the same in trust for him (the donee), his heirs, and assigns. Afterwards the donee died, indebted to an amount exceeding the value of the lands so appointed, and having no other estate or effects. By his will duly attested, and reciting his title and power to dispose of the lands specified in the deed of revocation and appointment, he devised to trustees his right and interest therein, upon trust, to sell the same, and out of the purchase money to pay his debts, etc. The lands [100] revoked, appointed, and devised, except a very small part, to the value of £8 a year, were not (as recited in the deed of revocation) under lease at the time of the appointment by that deed, nor at the date of the will; but, in a suit instituted on behalf of creditors and legatees, to carry the trusts of the will into execution, it was found and reported by the officer of the Court that the lands so appointed and devised were of the value of £300 a year. By the decree in that suit the will was established, and the revocation and appointment held valid; and, upon appeal to the House of Lords against the decree, it was held that the power was rightly applied to the subject, and that the appointment was well executed.

By indentures of lease and release, dated 13th and 14th January, 1771, (being the settlement executed previous to the marriage of Thomas Lidwill the younger, and E. J. O'Grady) certain lands held upon leases for lives, with covenant for perpetual renewal, the property of Thomas Lidwill, the elder, for life; remainder to T. L. the younger, for life; remainder to his sons, in tail male; remainder to M. L. (the Appellant's father) for life; remainder to the sons successively of M. L. in tail male, etc.

By the indenture of release, power was given to T. L. the younger, and the other tenants for life in remainder after him, when in possession, to demise or let all or any part of the premises, for any term not exceeding three lives, or thirty-one years in possession, and not in reversion, at the best improved rent, without fine.*

[101] The release also contained a power of revocation, by which it was provided that T. L. the younger, after he should be in possession of the premises, might, by any writing under his hand and seal, attested by two witnesses, or by his will attested by three witnesses, revoke, alter, or determine, all or any, the use and uses, estate and estates before limited, "as to so much and such part of the premises as shall be then in possession of any one or more tenant or tenants, by virtue of any one or more lease or leases, whereon a rent or rents not exceeding £300 by the year, in the whole, shall be reserved and payable during the continuance of such lease or leases, so as there shall not at the time of such revocation be less than twenty years

* A power of leasing as to part of the lands in settlement, was also given to Thomas Lidwill the elder. But the original deed of settlement was not produced upon the hearing of the appeal, nor was the power set forth in the printed papers upon this subject. See the Censure of the Lord Chancellor, p. 121.

or three lives unexpired of such lease or leases; and that from and immediately after the execution of such revocation, Standish Grady and Richard Lalor, (trustees in the settlement) and the survivor, etc. shall stand seized of such part of the premises, concerning which such revocation shall be executed for the use of T. L. the younger, his heirs, and assigns, and that he and they shall and may hold and enjoy the same, and receive to his and their own use the rents, etc. clear of the rent reserved out of the premises, or any of the uses, etc. before expressed. It being the true intent and meaning of these presents, and of the parties hereunto, that the said Thomas Lidwill the younger, shall at any time during his life, after he shall come into, and be in the actual possession of the said hereby granted and released [102] premises, have an absolute power and dominion over so much thereof as shall be of the clear yearly value of £300 sterling, and be at full liberty to dispose of the same in such manner, and to such uses and purposes as he shall think proper."

Thomas Lidwill the elder died in November, 1782, whereupon Thomas Lidwill the younger became seized of the lands of Clonmore, etc. under the settlement of the 14th January, 1774.

By indenture dated the 20th December, 1782, signed, sealed, and delivered, by Thomas Lidwill the younger, attested as by the deed of settlement required, and made between Thomas Lidwill the younger of the one part, and Standish Grady and Richard Lalor of the other part, reciting the marriage settlement and the power of revocation therein contained, and that the lands of Coologenafrian or Graffin, containing 300 acres or thereabouts, with the bog and common thereto belonging, and part of the lands of Clekile, containing about 41 acres, with 14 acres of bog, then produced a clear yearly rent of £300 or thereabouts; and were part and parcel of the lands mentioned in the marriage settlement: Thomas Lidwill, in execution of the power of revocation, and of all and every other power and authority in him being or him thereunto enabling, for the purpose of revoking, altering, making void, and changing all and every the use and uses, trusts and limitations, in the deed contained, so far as the same related to the £300 a year, did declare, order, direct, limit, [103] and appoint, that Standish Grady and Richard Lalor, and the survivor of them, and the heirs and assigns of such survivor, should stand, and from thenceforth be seized of that part of the lands in the settlement mentioned, called Coologenafrian or Graffin, containing 300 acres or thereabouts, with the bog and common thereto belonging; and that part of the lands of Clekile, containing about 41 acres, with 14 acres of bog, together with all and every their rights, members, appendances, and appurtenances thereto, or to said lands of Mucklonemore, otherwise Clonmore, Coologenafrian, and Coologenvodeale, belonging or in any wise appertaining.

To hold to the only proper use, behoof, and benefit of the said Thomas Lidwill, his heirs, and assigns, for ever; and to, for, and upon no other use or uses, trust, intent, or purpose whatsoever, any thing therein, or in the marriage settlement contained, to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. It being thereby declared to be the true intent and meaning of the said deed of revocation, and of the parties thereto, to carry into execution the said power of revocation as fully and effectually as in them lay, according to the true intent and meaning of the said deed, and of the parties thereto, so as that Thomas Lidwill, his heirs, or assigns, or Standish Grady and Richard Lalor, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, in trust for Thomas Lidwill should, from the day of the date of the deed of revocation become, and then were actually seized and possessed of the revoked lands, to the only [104] proper use, behoof, and benefit of said Thomas Lidwill, his heirs and assigns for ever; and it was thereby agreed that it should and might be lawful for Thomas Lidwill, his heirs and assigns for ever, thereafter, to have, hold, and enjoy the revoked lands and premises with the appurtenances; and to have, receive, and take to, and for his and their own use and benefit, the yearly rents, issues, and profits thereof, separately and apart, and free and cleared, and absolutely discharged from the rent payable out of the lands of Clonmore to the head landlord, by virtue of the original lease, or renewal or renewals thereof, to be thereafter had by virtue of the covenant of renewal in the original lease; and of and from the payment of all and every, or any part whatsoever of such renewal fine or fines which then were, or thereafter might become payable by virtue of the original lease or renewals to be thereafter had thereof, and freed, acquitted, exonerated, and discharged of and from all or any and every of the use and uses, estate, trusts, charges, and limitations contained in the marriage settlement; and from all manner of judgments, mortgages, or incumbrances whatsoever, which could or might affect the lands.

On the 16th June, 1809, Thomas Lidwill the younger died, without issue male, having no other property but in the lands, subject to the revocation, and indebted to several persons, leaving his widow, Elizabeth Julia, and the Respondent, Mary Grady, his only child, and heiress at law. By his will, dated on the 13th of June, 1809, [105] and duly executed and attested in the manner required by law for devising freehold estates, reciting, that he was entitled to 300 acres of the lands of Clonmore or Graffin, under and by virtue of his marriage settlement, and to dispose thereof as he should think proper; he devised and bequeathed all his right, title, and interest in and to the said 300 acres of the said lands of Clonmore or Graffin, and all other his estates of what nature or kind soever which he should die seized possessed of, or entitled to at the time of his decease, unto the Respondents, John Maherg and William Holland P. and the survivor of them, and his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns in trust, to sell and dispose thereof, and out of the monies arising from such sale, to pay all his just debts, funeral expenses, and the several legacies therein mentioned, and, among others, a sum of £2500 which he bequeathed to the Respondent, Mary Grady's children, and thereof appointed the Respondent, Mary, residuary legatee, and William Holland P. and John Maherg his executors.

William Holland P. alone proved the will in the proper ecclesiastical court in Ireland; and on 5th January, 1810, being trustee and executor, and also a judgment creditor of T. L. filed his bill in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland against the Appellant, (who had become intitled as next in succession, under the limitations of the deed of settlement,) and others, stating the indentures of 14th January, 1771, the power of revocation therein contained, the deed of revocation of the 20th December, 1782, and also the will of Thomas [106] Lidwill the younger; and charging that Thomas Lidwill, at the time of his death, owed several sums of money by judgments and otherwise; and that he bequeathed the several legacies therein mentioned, to the persons therein named, and insisted that the deed of the 20th of December, 1782, (which was not then in the possession of William Holland P.—) was a due execution of the power of revocation, and that even if the same had not existed, the will was in itself a sufficient execution of the power, and that, if defective, the Court would set it right; and praying that the Defendants might set forth what estate or interest they claimed in the lands revoked, and that the trusts of the will might be carried into execution; and that it might be declared that the power of revocation had been well executed by Thomas Lidwill; and that accordingly the revoked lands might be sold by the decree of the Court for the purposes mentioned in the will; and that in the mean time, until such decree should be obtained, a receiver should be appointed to receive the rents, and that an account might be taken of Thomas Lidwill's personal estate, and of his debts, legacies, and funeral expenses; and that, the marriage settlement and deed of revocation might be lodged in Court.

The Defendants having filed their answers to the bill, and issue being joined, witnesses were examined, and publication of their depositions having passed, the cause came on to be heard on the 13th of May, 1813, on pleadings and proofs, when the Court decreed, that the trusts of the will of Thomas Lidwill, deceased, in the [107] pleadings mentioned, should be carried into execution, and that the proper officer should take an account of his real estates, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, into whose hands the same came, and how applied; and also an account of his personal estate, and the nature and value thereof, into whose hand the same came, and how applied, and of his debts, legacies, and funeral expenses, and of all charges and incumbrances affecting his said real and freehold estates, and the nature, priority, and amount thereof, and what was due thereon respectively, and whether any and which of them had been paid, and out of what fund: the officer was also directed to inquire and report, whether, on 20th December, 1782, the lands of Coologenafrian or Graffin, containing 300 acres, with the bog and common thereunto belonging; and also the said part of the lands of Clekile, containing about 11 acres, together with about 14 acres of bog thereunto belonging, comprised in the deed of 20th

December, 1782, in the pleadings mentioned, or any and of which of them, or any and what part thereof were in the possession of a tenant or tenants having, at the time of the date of said deed of 20th December, 1782, a term or terms of three lives, or twenty years, then to run of their lease or leases; * and if he should find that the entire of the lands were not in the possession of such tenant or tenants at the time (when the deed of revocation was executed), [108] that then he should state the clear yearly value of the lands at that time, and how much and what parts thereof were of the clear yearly value of £300 on the 20th December, 1782: and if the officer should find that any part thereof was, at that time, in the possession of such tenant or tenants as aforesaid, then he was directed for so much to take the reserved rents as the value: and that the officer should also inquire and report, whether any and what other part of the lands comprised in the settlement of the 14th January, 1774, were in lease to a tenant or tenants having, on the 20th December, 1782, three lives, or twenty years unexpired of such lease or leases.

The Respondent, William Holland P.—the Plaintiff, on 27th December, 1813, filed his charge under said decree, and the Appellant, on the 28th of January, 1814, filed his charge and discharge to Plaintiffs said charge; and among other things charged and contended before the officer, that he was entitled to be repaid as a creditor of Thomas Lidwill, the younger, certain sums in his said charge mentioned, out of the real freehold and personal estate of Thomas Lidwill: and further charged that the whole of the lands in the deed of revocation of the 20th of December, 1782, were then unset and out of lease, and that no part thereof was in possession of a tenant or tenants, having, on the 20th of December, 1782, a term or terms of three lives or twenty years then to run: and that parts of the lands comprised in the marriage settlement of 14th January, 1774, and distinct from the lands comprised in the deed of [109] revocation of the 20th of December, 1782, were in lease to tenants having, on the 20th of December, 1782, three lives or twenty years unexpired of such lease or leases.

The Appellant also insisted, that the lands comprised in the deed of revocation exceeded the clear yearly value of £300 on the 20th December, 1782, and contended before the officer, that those lands were of considerably greater value at that time.

On the 3rd of November, 1815, the officer reported (among other things) that Thomas Lidwill, deceased, in the pleadings mentioned, died seized of a real estate in the lands of Coologenafrian or Graffin, and also in part of the lands of Clekile, with the bogs and common thereto belonging, comprised in the deed of the 20th of December, 1782, and that Thomas Lidwill was not at the time of his decease seized of any other real or freehold estate.

The officer also found that Thomas Lidwill, by his will, dated 13th June, 1809, charged all and singular his real estates with the payment of his debts and legacies (in the report mentioned), and directed his trustees, therein named, to sell the same for payment thereof; and that Thomas Lidwill was indebted, at the time of his decease, to several persons therein particularly named in the several sums therein mentioned, amounting, in the whole, to the sum of £7512 17s. 4d., and that the debts and legacies were charges and incumbrances affecting the real estate of which Thomas Lidwill died seized.

He further found, that there was one tenant [110] who occupied a part of the lands of Coologenafrian or Graffin, on the 20th of December, 1782, of whose lease a term of 23½ years was then unexpired, at the yearly rent of £8, but did not find that there was any other tenant or tenants on the 20th of December, 1782, in possession of any part of the lands of Coologenafrian or Graffin, or of the part of Clekile, mentioned in the deed of the 20th of December, 1782, under any lease thereof, of which a term of three lives or twenty years was then to run.

He also found, that, on the 20th December, 1782, the part of the lands under lease were of the yearly value of £8, taking the same at the reserved rent, and that the remainder of the lands of Coologenafrian or Graffin, and the lands of Clekile, and the bogs and common thereto belonging, in the said deed of revocation mentioned, were, on the 20th day of December, 1782, of the yearly value of £292 (both said sums making together the yearly value of £300) and no more, and that no further or other part of the lands of Mucklinimore, otherwise Clounmore, comprised in the marriage settlement of the 14th of January, 1771, were, on the 20th day of December, 1782, leased or demised to a tenant or tenants having, on the last-mentioned day, a term for three lives, or twenty years, unexpired of their said lease or leases.

Thomas Lidwill, the Appellant, on the 9th of November, 1815, filed four exceptions* to the officer's report, because he had not reported cer-[111]-tain claims of the Appellant, as incumbrances affecting the revoked lands.

On 17th February, 1816, the cause came on to be heard on the report, exceptions, and merits, when the Court ordered, that the first and fourth exceptions should be over-ruled, without prejudice to any suit then depending, or which might thereafter be instituted as to the matter thereof, and that the second and third exceptions should be also over-ruled, and the report confirmed; and that the defendant (Appellant) should in one kalendar month, to be computed from the date thereof, bring in and lodge in the Bank of Ireland, to the credit of the cause, with the privy of the accountant general of the Court, the sum of £1303 2s. 5d., being the balance of the rents, issues, and profits of the revoked lands and premises remaining in the (Appellant's) hands; and that the register should tot up the interest of the several sums in the decree particularly mentioned, due to the several creditors and legatees therein named; and that the Defendants, or such of them as ought so to do, should, in three kalendar months, to be computed from the date of the decree, pay to said William Holland P., and to the several other creditors and legatees therein named, the several sums therein mentioned, with interest from that day until paid, with costs to the persons therein named; or, in default thereof, that the chief remembrancer of the Court, or his deputy, should set up and sell by public sale, to the highest and fairest bidder, the said revoked [112] lands and premises in the decree particularly mentioned, or a competent part thereof; and that out of the monies arising by such sale, the Plaintiff, William Holland, P. and the several other creditors and legatees therein named, should be paid the respective sums therein mentioned due to them, and that the remainder (if any) of the money arising by such sale, should be disposed of as the Court should thereafter think fit; and that all proper and necessary parties should join with said chief remembrancer, or his deputy, in executing proper deeds of conveyance to such person or persons as should be declared the purchaser or purchasers of the lands and premises, or such parts thereof as should be sold; and that either party should be at liberty to apply to the Court in the mean time for such further and other directions as might be necessary; and that the other Respondents should recover their costs expended by them, in the cause, out of the money arising by such sale; and that the Plaintiff, W. Holland, might accordingly make up and enrol the decree, with costs as aforesaid, for the performance whereof, the process of the Court was, from time to time, to issue as in such cases usual.

The several sums so decreed due to the creditors of Thomas Lidwill, the younger, amounted to £7512 17s. 4d., and to his legatees £4824, and Plaintiffs taxed costs, to £470 0s. 11d., making, in all, £12,806 18s. 3d., exclusive of Respondent Grady's and the other parties' costs, which amounted to a considerable sum.

[113] On the 5th of June, 1816, the lands were put up to sale by public auction, pursuant to the decree: the Respondent, Henry Grove Grady, was declared the highest bidder at a sum of £6000: the sale was confirmed, and out of purchase money advanced by the Respondent, Henry Grove Grady, the creditors and legatees of Thomas Lidwill the younger were satisfied.

This appeal was presented against the decrees of the Court of Exchequer, by the remainder-man next in succession, under the limitations of the settlement upon the demise of T. L. the donee of the power.

For the Appellants—Mr. Hart and Mr. Phillimore.

Whether the power to revoke the uses of the settlement by the said Thomas Lidwill the younger be considered (as intended to be executed by him) either by the deed of revocation of the 20th day of December 1782, or by his will; such executions of the power were both defective (except as to a very small part of the lands in question), since a power can only be regarded as duly executed, when all the conditions and circumstances required by the deed or instrument creating it are complied with.

* The matter of these exceptions forms no part of the present appeal.

An express condition is explicitly stated in the deed of settlement, creating the power by which Thomas Lidwill the younger is restricted, in his exercise of the power, "to so much and such part only of the lands in question, as should be then in the possession of any one or more tenant or tenants, by virtue of any one or [114] more lease or leases, wherein a rent or rents, not exceeding three hundred pounds by the year in the whole, should be reserved, and made payable during the continuance of such lease or leases, and so as there should not, at the time of such revocation, be less than twenty years, or three lives, unexpired of such lease or leases:" which restriction must be considered as in the nature of a condition precedent, and any execution of the power, in which this restriction or condition is not attended to or complied with, must consequently be regarded as void and inoperative.

The condition annexed to the execution of the power, requiring that the lands over which it should be exercised should be held for a term not less than three lives, or twenty years, at the time of the execution of the power, was not introduced into the settlement without due consideration or a sufficient reason. One object of it was to relieve the remainder-men from the difficulty, at a future and possibly a remote period, of showing the value of the lands at the time of the execution of the power,—a difficulty which would occur if the lands were either actually out of lease, or held for a term nearly expired, a difficulty which the Appellant has actually experienced in this cause. It was also intended to guard against a fraudulent execution of the power, by first letting the lands at low rates for a short term, and then executing the power of revocation. It was considered by the parties to the settlement containing the power, that leases for three lives, or of which twenty years were unexpired, must be supposed to have been granted under the leasing power, and con-[115]sequently at the best rent, and, therefore, that the rent reserved in such leases would be a fair criterion of value.

Neither by the deed of revocation of the 20th day of December, 1782, nor by the last will of Thomas Lidwill the younger, is the restriction or condition annexed to the power strictly complied with, save only as to a very small portion of the lands in question.

If the intended execution of the power by the deed of revocation of the 20th day of December, 1782, be duly considered, it will be found defective or fraudulent, since there is in that deed an express but false recital, stating that the lands in question were then actually leased to solvent tenants, who had more than twenty years or three lives then to run and unexpired of their leases, and that the lands produced a profit rent of the clear yearly value of £300 or thereabouts, (thus explicitly admitting and recognising, on the part of Thomas Lidwill the younger, the necessity of a full compliance with the restriction or condition annexed to the power in that respect;) whereas it has been clearly proved and reported by the officer, to whom that matter was referred, that the recital was wholly false or erroneous, (except as to a very small part of the lands in question;) since it was found by the officer, that at the time when the said deed of revocation was executed by Thomas Lidwill the younger, a very small part only of the lands in question was actually let agreeably to the power, and that no further or other part of the lands was then in lease.

[116] If it be contended that the will of Thomas Lidwill the younger was an execution of the power of revocation, it will be found liable to the same objection on account of the non-compliance with the condition or restriction annexed to the power, the lands in question not being let agreeably to that condition, for three lives, or twenty years, at the time of the execution of Thomas Lidwill's will, or of his death; and such execution by will must also, for that reason, be regarded as wholly void and inoperative; the term of twenty-three and a half years of the part of the lands, which was, at the time of executing the deed of 1782, in lease, according to the terms of the power, having expired, and that part of the lands not being, at the execution of the will, actually let in the manner required by the deed creating the power. The will recites a title to the 300 acres: the power is to appoint land of the value of £300. The will, therefore, is merely an appointment of 300 acres, which he was not empowered to appoint; and Thomas Lidwill the younger must be considered as having been fully aware of the necessity of all the lands being so let, in order to render any execution of the power valid and effectual, because he had previously recognised and fully admitted the necessity of such a compliance with the requisitions of the power.

by the specific introduction of the recital or statement to the effect before mentioned, in the deed of revocation of the 20th day of December, 1782.

The execution of the power of revocation, by the deed of revocation of the 20th day of Decem-[117]ber, 1782, being thus defective, can be considered as an effectual execution of the power, so far only as relates to that part of the lands in question, which was found by the officer, to whom the cause was referred, to be actually let agreeably to the power, at the time of the execution of the deed of revocation.

The will of Thomas Lidwill the younger cannot be considered an effectual execution of the power, with respect to any part of the lands, because the term in that part of the lands leased in the year 1782, had then expired. Both these executions of the power must be considered as defective, and consequently void and inoperative as to the lands in question, so far as they were not under lease, according to the requisition of the power. The Appellant is clearly entitled as immediate tenant in tail in possession, under the uses of the settlement, to the lands and premises of Coologenafrin or Graffin, and the part of Clekile in the pleadings mentioned, together with the rents and profits which have accrued due thereon, from the time of the decease of Thomas Lidwill the younger.

If this were a case of mere informality in the execution of a power, the defect might be supplied in a court of equity in favour of particular objects; but the record makes no such case. The only question presented is, whether the power was legally executed. Error or mistake in the instrument creating the power or the appointment might have been rectified in equity; but no such case is alleged. The decree does not even comprise a declaration to such effect, or any thing [118] which can clear up the doubts which hang over the case. The exceptions taken to the report do not indeed touch the matter of the present appeal; but that is not a material objection, for the subsequent directions are consequential, and must stand or fall with the decree. The contract between the parties to the settlement provides what lands shall be appointed, and under what circumstances. A court of equity cannot make a new contract for the parties, or strike out of the settlement a material provision. It may be thought a capricious mode of ascertaining the value of the lands; but it has the character of caution, and, at all events, it is the caprice of parties contracting, and it is not the province of a court of justice to control such caprice, if it be legal. That the lands were, in fact, of the value contemplated is immaterial, if the mode prescribed to ascertain that value has been neglected. Appointments, in a multitude of other cases, which, apparently, have been innocent variations from the power, have been held void. In this case the defect is not in form but in substance. The Court is required in this case to substitute a new power.*

For the Respondents—Mr. Wetherell and Mr. Shadwell.

The decree, if right in substance, is not bad for form. The question is, whether the direction of the power as to lands in lease is material, or a point of form.

The father had power to make a beneficial lease [119] provided the rent was not below a certain depreciation.† Thomas Lidwill the father never having executed his power, it was indifferent whether Thomas Lidwill the younger exercised his power of leasing or not. He might have leased before he revoked; but the essential part of the power is that lands, not exceeding £300 in value, should be revoked and appointed. The report finds the value. There is no excess of the power in point of value. How can it be represented that the leasing was essential? If any prejudice to the remainder-man could have arisen from the non-leasing, the omission to do so might have avoided the power; but those interested in remainder could not be injured by the omission. The value, at the date of the revocation, was always capable of being ascertained. If leases had been actually subsisting, the revocation, no doubt, must have applied to them. If a lease had been made by Thomas Lidwill the father, there would have been a tenant at an undervalue. The revocation in such case could not have extended to lands in Graffin. The power not having been executed by the father as to those lands, the revocation might extend to them. The last clause shows that the power of Thomas Lidwill the younger is absolute. If the words of the power are ambiguous, the construction ought to be favourable to the object of the power.

* As to the restrictions, the doctrine in the case of the Earl of Montague v. the Earl of Bath, 2 Ch. Rep. 191, was cited by Mr. Phillimore.

† This power, it seems, extended only to lands in Graffin, and a mode was prescribed of ascertaining the yearly value of the lands to be leased under the power. It was not set forth in the printed cases; nor was the deed containing it before the House of Lords upon the hearing.—See the observation of the Lord Chancellor upon this subject, post, 124.

[120] We stand on the right of creditors. Thomas Lidwill had a power to appoint by will as well as by deed, and he expressly refers to the deed by the will. It is the same thing as if he had sold to a purchaser in his lifetime.

The Lord Chancellor. Do the debts cover the estate? Is there any other fund to pay debts?

For the Respondents. The debts exceed the value of the estate appointed, which is the only fund for payment. In what form an agreement or appointment is made a court of equity does not regard—a bond or any writing may operate as an appointment. By the will, the fund is given to trustees to sell and dispose in payment of debts. In the case of the Earl of Montague v. the Earl of Bath (2 Ch. Rep. 191), the judges intimated, that if it had been the case of creditors, purchasers, or children, they would have decided for the validity of the revocation; but it was the case of a volunteer, and that circumstance was the ground of the judgment.

The Lord Chancellor. I apprehend they will not dispute, that, if he intended to execute, it would, in that respect, operate as an appointment; but they say he has failed in the subject of the power.

For the Respondents. The remainder-man cannot be affected by this mode of appointment.

Such construction should be made upon the instrument creating and the instrument executing a power as will effectuate the intention of those creating the power, and further the objects of such power.

Upon this principle the deed of 20th December, 1782, is a due execution of the power of [121] revocation contained in the settlement of 14th January, 1774, so far as the estate, the subject of the power, would extend, it has been literally pursued: throughout it has been substantially executed. It appears by the officer's report, unexcepted to (in this respect), that the revoked lands at the time of the execution of the deed of 20th December, 1782, did not exceed £300 a year in value. The intention of the power was to allow lands of that annual value to be revoked; and it pointed out the means of ascertaining that value by the existence of leases of a certain description; but where no such leases existed on the estate, the subject of the power, the donee of the power was not to be deprived of the benefit of the execution of the power: he was not to be driven to a formal execution of leases, so as to bring himself and the lands within the very letter of the power.

Although the deed of the 20th of December, 1782, and the will of Thomas Lidwill should be deemed a defective execution of the power, a court of equity will supply a defective execution in favour of creditors:—and it appears that the debts reported due by Thomas Lidwill, the donee of the power, amounted to the sum of £7512 17s. 4d. and that his creditors have no other fund for payment of their debts but the revoked lands, the subject of the power.

The Appellant has submitted to this view of the case, for he took no exception to the officer's report, which finds that Thomas Lidwill died seized of the revoked lands; but, on the contrary, he took several exceptions, because the [122] officer did not report him to be a creditor of Thomas Lidwill on the revoked lands, a case altogether inconsistent with that which he now brings by way of appeal: and, moreover, the Appellant went into evidence before the officer, to show that the revoked lands exceeded in value, at the time of the revocation in 1782, £300 a year.—He failed in making such proof; and it was satisfactorily proved by the Respondents, that the lands did not exceed £300 a year in value: the officer so reported, and his report stands unimpeached in that point.

The whole power must be read together: the last clause is the key to its meaning. There it is expressed to be the true meaning and intent that Thomas Lidwill the younger should have absolute power over and property in the lands to the amount in value of £300 a year. A special mode of leasing is provided (see notes, pp. 119, 124), by the deed of settlement, as to part of the estate called Graffin; but not as to other parts of the estates. They might never be under lease. No direction to lease is given, nor any mode prescribed by the instrument of contract. It is analogous to the cases of leasing powers, where it is provided that leases shall be made at the usual rent. In such cases, with respect to lands which have never been leased, and for which, consequently, there can be no usual rent, it has been held (Goodtitle v. Funnecan, Doug. 544) that the power extends to such lands, if it appears to be the intention of the parties to the instrument raising the power. It can only extend to such lands by estimate or valuation; it [123] is reduced therefore to a question of intention. In Bagot v. Oughton (1 P. W. 347; Fortescue, 332; Mod. Cas. 249, 381), as Lord Mansfield said, in Goodtitle v. Funnecan, it was evident, from the nature of the thing, that the power of a temporary owner could not extend to the letting the ancient manor house, and excluding the representatives of the family who might succeed him.

The objection to the frame of the suit is too late; it should have been taken when a reference was decreed as to the value of the lands not leased. There has been no exception to the report on that point; nor is there any appeal against the decree which assumes that the value was the material question.

Mr. Hart in reply. The owner of property may exercise the most arbitrary and capricious will, and annex unreasonable conditions to his gifts. The Court cannot interpose a Praetorian equity.

The Lord Chancellor. The real question is, had he or not a right, by a due execution of the power, to affect the land made the subject of appointment. The true meaning and intent of the power is to be considered, and whether the condition is mere matter of form.

Lord Redesdale. The decree supposes that the power is well executed at law.

Reply. It has been argued that the generality of the latter part of the power supercedes the restrictions of the former part. The power directs that the appointment shall be of so much and such parts of the premises as shall be in possession of tenants having interests, by way of lease, for twenty years to come, or for the duration of three lives, from the date of the revocation, and that [124] the rent payable on the leases shall not exceed £300. What is there in the clause which follows expressly rescinding this provision and condition? What is there to furnish an implication that it could be within the intent of the parties to annul this express condition? It has lately and often been regretted that courts of equity, in the cases even of meritorious objects, should have adopted the practice to supply the want of form in appointments.

The latter clause must be taken with and explained by the first. The restrictions were material to ascertain the value before it had become difficult by lapse of time. It was a security taken by making the son the first victim of any indiscreet exercise of the power.*

* In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor censured the omission to furnish instruments referred to in the printed papers, observing, that the power to Lidwill the elder to grant leases contained provisions as to the mode of ascertaining the full improved yearly value at the time of making leases under the power. Those provisions were not set forth, but only alluded to in the printed cases as "therein (i.e. in the deed of settlement) particularly mentioned," and the instrument containing that power was not before the House.

The rule of construction as to powers has varied materially in different ages of the law, in different courts, and with different judges. What is essential to be observed in the conditions or circumstances prescribed by the power is now, and, perhaps, from the nature of the subject, ever will be a matter of uncertainty, unless all discretion of the judge is taken away, and a literal observation of the power in every particular is required. The same uncertainty prevails in many similar questions of this [125] branch of law, as, for example, what is a valid, what an illusory appointment? What a reasonable time to be allowed for payment of rent, in a lease made under a power requiring a right of re-entry to be reserved for non-payment of rent? The cases decided on these points seem to furnish rules only for cases exactly similar. In a new case, where the appointment varies in any circumstance from the authority, whether it be a valid execution of the power, can only be matter of probable conjecture, until the opinion of some court has been pronounced upon the particular case.

The Lord Chancellor, on the day after the argument, said, upon the whole, we think that the power was well applied to the subject, and that the appointment has been well executed; and, without further observation, the judgment of the Court below was affirmed.

Every new decision upon these questions does, indeed, make an approximation to certainty; but it never will be fully attained until every variety in powers is exhausted, and it can be declared to be impossible to contrive a new condition or circumstance to accompany any power.

A distinction has been taken between the cases where a man has power to make leases, etc. which shall charge and encumber a third person's estate; and where the power is to dispose of a man's own estate, as upon a settlement in tail or otherwise, with power of revocation in the settlor. In the first case, it is said, such powers are to have a rigid construction; but where the power is to dispose of a man's own estate, it is to have all the favour imaginable.—See Sayle v. Freeland, 2 Vent. 350.

In Comberbach, 11, 12, (a book, indeed, of little authority,) it is said, powers of revocation are to be largely taken. This is probably to be understood of such powers, where they are reserved by the owners of the estate to themselves. In Scrope's Case, 10 Rep. 144, where the power was to determine existing uses and limit new ones, and the donee, (who was before owner of the estate,) covenanted upon a second marriage, to stand seized to new uses, without determining or declaring any purpose to determine the former uses, it was held a valid revocation, on the ground, that when he limited new uses, he thereby signified his purpose to determine the former uses: and a case is cited, as an authority for the decision, with the maxim, "Non refert an quis intentionem suam declarat verbis an rebus ipsis vel factis."

In the case now reported, the decision seems to have been made on the ground that the intention of the donor was not transgressed in the execution of the power. The noble Lords who moved the judgment apparently considered the power to be well executed at law. The doctrine of equity, by which the defects in the execution are supplied in favour of special objects of appointment, cannot be considered as a ground of decision in this case, although the Lord Chancellor, in the course of the argument, put a question, which seemed to point to such a ground.—See and compare the observations, pp. 120 and 123.

In these questions, upon the execution of powers, the difficulty lies, and insuperable it seems, between discretion with uncertainty on the one hand, and a literal construction with intolerable hardship on the other.

SCOTLAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

THOMAS GRAHAM, of Kinross, etc.—Appellant: PAGE KEBLE, a Lunatic, Residuary Legatee of P. K., dec.; R. SAUNDERS, Esq. Comm. of the said P. K.'s Estate; and R. RATTRAY, Esq. Mandatory of the said R. SAUNDERS, —Respondents [19th July 1820].

[See 2 Dow, 17; 6 Paton, 616; 3 Scots R.R., 563; Keble v. Graham's Trustees, 1827, 6 Shaw, 119; 1830, 4 Wils. and S. 166; Palmer and Co.'s Assignees v. Glas's Trustee, 1835, 13 Shaw, 311.]

K. having left East-India bonds in the hands of a mercantile firm at Calcutta, with directions to apply the interest and principal when received to a specific purpose, by his will appointed G., a partner in the firm, one of his executors. After the death of K., the will was proved by G.; and the firm, acting under his authority as executor, assigned the bonds, and used in their trade the money received upon the assignments.

G. ceased to be a partner in the firm before all the bonds had been assigned.

Upon suit, by the residuary legatee of K. against G., and on appeal, it was held that he was accountable to the residuary legatee of K. for the monies received upon the bonds, with 8 per cent. from the time of the deposit to the dates of the respective assignments by the firm: and with interest at 12 per cent. (being the current rate in Calcutta) from the time of the assignments and receipt of the monies to the date of the judgment upon appeal in the original suit; and with interest at 5 per cent. upon the accumulated sum, composed of principal and interest, from the last-mentioned judgment till payment: but the cost of remittance from India, and the property-tax, were held to be charges on the fund payable.

Upon a general account subsisting between K. and the Calcutta firm, held that G., as partner and executor, was liable for the balances of account, and interest at 12 per cent. upon all such balances as should appear to be stated and signed by the parties: such interest to be calculated from the date of the statement and signature of the account to the time of the final judgment on appeal.

Held also that G. was not, as executor, entitled to withhold payment against the residuary legatee until an account of debts, etc. had been taken: and that, as debtor, he was not entitled to require that executors in [127] England (who had also proved the will of K.) should be parties to the suit in order to give him an acquittance.

In appellate proceedings interest upon the accumulated sum of principal and interest is chargeable on the debtor from the date of a judgment in the Court of Session to the date of the judgment in the Court of Appeal, although the Respondent has obtained an inhibition against the lands of the Appellant before the date of the original judgment.

Where a matter is, by the pleadings, specifically made the subject of demand, and the judgment is general for the demandant, yet, if a particular part of the demand, as the rate of interest, was not discussed, or specifically decided in the suit, it is not res judicata.

Page Keble, of Calcutta, in the year 1785, deposited certain bonds, due from the East-India Company, in the hands of Messrs. Graham, Crommeline, and Mowbray, a mercantile house at Calcutta, of which the Appellant was a partner. These bonds amounting, in the whole, to 46,428 current rupees, were delivered with instructions as to their application. They were to be appropriated eventually in payment of a debt owing by Mr. Keble to the East-India Company, and which became payable in the year 1796.

Soon after making this deposit, Mr. Keble quitted India, and died on his passage to England.

By his will, which he had left in the hands of Messrs. Graham and Co. as his agents, the Appellant was named one of Mr. Keble's executors, with certain other persons in Europe. The European executors having proved the will, transmitted powers of attorney to the Appellant and his partners, authorising them to act in the affairs of Mr. Keble's estate. But in the mean time the Appellant had proved the will at Calcutta: and the house of [128] Graham, Crommeline, and Mowbray, by a letter dated the 10th of September, 1787, informed the executors in England that they had no occasion to use the power of attorney, as they could act under the authority of the Appellant as executor.

No account of the affairs of Mr. Keble was transmitted to the European executors until the 10th of March, 1791, at which time the Appellant had retired from the firm, and in the November following the house failed. Some of the bonds deposited had been indorsed away by the house, for their own accommodation, between the months of November, 1789, and October, 1790, before the Appellant had retired from the concern: the remaining bonds were disposed of in the same way soon after his retirement.*

There was also a sum due to the estate of Page Keble on a balance of account subsisting between him and the Calcutta firm.

* The particular dates of the assignments of the bonds were not very exactly ascertained in the proofs before the House. The point is not very material, according to the view taken by the Lord Chancellor in moving the judgment.

The Respondent, Mr. Keble, as residuary legatee under the will of his father, as soon as these facts came to his knowledge, required the Appellant to account for the funds due from the house of Graham and Co. to the estate of the deceased, and, upon his refusal,* brought an action against [129] him before the Court of Session in Scotland. When the action was commenced the Appellant was still resident in Bengal, but having land in Scotland was subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of that country. The summons, in the action, concluded for payment of the amount of the bonds deposited by the late Mr. Keble in the hands of the Appellant and his then partners, with interest, praying that the Court would "decern and ordain the said Thomas Graham, Defender, to make payment to the Pursuer of the specific sum of £4786 8s. 6d. sterling, with interest, at the rate of 8 per cent. till the bonds were severally cancelled or endorsed away; and with interest after that period at the rate of 12 per cent. being the legal rate of interest in Bengal to the time of payment; and interest on the sum of £2126 13s. 8d., the balance of account from the 14th of February, 1788, at 12 per cent. and until payment, etc."

This action was commenced in December, 1803, and at the same time a diligence of inhibition was executed by the Respondent against the lands of the Appellant in Scotland. After various proceedings in the Court of Session, an interlocutor was pronounced on the 11th of March, 1808.†

[130] From this decree, an appeal, partly on the charge of Indian interest, was brought in the House of Lords; on hearing which, in the year 1813, the judgment was affirmed, upon the ground that the Appellant being a partner in a house of agency, where a deposit was placed in special trust, became and acted as the executor of the person by whom the deposit was made; and that having acted in that fiduciary character he could not renounce it, and elect to act under his other character of agent, that he could do no act, in respect of the estate, for which he was not answerable as executor, and could not be discharged of the trust.‡

The decree thus affirmed did not ascertain the periods of the different rates of interest. It became necessary therefore to present a petition to the Court below to have the sum due ascertained. With this petition a "state of the debt" due by the Appellant was lodged, in which (inter alia) interest was charged at the rate of 12 per cent. from the different periods at which the money secured by the bonds had been received by the firm, in which the Appellant was partner, to the date of the judgment in the House of Lords, according to which calculation the debt amounted to the sum of £19,413 16s. 2d.

This petition being remitted by the Court to the Lord Ordinary, the Appellant was allowed to put in objections to the state of the debt.

The Appellant thereupon contended that the [131] House of Lords, by their judgment, had determined that he, "having taken out a probate as executor, could not divest himself of the character of executor;" and, therefore, that he must pay off and see discharged the debts and legacies due from the estate of the late Page Keble before the amount of the residue could be ascertained: that he had a right to resist payment, or accounting to the Respondents, until he was satisfied what might be the just amount of the residuary estate of the deceased. The Respondents insisted that the House of Lords, having "affirmed the interlocutors of the Court of Session," and given judgment in terms of the conclusions of the libel, which was to make

* The same demand had, in the year 1796, been made upon the Appellant in India, and proceedings against him, in the courts of Calcutta, had been in contemplation: but, after various negotiations and transactions, a case was submitted to the Advocate General by the East-India Company, and that officer, in 1802, gave his opinion that the Appellant was not responsible. Whereupon the East-India Company enforced the payment of their debt against the estate of Page Keble, and no proceedings were taken against the Appellant until he became amenable to the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts. The facts, upon this part of the case, are omitted in the text, because, (although pressed in argument,) they do not appear to have been noticed in the reasons given for the judgment.

† The Appellant became resident in Great Britain in the year 1808.

payment to the Pursuers of a certain specific sum total of principal, with interest due thereon, at certain specific rates, it was incompetent for the Court of Session now to hear the Appellant upon any point or points, save those relating to the mere accuracy, in point of computation, of the "state," exhibited with the Respondents' petition.

The Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor, of the 28th June, 1814, (having repelled the objections by a former interlocutor, and having found the Appellant liable to the costs incurred since the cause was remitted,) decerned against the Defender (Appellant) for the sum of £19,413 16s. 2½d. sterling (according to the computation of the Respondent), with the interest thereof, at the rate of 5 per cent. from and after the term of Martinmas, 1813, and until paid.

To this judgment he adhered after several representations.

[132] The Appellant thereupon petitioned the Court of Session (Second Division) against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and by the original and various re-claiming petitions, the Appellant raised the following objections:—1. That the claim to interest ought to be restricted to 8 per cent. to the year 1796. 2. That British interest only ought to be allowed from 1796, or, otherwise, from 1803; or, from 1806, or, at the utmost, from 1808. 3. That there ought to be no accumulation of interest. 4. That he was entitled to deduct the expense of remittance from Bengal. 5. That he was entitled to make deductions, on account of the property-tax, from 1803. The Court, by five interlocutors, affirmed the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and over-ruled all the objections except what related to the property-tax, which the Court held the Appellant was entitled to deduct from 1808 to 1813, when the debt is accumulated, and also to deduct the property-tax from the interest of the accumulated sum from Martinmas 1813, until payment.*

From these several interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary of the 15th and 28th June, 8th July, and 22d December, 1814, and of the Second Division of the Court of 4th July and 15th November, 1815, 13th February, 1st and 8th March, 1816, the appeal was presented.

For the Appellant—Mr. Wetherell and Mr. Brougham.

1. This is not a case where a trustee has made use of the money committed to his charge; it is a [133] simple breach of trust at the utmost. By the judgment of this House, in 1813, the Appellant is charged as executor: in the summons he is charged both as debtor and executor. The pleas in defence took issue upon both those points, and the Court has decided generally in the terms of the libel, embracing both the media concludendi. If the Appellant is charged as executor, the Respondent, suing under the qualified title of residuary legatee, is only entitled to the surplus above debts and general legacies; and before any sum can be finally awarded and paid to him under the authority of the Court, it must be ascertained that all prior claims upon the estate have been satisfied. If the Appellant is charged as a debtor only, the English executors ought to be parties in the suit in order to give a discharge. An executor only has authority to receive the debt and acquit the debtor; and even the authority of the Court could not protect the Appellant from future responsibility, if this money should be required to satisfy creditors of the estate. Considered in the double character of debtor and executor, the Appellant is equally entitled to have it ascertained that debts and legacies are discharged before he pays over any sum as a residue. This claim is not inconsistent with the decree, by which the Appellant is bound to pay, through the medium of the legal representative, what is due to the estate of Page Keble, and those having right to that estate in their order of preference.

2. As to the objection, that it is not now competent for the Appellant to object to the rates of interest, because the summons concluded speci[134]fically for those rates of interest, and the Court below has decided in terms of the libel; and that judgment having been affirmed on appeal, it is now res judicata, and no longer questionable; it is an objection founded in fallacy.

If that matter had been proposed and repelled in the cause, or competent and omitted, in foro contradictorio, both the policy and statutory enactments (Scots Stat.

* This part of the judgment below, as the Respondent alleged, was by consent.
— See p. 113.

1672, c. 19) of the law would have excluded the Appellant from further litigation. But on this point no question was raised or debated in the former proceedings, no defence was urged, and the judgment, so far as it affects the question of the rates of interest, was virtually a decree in absence, which never was held to constitute res judicata. The conclusion of the summons was for two distinct matters, a principal sum and interest at, etc. to the date hereof, and in time coming till payment. The defence was, simply, that the Appellant was not responsible, and no other question was considered, or intended to be adjudged in the cause, but that of his general liability. Where defences have been made upon one branch of a cause, and omitted as to another, no presumption can be raised against the Defender as having confessed the matter, and submitted to judgment on the point undefended and undiscussed. Such is the principle and practice upon a decree in absence, where the party has been cited, and even where he has appeared by his procurator. It is said that there has been no denial of the allegations of the summons as to interest; yet, in the petition of the 31st August, 1815, which was presented after the [135] date of the summons, this passage is to be found:—"It is allowed, on all hands, that from the beginning to the end of the pleadings not a word has been said on the subject of interest."

Moreover, if this be res judicata, the Court itself has invaded and disturbed its own judgment. For the original decree, in terms of the libel, was for interest at 12 per cent. till payment. But since the cause was remitted from this House, a new judgment has given interest, at 5 per cent. from November, 1813; and whereas the summons makes no conclusion for accumulation of interest, the subsequent judgment authorises accumulation to the 12th of November, 1813. The Respondents, after the judgment in 1813, did not sue execution, but proceeded before the Court to settle all the details as to interest. They have, in this and other respects, treated the matter as res non judicata. So has the Court below, and no cross appeal on that ground is entered. The plea of res judicata has been rejected, in many cases, much stronger than the present. Millie v. Millie (Dict. of Dec. Tit. process, No. 318, Nov. 27, 1801), Young v. Mitchell (No. 320, Feb. 10, 1803), Chirurgeons of Glasgow v. Reid (No. 340, Dec. 17, 1701), Smith v. Semple (No. 341, Dec. 14, 1711).

A foreign rate of interest is a fact, upon which no decree can be made, without proof or express admission. Decrees must be founded upon allegation and proof. Admission of the fact cannot be implied where the question has never been [136] raised; at all events, not before the decree is extracted. Such implication is never made against a party unless the matter has been referred to his oath as the medium of proof, and he does not appear, and answer upon oath. Upon a verdict in an action for a promissory note interest follows incidentally by way of damages; but every claim for debt or damage does not, as a matter of course, include interest. In equity proof is required of the employment of the money. The defence, therefore, against the liability for the principal does not comprise a defence against liability for interest. Upon this point, therefore, the judgment is not conclusive against the Appellant. In moving the judgment in this House in 1813 not a word was said upon the subject of interest.

3. Indian interest is not due to the extent awarded. The Appellant has not used the funds, and the Respondents ought not to benefit, by their own delay, from 1791 to 1803. During all that time they might have sued in the courts of Bengal. The House of Graham and Co. were instructed by Page Keble to invest his money in the purchase of bonds, which were to remain in their hands until the joint bond to the Company became due, which happened in 1796. The interest upon bonds so purchased would have been 8 per cent. or less, and the purpose of the deposit terminated in 1796. The Appellant, therefore, is not chargeable with more than 8 per cent., nor beyond 1796 at the utmost. From the year 1796, when the bonds ought to have been applied in payment to the Company, the amount became a debt, owing from one British subject to another, upon which, [137] by the statute against usury (12 Anne, c. 16), more than 5 per cent. cannot be demanded.

According to authorities in the law of Scotland, interest, above the domestic rate, is not allowed even upon foreign contracts, Savage v. Craig (Fountain-hall, vol. ii. p. 559), Wood v. Grainger (Fac. Coll. June 24, 1779). In Campbell v. Hannay (Ibid. Feb. 15, 1800), interest was, indeed, finally given at 8 per cent. according to contract by bond; but that is a single case not applicable in its circumstances, and the authority is questionable. This is not a foreign but a British debt, nor constituted by contract but by law. This distinction is recognised by the text writers: by Dirlton (P. 227, voce process against strangers), and by Lord Kaimes.* According to these principles, if the Appellant is considered as responsible for the bonds, the interest which they bore is the proper rate. When it became a debt constituted by law, he is only liable to interest established by the law of the country where the remedy is applied. Upon the same principle it is that the law of Scottish prescription is applied to debts arising upon foreign transactions, when the party sues in the courts of Scotland.† At all events foreign interest ought to cease, and British interest to commence either from the 13th of December, 1803, when the first step was taken in the action, or from the 14th of November, 1806, which is the date of the first decree. The Appellant, upon the first process, [138] might have obtained security for the amount.‡ If the commencement of the action did not, at least the judgment of the Court, in 1806, did make it a Scotch debt, carrying Scotch interest. If that judgment should be considered as interlocutory, then the final decree by the Court of Session in 1808 ought to be the period for the computation of British interest. By the judicial proceedings in Scotland, the debt was, or might have been, secured by the Scotch law; and by the execution of the inhibitions, in 1803, against the heritable estates of the Appellant, it became a Scotch debt vested upon heritable security.

4. Foreign interest cannot be due after the year 1808, when both debtor and creditor were resident in Great Britain. Interest, at more than 5 per cent. is forbidden by law between parties so resident. The place of the original contract, or of the transactions from which the liability arose, cannot alter the law between resident subjects. While one of the parties to the contract is absent in the foreign country, the courts here may apply the foreign law, but not after the parties become resident in this country. Could parties intending to negotiate a loan, by going to Ireland for the purpose, fabricate a bond, which, upon their return, should bear interest at 6 per cent! Could such a transaction be sustained upon a short residence? If so, the statutes against usury are futile.

Interest does not depend unalterably upon the original constitution of the debt, but arises from [139] detention of the money due. It is an equivalent for the use of the money; and a change in the rate of interest ought to follow a change in the residence of the parties, by which the use and the remedy are regulated. While the Appellant remained in Calcutta, the place of implied contract, he might be liable to Indian interest: when he came to Great Britain the implication as to interest ceased. The Appellant then became amenable to British laws both in person and estate. He ought not to be injured by delay in the administration of justice.

Whether foreign interest can be given by the courts of Great Britain must depend on the nature of the contract and the residence of the parties, or one of them in the place of contract. Such was the case of Bodily v. Bellamy (2 Burr. Rep. 1091). There was express contract by bond, and the Plaintiff, from the date of the obligation to the time of judgment in the action, had been resident at Calcutta. Under those circumstances the Court gave interest at 9 per cent. In Elkins v. the East-India Company § foreign interest was given upon the value of a ship and cargo, because it was wrongfully taken from the agent of the owner, and the Court held that the Company (who may be considered as residents of India) had made the usual advantage of money in that country. In Boddam v. Riley,|| interest was refused upon the balances of unsettled accounts of a partnership in Bombay, notwithstanding [140] standing the custom of the country, stated upon affidavit, to charge and allow interest in all mercantile transactions, and upon debts in general. In that case, Lord Thurlow observed, "I am to say, that although the general rule of law is otherwise, yet, by reason of this custom, interest is to run on a debt not carrying interest in this country, because the original transaction was in India; I cannot admit such a custom to control the clear law of this country." In a former stage of the same case, Lord Thurlow had said, that interest was not in the discretion of the Court, and could only be given upon contract.*

In Connor v. the Earl of Bellamont (2 Atk. 382), Irish interest was given, because the debt, though contracted in England, was charged upon land in Ireland, and the debtor being an Irish Peer executed a bond in Ireland to secure the debt.

The neglect of the Respondent is a further reason for refusing all interest. This claim was raised against the Appellant when he was in India in 1796, and was apparently abandoned, after an opinion had been given against the claim by the Advocate General of Calcutta in 1802. The Appellant might have made arrangements to dis-[141]-charge or diminish the debt, if he could have anticipated that the claim would be renewed in Scotland after so great a lapse of time.

5. Compound interest ought not to have been allowed. If, as the Respondent contends, the affirmance of the judgment in this House is conclusive upon the question of interest, then there being no conclusion in the summons for accumulation of interest, the judgment, which is in terms of the libel, does not warrant accumulation.

If the judgment is not conclusive, as the Appellant contends, then it will be necessary for the Respondents to amend their libel (if that can now be permitted) before any judgment can be given for a right, which, as the summons is now framed, makes no part of the Respondents' demand. Independent of all questions of form, interest upon interest is never allowed, but upon adjudication, or a denounced horning upon an extracted decree.

6. The Appellant is entitled to deduct the cost of remittance. If this was a debt contracted, and payable in Bengal, the creditor is bound to receive it there. In Campbell v. Hannay (ante, p. 136) the Court refused the debtor's cost of remittance, because he had compelled the creditor to sue in Scotland; but in this case the creditor has avoided the forum contractus, and selected the courts of Scotland.

7. The Appellant is also entitled to deduct the property-tax from the year 1803. The Respondent was liable to the tax, not being within the exceptions of the statutes; and the circumstance [142] that the Appellant was resident in Calcutta till 1808 is immaterial.

For the Respondents—The Solicitor General (Sir Robert Gifford) and Mr. Kindsley.

The Appellant was sued both as partner in the firm of Graham and Co. and as executor: so it appears expressly by the summons. The Respondent, suing as residuary legatee, claims a specific sum as residue against a person filling the character both of debtor and executor: and so he was charged by the judgment below, according to the allegations of the summons, and the defence made by the Appellant.

The argument † of novatio debiti is repelled by the fact, that the firm of Graham and Co. rejected the authority and orders of the English executors, upon the express allegation that they had the authority of the Appellant as Indian executor, and he was then also a partner of the firm.

* The report, 1 B. C. C. p. 239, supposes the Lord Chancellor to say, "that nothing but what arises from contract or demand of debt can give rise to a demand of interest." This appears both incorrect and deficient. For a demand of debt gives no right to interest, and in equity it is always given upon breach of trust. If a trustee sells stock out of the public funds, the Court gives to the cestui que trust an option to demand against the trustee the dividends which the stock would have produced, or interest upon the proceeds of the sale.

† This point was argued in the former stage of the suit. It was then contended by the Appellant, that, by the effect of the transactions between the parties, and the events which had happened, he was released; and that the new firm, after he ceased to be a partner, had been accepted and recognised as the debtors.—See the Lord Chancellor's observations in moving judgment, post, 147-8.

The question, as to the rate of interest was concluded, by the judgment of this House, in 1813. For the decrees of the inferior Court were thereby affirmed, and those decrees were in the terms of the libel, by which interest, at the rates and for the periods in question, was specifically demanded. The very question was argued in the Courts below, and upon the hearing of the appeal.

[143] In order to constitute a valid judgment, it is not necessary that the question should be debated. If it be alleged on the one part, and not contradicted on the other, that is sufficient ground for the judgment (Stair's Inst. l.) The Appellant might have pleaded, 1. that he was not liable at all; 2. if so, that the rate of interest claimed was extravagant.

The subsequent proceedings in the Court of Session, upon the subject of interest, were merely to ascertain the amount of the sum due by calculation, not to open and re-discuss the general question of liability for the specific rates of interest, and for the times before awarded. The allowance of interest follows as a consequence upon a judgment for the principal.

The allowances for property-tax, since the judgment in 1813, do not operate as an admission by the Respondent that the judgment was open: that was done by consent, and was a gratuitous boon to the Appellant.

If it be admitted that the question is open, this being a claim against a trustee, ex delicto, he is liable for the largest rate of interest which might have been made by the use of the money in the country where the breach of trust took place.* If a trustee sells out stock from the public funds, he is chargeable either with the dividends or the profits actually made, or the proceeds, with the usual [144] rate of interest at the option of the cestui que trust: so even if he represents, contrary to the fact, that he has purchased stock. Bate v. Seales.† In these cases the Court does not consider, as the measure of damages, what would have been gained for the benefit of the cestui que trust, if the directions of the trust had been followed, but what has been wrongfully acquired, or might have been acquired by the trustee upon the misapplication of the trust fund. The partners of a firm, to which the Appellant belonged, have abused their trust, and the Appellant being executor has permitted that abuse. Six of the bonds were endorsed away while the Appellant was a partner in the firm, and four a year after his retirement. If he had written or endorsed upon them a statement of the purpose for which they were deposited the loss would have been prevented; but, in gross violation of his trust, he left them in the hands of a firm, which he, as a partner, could not fail to suspect of actual or approaching insolvency.

As to the objection made against the judgment for accumulated interest, it is consonant to the settled principles of law as well as equity, that interest, ascertained and decreed upon a final judgment, should be incorporated with the principal (Bodily v. Bellamy. Ante, p. 138.) From that time the principal and interest [145] become an entire sum bearing interest. The right to interest upon this aggregate sum arises from the delay of payment caused by the appeal. The accumulation, they say, is not asked by the summons; nor is it necessary. In actions upon bills of exchange interest is not demanded by the declaration; yet it is given by the judgment, or upon motion: and upon writ of error, if the judgment below is affirmed, interest is calculated, not on the principal sum for which the action was brought, but upon the whole amount recovered by the judgment below up to the time of the judgment in the Court of Error†. The result is, [146] that, as long as the bonds were held by the firm, they and the Appellant as partner, trustee, or executor, are responsible for the amount of interest paid upon them, which appears to be 8 per cent. From the time when the bonds were assigned and converted into money, which they used, or might have used in Calcutta, and up to the date of the final judgment, the common interest of the country, which is 12 per cent per annum, has been rightly charged against the Appellant; and, after the date of the final judgment, the Respondent is entitled to English interest upon the whole sum ascertained and awarded by the judgment.

The Lord Chancellor, in the course of the argument, made the following observations:—

Laying the rule of law out of the case altogether, is not this, upon the special circumstances of the case, a continuing trust?

If I intrusted a person to lay out money for me in government bonds, and if, instead of doing so, he had laid it out for himself, or for his own partnership, would he not be liable to pay [147] me the common rate of interest? For this reason, it becomes material to be considered whether the interest, as payable on the bonds, ought to be continued after 1791, or whether it ought to cease. It is contended, by the Appellant, that the interest, as on the bonds, ought not to cease after 1791, if a larger rate of interest is to be charged, when the interest, as on the bonds, ceases. On this point the questions to be settled are whether the former interest is to go up to 1791 only, or to 1796; and whether the larger rate of interest is to go on to 1813, or to cease in 1803; or when to commence, and when to cease. On this point there is a difference in the statements of the parties as to the facts. The Appellant states in his case that all the bonds were uplifted after he had left the partnership. The Respondent, on the other hand, in his case states, that, in respect to six of them, they were indorsed away between the months of November, 1789, and October, 1790, and that the remaining bonds were disposed of soon after the Appellant had taken leave of the concern. As a question of fact considered material in arguing this case, it may easily be ascertained, with respect to these bonds, whether they were disposed of by the partners of the house after Mr. Graham had left the concern, or whether he is to be considered as having been a partner in the house when the bonds were is made by the statutes for preventing delays in suits of law, 13 Car. 2, s. 2, c. 2, s. 8, 9, 10. The Plaintiff, upon suing his writ of error, is, by that statute, compelled to give security for damages as well as costs, otherwise execution may issue, without stay or supersedeas, notwithstanding the writ of error. See also, 3 Jac. 1, c. 8, made perpetual by 3 Car. 1, c. 4, s. 4, 16 and 17 Car. 2, c. 8, s. 3. Upon affirming a judgment in the Exchequer, the Chancellor personally (who, with the treasurer and judges, are, by the 31 Edw. III. constituted a court for examining erroneous judgments in the Exchequer), gives interest, computed according to the current (not the legal) rate, from the day of signing judgment below to the day of affirmance in that Court of Error. In the Exchequer Chamber, which is a Court established by 27 Eliz. c. 8, to rectify errors in the judgments of the King's Bench, if no direction is given by the court, the officer (under the authority of 13 Car. 2, s. 2, c. 2, s. 10,) in taxing costs, allows double the money out of pocket, but gives no interest. In the King's Bench, upon writs of error from the Common Pleas, interest is usually given, by way of damages, upon the sum recovered in, and from the time of signing the judgment below until the affirmance. Bishop of London, etc. v. Leven, 2 Strange, 931; Bodily v. Bellamy, 2 Burr. 1094. By stat. 3 Hen. 7, c. 10, upon all writs of error sued, in delay of execution, to reverse judgments "if they be affirmed, or the writs discontinued in default of the party, or the Plaintiffs be non-sued in the same, the Defendants in Error shall recover costs and damage, for delay and vexation, by discretion of the justice before whom the writ is sued." This is re-enacted by 19 Hen. 7, c. 20. The Plaintiff, in the Court below, has also the option to bring an action of debt upon the judgment, in which action he may recover interest, by way of damages, for detention of the debt constituted by the judgment.

The House of Lords, in deciding appeals and writs of error, exercise a discretion as to costs and damages: to answer which, security is taken, by requiring the Appellant to enter into a recognisance, in the sum of £400 before he is permitted to prosecute his appeal.

actually disposed of. But whether he was a partner in the house or not, he was at least bound, both on account of the residuary legatee, and on his own account, to have taken some little care that no improper use was [148] made of the bonds, and to have taken that care, more especially, on account of his own character of executor.

There may be a great distinction to be made, in point of fact, with regard to the insolvency of the partnership, and with regard to the periods at which they took the bonds to themselves; but if I had put my money into the hands of the house of Graham and Co., while Mr. Graham was a partner in it, whether the other partners had continued solvent or not—whether they had continued in the country, or had left it, I should have looked to Mr. Graham, and should have expected to call upon him, according to the terms of the contract, to have that contract fulfilled to me.

The elder Page Keble died in 1786, when his son, the residuary legatee, was about five years old, since he did not attain the age of twenty-one till the year 1802. Now Mr. Thomas Graham was in a situation in which he ought to have acted both for himself and the infant.

Mr. Graham might have relieved and protected himself; and if he had considered the matter for a moment, he must have been convinced of his liability for interest, if there were no special circumstances in the case; and can he press special circumstances against an infant for whom he was trustee?

The Lord Chancellor. There was a cause heard some time ago, in which Thomas Graham was the Appellant, and Page Keble, a lunatic, and others, were Respondents.

[149] In the year 1803 an action had been brought in Scotland against the Appellant, upon his succeeding to the estate of Kinross, in Scotland. When he became entitled to that estate, and the possession of it, he became amenable to the jurisdiction of the courts in Scotland. The action was commenced by Mr. Page Keble in the Court of Session against the Appellant, while he was resident at Calcutta, and the summons stated a variety of transactions, in which Mr. Graham, the Appellant, had been engaged with Mr. Keble, the father of the Respondent. It represented that the Appellant was a member of the house of Messrs. Gramahs and Mowbray of Calcutta; that Mr. Keble, the father, before leaving India, in 1786, had executed a power of attorney in favour of that house for managing all his affairs, and uplifting the debts and effects due to him; that besides this power of attorney, he left a letter of instructions with this firm, and a duplicate of his will in the hands of the Appellant, who was his confidential friend, and who was one of the executors named in the will; that, upon receiving accounts of the death of Page Keble, the Appellant proved his will and codicil, obtained letters of administration from the Prerogative Court of Calcutta, and had extensive intromissions with the estate and effects of the said Page Keble as executor, or as a partner of the company of Graham and Mowbray, in virtue of which, it was stated, that he was justly indebted to the pursuer (Respondent, P. K.), as residuary legatee of his father, in a great variety of sums, which are stated and set forth in the summons, and which amount to [150] £4768 8s. 6d. sterling, and interest thereon: "Therefore" (the summons concluded that) "the said Thomas Graham ought and should be decreed and ordained, by decree of the Lords of Council and Session, to make payment of the principal sum of £1768 8s. 6d., and interest thereon as follows, viz. interest of the said several bonds, from their respective dates, till the same were paid or discharged, or indorsed away, and value received therefrom, at the rate of 8 per cent., being the rate of interest which these securities bore; and, afterwards, at the rate of 12 per cent. of the principal sums contained in the said bonds, being the ordinary rate of interest exigible in Bengal to the date thereof, and in time coming during the non-payment; and interest of the sum of £2426 13s. 8d. rupees, the balance of the said account, from the said 14th of February, 1788, at 12 per cent. to the date hereof, and in time coming during the non-payment, deducting always from the said principal sums and interest all partial payments, which the said Defender can instruct to be (have been) made, if any such there were."

The defence against this original action was this: that, although he had taken out probate of the will, in which he was named executor; yet he did not act, he did not possess the character of executor, and did not incur any legal responsibility: and, in the next place, that, after he had ceased to be a member of the company of Grahams and Mowbray, and was by public notice separated from it, the executors in England recognised the new company as their debtors, and had [151] intrusted the funds to the new and not to the old company, which created, what they call in Scotland, novatio debiti.

By interlocutors of 1806 and 1808 the Court of Session declare their opinion against the Appellant.

An appeal was then brought to this House, which was heard in November, 1813. Upon that appeal it was ordered and adjudged that the petition and appeal should be dismissed, and that the interlocutors therein complained of be, and the same were thereby affirmed.

After the dismissal of the appeal from this House, a petition was presented to the Lord Ordinary to apply the judgment. A great variety of proceedings appear to have taken place: and it is upon the judgments pronounced in the course of these proceedings by the Lord Ordinary and the Court of Session that this new appeal is brought, praying that these interlocutors may be reversed, and assigning several reasons which are stated.

The Appellant says he has been made liable as executor, and that he ought not to have been so made liable: and, as this action was brought against him by the residuary legatee, that it was necessary to ascertain whether all the debts and legacies had been paid before the amount due to the residuary legatee could be determined. In the next place, he objects to the rate of interest awarded, complaining that it is higher than the law authorises.

The Appellant contends also that the judgment of this House, in November, 1813, did not form a res judicata. As to the charge of Indian interest, he says the action was brought against him in 1803, in the Court of Session, without any intimation to [152] him, when he was resident in the East Indies. Now, the Scottish courts had jurisdiction by reason of his having property in Scotland, but the debt was not contracted in Scotland but in India.

He further insists, that, supposing the Court to be right as to the mode of calculating interest, he is entitled to have the charge of remitting the money from Calcutta to England deducted, and that an allowance ought to have been made for the property-tax: that it ought to have been deducted from the interest.

In my opinion the Appellant has not a right to call on the residuary legatee for an account of all the estate and effects of the testator: I do not think there is any pretence for it.

In the next place I state, as my opinion, that the decision upon the cause in this House in 1813, did not amount to a res judicata, so as to fix the Appellant with a demand to the full extent of the conclusions of the summons in the Scottish court.

The next question is, how the interest ought to be calculated: and recollecting the circumstances of this case, the place where the debt was contracted, and the judgment obtained, the party will be chargeable with interest on the different bonds, according to the interest they carried, until they were paid off, or indorsed away, at the rate of 8 per cent. By the receipt of the money due upon these bonds, a debt was constituted as an Indian debt; and being so constituted, it must, upon principles of law, bear interest at 12 per cent. from the time when the bonds were paid off until it became a British debt. When this House dismissed the appeal in this cause in November, [153] 1813, it became a British debt, and therefore from that time it can only carry British interest, that is to say, interest at 5 per cent.; and that interest at 5 per cent. is to be calculated on the sum constituted, by consolidating the principal sum, with interest at 8 per cent. on the different bonds from their dates till they were paid off, and 12 per cent. from the time when the bonds were paid till it became a British debt, and from that moment 5 per cent. on the aggregate, composed of this consolidated sum of principal and interest. That consolidated sum should bear interest at 5 per cent.

The next question is, whether the Appellant is entitled to any thing for remittance. I think he will not be entitled to remittance for the whole sum due, as it will stand after it bears British interest at 5 per cent., and up to the day of payment; but he will, in strictness, be entitled to the cost of remittance, on the amount of the debt, as it was estimated on the 10th of November, 1813.

The last thing which I am to consider in this case relates to the deduction of the property-tax. I think he ought to be allowed a deduction of the property-tax, between the year 1803, and the time when the property-tax ceased to exist, on all sums which he can show that he paid during that period.

What I have stated, and mean to propose as the minutes of the judgment on Wednesday, is to this effect:

With respect to the bonds, the interest on them shall be calculated at the rate per cent. which they respectively bore from their dates till the time when they were discharged; and the party shall be charged with 12 per cent. after that time till [154] November, 1813, when it became a British debt. Then 5 per cent. only became chargeable on the consolidated sum of the former principal and interest. An allowance is to be made for remittance on the sum, principal, and interest, as it stood in November, 1813; and an allowance is also to be made for the property-tax between the year 1803 till the time when it ceased. With these findings, I shall propose to remit the parties to the Court of Session to do therein as may be just.

As to the sum which is due on the balance of an account, not being sure whether I rightly apprehend that part of the case, I shall consider whether it may be necessary to say any thing further upon it.

It is declared that the Appellant is to be charged with interest at the rates following, viz. with interest, at the rate of 12 per cent. upon the balance of any account which shall appear to have been stated and signed, and which is mentioned in the summons in this action, such interest to be calculated from the date of the account so stated and signed to the 10th of November, 1813; and with interest of the several bonds in the proceedings mentioned, at the rate per cent. which they respectively bore, until the times when they were respectively paid and discharged, or indorsed away; and value was given for the same, and with interest, at 12 per cent. from and after such times respectively to the 10th day of November, 1813, when the former appeal was dismissed this House. But that the Appellant is to have proper and just allowances, and deductions made, in respect of [155] partial payments, if any, which he can instruct to have been made, and in respect of interest thereof, and also a deduction of the charge of remittance to Great Britain of the consolidated amount of the debt which shall be constituted against him up to the said 10th of November, 1813; and it is further declared that the Appellant is chargeable with interest, at 5 per cent., upon such consolidated amount of debt from the said 10th day of November, 1813, until payment thereof; but with a due deduction of the property-tax upon the amount of the interest of such consolidated amount of debt so long and at such rates as the same were chargeable upon the Appellant's property in Great Britain; and it is ordered, that, with these declarations, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland to do therein as is just and consistent with these declarations.*

* Upon the questions of foreign interest and remittance, see the case of Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, ante, p. 60 et seq. and the notes to that case.

In 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. c. 36, (E.) an authority is cited, in which it is laid down generally, that, "in all cases, interest must be paid according to the law of the country where the debt was contracted, and not according to that where the debt is sued for." Instances are quoted, in which Turkish interest, although both parties had been long in England, (pl. 1.) East Indian and Irish interest, (pl. 1.) and West Indian interest, at 10 per cent. (pl. 3.) were awarded by courts of equity upon contract and breach of trust. In the same place a doubt is expressed as to the accuracy of the report of Lord Ranelagh v. Sir John Champant, 2 Vern. 395, where it is said, upon a debt contracted in Ireland, and a bond given in England to secure it, English interest was awarded; and, in contradiction to Vernon's Report, it is stated that Irish interest was allowed by the Court. So the same case is stated in Prec. in Chancery, 108.

But as to the general doctrine that interest, in all cases, is regulated by the law of the place of contract, without regard to the place where the security is given, the residence of the parties, or other circumstances, quære, and see the cases collected in the note to the foregoing case in Mr. Raithby's edition of Vernon.

SCOTLAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

JAMES Duke of ROXBURGHE, etc.—Appellant: JOHN ROBERTON, late Tenant in Newton of Roxburghe,—Respondent [17th July, 1820].

Distinguished in Elibrink (Lord) v. Scott, 1884, 11 Rettie 494, at pp. 495, 498, 499. As to English law see Massey v. Goodall, 1851, 17 Q. B. 310; Gall v. Bates, 1864, 3 H. and C. 84; 56 Geo. iii. c. 50, s. 6.

A TENANT, by a clause in his lease was bound, "at his removal, to leave upon the land all the dung and manure of the preceding year, the value to be paid by the succeeding tenant, etc.; and at no time to sell or give away any of the hay or straw of the said farm, which shall always be spent on the ground."

Held, on appeal, (reversing the judgment below) that the tenant, under this contract, is not entitled to take away or sell (or semb. to have value for) the straw of the last or way-going crop, and that the lessor is entitled to have and maintain letters of suspension and interdict if the tenant threatens to sell the straw.

The custom of the country can have no operation where there is a contract with provisions applicable to the point in dispute.

In 1790, a farm, called Newton, being parcel of the entailed estate of Roxburghe, was let by John Duke of Roxburghe for twenty-one years from that date to John Robertson, the Respondent.

In the lease there was a clause in these words:—"Farther, the said John Robertson, or his foresaids, at their removal from the said lands, shall be obliged to leave upon the ground all the dung and manure of the preceding year; but the value thereof shall be paid to them by the succeeding tenant, as the same shall be ascer-[157]-tained by two neutral men, one to be chosen by each party; and AT NO TIME shall the said John Robertson, or his foresaids, sell or give away any of the hay or straw of the said farm, which shall always be spent on the ground."

This lease expired in 1811; but by agreement with Mr. Swinton, the judicial factor,* to whom the entailed estate of Roxburghe had been committed by authority of the Court of Session, the Respondent obtained leave to possess, until Whitsunday, 1815, on the same terms as in the lease, which was to be held as continued to that period.

In the year 18—, the Appellant established his right as heir of entail, and obtained possession of the entailed estates of Roxburghe.

The Appellant, by a written intimation from the Respondent, in August, 1815, was informed that he meant to sell the whole straw of that crop, unless the Appellant would take the crop, both corn and straw, at a valuation. The Appellant having no occasion for the corn declined this proposal, stating, that he conceived the straw could not be sold, but must be consumed or left on the farm, without valuation to be paid by the landlord; but, as the Respondent disputed that point, the Appellant proposed that the straw should be left, a valuation being put upon it, and the Appellant bound himself to pay that valuation, in case it should appear that the tenant was not bound to [158] consume or leave the straw upon the farm. This proposal was rejected by the Respondent, who threatened to sell the straw. The Appellant, thereupon, obtained letters of suspension and interdict. These letters were afterwards brought to be discussed before Lord Pitmilley, who pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the foregoing minute for the charger, with the answers thereto for the suspender, and whole process, repels the reasons of suspension, and revocals the interdict, and decrees."

* The right to the entailed estates of Roxburghe was under litigation, pending which a manager was appointed.

A representation against this interlocutor having been lodged, and followed by answers, his Lordship, on the 29th of February, 1816, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered this representation, with the answers thereto, and whole process, refuses the desire of the representation, and adheres to the interlocutor represented against; finds the Respondent entitled to expenses, and allows an account thereof to be given in, and to be taxed by the auditor."

The Appellant then presented a petition to the second division of the Court of Session, on advising which the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard this petition, they adhere to the interlocutor complained of, and refuse the desire of the petition."

On the 28th of June, 1816, the Appellant presented another petition to the Lords of the second division of the Court, which, on advising, their Lordships refused.

An account of the expenses incurred by the [159] Respondent having been put in, and taxed by the auditor of the Court, the Lord Ordinary, of this date, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary approves of the auditor's report; and, in terms thereof, modifies this account to £35 16s. 3d.; decrees for the same, and the expense of extract, and allows the decret for expenses to go out and be extracted in the name of Alexander Douglas, writer to the signet, the charger's agent."

Against these several interlocutors the Duke of Roxburghe appealed to the House of Lords.

For the Appellant—The Attorney General and Mr. Bligh.

For the Respondent—Mr. C. Warren and Mr. Wetherell.

For the Respondent, it was argued, that the words did not apply to the last year of the lease; that the custom of the country, in the absence of stipulation to the contrary, gave right to the Respondent; that the straw of the last year could not be consumed on the land by the Respondent, because he was to quit at the separation of the last crop; that, as a price was, by the agreement, to be given for the dung, it was not probable the straw was to be left without recompence; that the clause, obliging the tenant to leave the hay and straw, must be limited in construction to the currency of the lease, which ceased to be binding on both parties at the same time: that the obligation, to spend hay and straw on the ground, could only apply to the period of the tenant's possession, when he had the power of spending them; and that [160] the landlord ought not to receive rent for a crop which the tenant has not reaped.

For the Appellant the argument (upon the opening and in reply) was to the following effect:

The words of the lease directly prohibit any sale of hay or straw, and provide that they shall be spent on the ground. The tenant is at no time to sell, and the straw is always to be spent on the ground. If the last year of the lease may be considered a time, or comprised in the word "always," the clause applies to the last as much as to any other year of the lease. The custom of taking away the straw of the last crop was never general, and has been long abolished as inconsistent with good husbandry. If the custom were universal and certain, it could have no effect against express agreements. It may be true, that, according to the provisions of the lease, the straw could not be spent by the tenant—that is not contemplated by the agreement. The provision and expression is that "it shall be spent on the ground." Whether the Respondent did or did not receive straw at his entry is immaterial, and the fact doubtful. He had allowance in the rent, and stipulated, in other beneficial terms of the lease, for the value of the straw which he might leave at the last crop. The stipulation as to price for the dung, and the omission as to straw, creates a presumption the very opposite to that for which the Respondent contends.

The words of the lease are clear, and in claris non est locus interpretationi. If they were doubtful, there is strong corroboration of the Appellant's construction in the context. [161] For, in the very sentence next to that immediately preceding the clause founded on by the Appellant, there is special mention of the last or way-going crop: and in the sentence immediately preceding that founded on by the Appellant, there is special mention of a time, viz. the time of removal of the Respondent. After that follows the agreement, that at no time shall any straw be sold, or given away, but always be spent on the ground.

From the connexion of these sentences, it is demonstrable that the parties in the lease must, in the last sentence, have contemplated the way-going crop, and time of removal.

The interpretation of the Respondent would entitle him to accumulate straw for any number of the years of the lease, and take it away at the expiration of the term.

If a construction were to be forced upon the clause, from views of hardship, and the notion of an imperfect expression of intention, this conjectural and equitable construction could never go farther than the insertion of a clause allowing to the tenant value for the straw which he left. But that would not support the interlocutors under appeal. It would only have entitled the Respondent to a claim for value, but not to sell the straw: and therefore the suspension, at the instance of the Appellant, must have been well founded, and the reasons of suspension ought to have been sustained.*

[162] The Lord Chancellor. This case arises upon a lease made between John Duke of Roxburghe and John Robertson, bearing date the 11th and 19th of February, 1790, by which it is contracted, on the part of the Duke of Roxburghe, to set for the rent, and upon the conditions therein mentioned the farm, called Newtown, with its appurtenances, for the term of twenty-one years, from and after the said John Robertson's entry, which it was thereby declared should take place at the term of Whitsunday then next, old style, with regard to the houses, grass, and pasture ground: and with regard to the arable land and corn, at the separation of the crop, 1790, from the ground. With respect to the management of the farm, the following provisions are made:—

"John Robertson obliges himself and his heirs, first, to keep in grass during the tack, and, at the expiry thereof, one-third part at least of the arable lands; secondly, that, of all the land kept in tillage, one-fifth part at least should be in fallow or turnip yearly, and both sufficiently manured: thirdly, that whatever land should be laid [163] down in grass should be sufficiently sown with sound grass seeds for the fallow crop: fourthly that during the last year of the tack, one-fifth part at least of the lands in tillage should be left in one or two brakes for the incoming tenant to fallow: fifthly, that John Robertson and his aforesaid should give the due changes of seed, that is to say, they shall not sow wheat after wheat, nor wheat after rye or oats: nor oats after wheat or rye, nor oats after oats: neither shall they sow more wheat on the land, in any one year of the three last years of the tack, than what they have been in the practice of sowing annually during the preceding years of the tack."

And it was further covenanted between the parties that no "meadow ground, on any part of the lands thereby set, should ever be fallowed or riven out, but always kept in grass: and that no turfs or divots should be cast on any part of the land, which, on no pretence, should be pared or burnt."

Then follows this provision:—

"Whereas the rent hereinbefore covenanted was specially ascertained and agreed

* Upon the question whether the custom of the country was not excluded where an agreement expressed the terms of the tenancy, and whether an omission to provide by the lease for payment of a given article did not furnish a presumption that no payment for that article was intended, where payment for other articles was provided for by the lease, the case of Webb v. Plummer was cited. In that case, by the custom of the country, the outgoing tenant was entitled to an allowance for foldage from the incoming tenant. The lease specified certain payments to be made by the incoming to the outgoing tenant at the time of quitting the premises, among which there was not included any payment for foldage. It was held that the terms of the lease excluded the custom, and that the outgoing tenant was not entitled to any allowance in respect of foldage. 2 B. and A. 746.

upon between the parties, and in the view and upon the condition that the lands should be managed, cropped, and cultivated after the method, and according to the rotation specially above set forth; therefore, in case the said John Robertson shall, during the currency of the tack, depart from the method of labour or rotation before described, without leave in writing given by the said noble Duke or [164] his chamberlain; in that case John Robertson obliges himself, etc. to pay, etc. £3 sterling additional rent yearly for each English acre so differently cultivated contrary to the covenant, and that the lessor, notwithstanding this provision for additional rent, should have power to prevent such cultivation."

And it was thereby specially provided and declared

"That the proprietor or incoming tenant should have power and liberty to sow grass seeds, in due time, upon any part of the corn lands of the said farm, with the last or way-going crop, and that without any allowance to be made to the outgoing tenant for the same; and that John Robertson, etc. at the removal from the said lands, should leave upon the ground all the dung and manure of the preceding year, but that the value thereof should be paid, etc. by the succeeding tenant, as the same should be ascertained by two neutral men, one to be chosen by each party; and at no time shall the said John Robertson or his foresaids sell or give away any of the hay or straw of the said farm, which shall always be spent on the ground. And in case the said John Robertson or his foresaids shall not remove from the said lands, at the said term of expiry here of, but shall continue to possess by tacit relocation, or by any other title, or under any pretence, other than a new agreement in writing, then it is hereby stipulated and agreed, that, as long as the said John Robertson, or his foresaids shall continue to possess, they [165] shall be holden and obliged to pay to the said noble Duke or his foresaids a yearly rent of £150 sterling in place of the said rent of £225, and that besides performing and fulfilling the whole other conditions and prestations hereby incumbent on them."

Out of this instrument arises the question upon which the House is now to give judgment.

The tenant relies upon the provision expressed that the dung and manure is to be left upon the ground, and paid for according to a valuation; but that, as to the hay and straw, it is not to be left or paid for. The absence of any such provision (according to his argument) shows that the tenant was to be at liberty to carry and take away at the expiration of the lease, the hay and straw of the last year: that the prohibition extends only to selling or giving away; and, as to the expression, which provides that the hay and straw shall be always spent on the ground, it is to be construed as applicable only to the currency of the lease, and not to an act which takes place at or after its termination.

It is moreover contended, on his behalf, that, as he or those in whose right he stands, upon their accession to the farm, received no hay or straw, which was taken away by the preceding tenant, he will receive no consideration for those articles unless he is permitted to take them away. But this is an argument which cannot be admitted to have weight against the expressions, or to affect the fair construction of the instrument which ascertains the rights of the parties. Sup[166] posing all the facts to have been proved, which ought to form the ground of such an argument, the law requires us to presume a consideration for this sacrifice, on the part of the tenant, in the nature and conditions of the contract, and the amount of the rent to be paid by him. He binds himself by express obligation; and it must be inferred and implied, that, in his contract, he stipulated for some equivalent benefit. In the case of a reciprocal contract such as this, a party cannot be admitted to say that he has no consideration for a sacrifice which he binds himself to make. When a tenant is making such a bargain, is it probable that he should forget his interest so far as not to provide, in the other conditions of the lease, a consideration for what he gives up to the landlord?

The dung and manure is to be left on the ground and paid for. An inference from that provision is drawn, that what, according to the expressions of the contract the tenant is not bound to leave, he may carry away. But that is not a conclusive argument, because it is necessary to attend to the further provisions of the lease. Nothing is said as to any payment for hay and straw; and the clause which provides what shall be done at the removal, that is, the expiration of the lease, stipulates that the hay and straw of the farm "shall always be spent on the ground," not that the tenant shall spend it, an expression which might possibly lead to a different construction. The provision that the tenant shall at "no time" sell or give away the hay or straw is absolutely [167] incompatible with the supposition of a right in the tenant, in any manner, to eloin those articles during the last year, if, indeed, the express words of the instrument leave us at liberty to enter into conjectures as to any intention to except the last year of the lease.

The case put for the Appellant, of an accumulation of hay and corn during three years or more, which might be found upon the farm during the last year, shows the consequence to which the argument for the Respondent would lead. The manure is collected and prepared by the labour of the tenant, but hay and straw are almost the spontaneous growth of the land. It might be reasonable, therefore, that such a difference, as we find in this contract, should be made as to those respective articles.

The tenant, in this lease, was to enter upon the arable lands at the separation of the crop, and to quit at the corresponding period. In such a case, where no special provision is made by contract, the law of custom may qualify the right of the incoming tenant, and give to the outgoing tenant certain privileges, as the right to enter, for the purpose of thrashing, after the expiration of his lease. That is a question, upon the customary law of Scotland, which it is not necessary that we should deal with in this case (see note at end of case). Assuming or admitting the existence of such law founded on custom, we have here to construe a written contract; and, if the Scotch law is to be administered on the same principles as English law, or any law [168] founded on principle, we must hold that the engagements of parties to each other, by the express stipulations of a written instrument, exclude all consideration of the custom of the country.

Resting upon such principles for the direction of our judgment, can we hold that the words "at no time shall sell or give away the hay and straw, but that the same shall always be spent on the ground," are consistent with a right in the tenant to collect hay and straw during the last year, or any preceding years, and to carry away what he has collected at the expiration of the tenancy?

Judgment reversed.

It is declared that the Respondent, according to the true intent and construction of the tack, is not entitled to sell or give away any of the hay or straw upon the farm at any time during the continuance of the tack, or upon the same at the time of the expiry of the tack. And it is ordered, that, with this declaration, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session to review the interlocutors complained of, and further to do in the cause as is just and consistent with this declaration.

IRELAND.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

SIR JOHN CHARLES HAMILTON, BART.—Appellant; JOSEPH HOUGHTON,—Respondent [21st July 1820].

[Mews' Dig. ii. 1382: ix. 312; x. 888: as to computation of interest, see now R.S.C. 1883, Ord. 55 rr. 62, 63.]

Where a trust is created by deed for the payment of debts; if a bill is filed by one of the creditors to enforce the payment of his debt; that purpose can only be effected by the general execution of the trust. The decree ought to direct such execution and an inquiry as to all the debts owing and payable under the trust, and that they should be paid according to their priorities.

A decree for payment of the debt of one creditor, under a deed of trust, which provides for the payment of other creditors is erroneous.—So if the bill, stating A. to have been the survivor of the trustees named in the deed, makes the heir of A. a party to the suit, as such supposed survivor, and that allegation proves to be false, the decree made upon such state of the pleadings is erroneous.

A bill to carry such a decree into execution, notwithstanding long acquiescence, cannot be sustained. The original decree may be examined, impeached and varied in a suit to carry that decree into execution. It is not conclusive until reversed by original bill, or bill of review, for error apparent on the face of the decree, and the court may refuse to carry it into execution.

A decree, to carry into execution an erroneous decree, being reversed; the cause was remitted, with leave to amend the bill, by adding parties and making a better case as to the original claim, notwithstanding the lapse of sixty years from the date of the deed by which the debt was secured, and of forty years from the date of the erroneous decree; as between the plaintiff creditor, and the debtor there is no presumption-[170]-tion from lapse of time in such a case, and upon such state of the pleadings that the debt has been paid. But other creditors, whose debts ought to have been provided for by the decree, might have a right to raise that question.

A debt by simple contract does not carry interest, because provision for its discharge is made by a deed of trust; such a deed per se does not import contract or trust for the payment of interest, especially where the creditors have not signed the deed, and no agreement is made to charge the land and discharge the person.

Interest ought not to be computed from the date of the decree for payment, but from the day when payment is by the decree directed to be made.

An erroneous decree, directing payment of interest cannot give the right to interest; but interest may be due under circumstances.

A party who files a bill in a court of equity to have the benefit of a former decree, must shew (if the case requires it) that such former decree was right. If a decree appears to be erroneous, it cannot be carried into execution.

A decree taken pro confesso is the decree of the plaintiff who takes it, and it is his duty to see that it is right.

A decree taken pro confesso against one of the defendants in a suit, may be impeached for error by a party claiming under that defendant; and the party claiming under the plaintiff in the suit can have no benefit of that decree, if erroneous.

A bill taken pro confesso is conclusive against the defendant only as to the facts within his knowledge; not as to facts which the plaintiff has the same opportunity of knowing as the defendant, e.g. as to the survivorship of a trustee, which was alleged in the bill but proved to be contrary to the fact.

This was an appeal, on various grounds, from a decree of the Court of Exchequer (Equity side) in Ireland. The following are the facts of the case, shortly abstracted from the pleadings in the Court below.

[171] By indenture of release, bearing date the 13th of May 1758, and made between William Hamilton* and John Hamilton, his eldest son (afterwards Sir John Stewart Hamilton, baronet,) of the first part; the Bishop of Limerick, William Scott, Henry Hamilton, and Galbraith Lowry, of the second part; and Redmond Keane, of the third part: certain hereditaments and premises therein mentioned were conveyed to the parties of the second part; and their heirs, upon trust, that they or the survivor of them, his or their heirs, should, by sale, &c. discharge the debts and incumbrances mentioned in the schedule to the release annexed, together with all interest then due thereon respectively.

Robert Carson was one of the creditors named in the schedule, and opposite to his name is written the sum of £350. Upon the several debts contained in the schedule, which carried interest, being debts by mortgage, judgment, &c. the interest was computed, and the word "interest" was written under them; but the word "interest" was not written under the debt of Robert Carson, and no interest was computed on his debt.

William Hamilton died intestate before the 5th day of January 1778, when Sir

* It appears that William Hamilton was tenant for life of the estates conveyed in trust, and John Hamilton was owner of the inheritance in remainder. See p. 184.

John Stewart Hamilton * became entitled to the premises comprised in the release; and also obtained letters of administration of the personal estate of his father.

[172] On the 5th of January 1778, Robert Carson filed a bill in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, against Sir John Stewart Hamilton, James Scott, as the heir at law of William Scott, (in the bill stated to be the survivor of the trustees named in the release), and others.† The bill stated, that Robert Carson had been employed for several years before the month of May 1758, by William Hamilton, as attorney and solicitor in several causes: that for the prosecution and defence thereof, after making all fair allowances, there remained due to Robert Carson £100 for money laid out and expended, and for his fees as an attorney or solicitor, and that William Hamilton being so indebted to him, and at the same time owing several other debts, did, with Sir John Stewart Hamilton, execute such indenture of release as before mentioned; and the bill prayed, that an account might be taken of what was due to Robert Carson, for principal, interest and costs, in respect to the said sum of £400, and also what was due to the other creditors of the said William Hamilton, who should come in and contribute to the expenses of the suit, and that the lands and premises mentioned in the deed of release, or a competent part thereof, might be sold for payment of such demands.

Robert Carson died, and his executors filed a bill of revivor; but Sir John Stewart Hamilton having been served with process, and not appearing to the original bill and bill of revivor, process of contempt to sequestration was entered up against him, for want of appearance and answer.

[173] On the 26th day of February 1779, the cause came on to be heard on sequestration as against Sir John Stewart Hamilton, and on bill and answer, as against the other defendants,‡ when it was decreed that the bill should be taken as confessed against Sir John Stewart Hamilton, and that the Remembrancer should state an account of what was due to the executors of Robert Carson, on the foot of the deed of the 13th of May 1758, for principal, interest and cost, and also on the sum of £50 in the pleadings mentioned.

In pursuance of the decree, the Remembrancer made his report, bearing date the 15th day of September 1779, whereby he certified that there was due to the executors of Robert Carson, for principal and interest on the foot of the deed of the 13th May 1758, and of the said sum of £50, £835 5s.

This report was afterwards confirmed.

On the 23d day of February 1780, the cause came on to be heard for further directions, when it was ordered and decreed, that the Remembrancer should take an account of interest on the principal sum of £350, from the 3d day of December then last, to which time interest had been computed, to the 31st day of January then last, being the time when the report was confirmed, which (being computed) amounted in the whole to the sum of £555 19s. 6d.; and it was further ordered and decreed, that Sir John Stewart Hamilton should, in three calendar [174] months, pay such sum to the executors of Robert Carson, with interest from the 31st day of January then last, until paid with the costs of the suit, or in default thereof, that the Remembrancer should sell the premises comprised in the deed of the 13th day of May 1758, and that out of the money arising by such sale, the plaintiffs should be paid the principal money, interest and costs.

In the year 1785, the executors of Robert Carson, assigned the claim under the decree to George Gordon Carson, who, by a deed executed in 1796, assigned to John Potter.

On the 31st of May 1800, John Potter filed a bill in the Court of Exchequer against Sir John Stewart Hamilton and others, stating the facts before mentioned, and also that Sir John Stewart Hamilton having been served with an attested copy of the decree in the former suit, and the principal money and interest not having been paid, the hereditaments and premises comprised in the deed of the 13th of May 1758, were, in the month of June 1780, put up to sale, and purchased by one Arthur Hawthorne, in trust for the plaintiffs in that suit, for the sum of £1000, and that such sale was absolutely confirmed, but that the same was never completed by Arthur Hawthorne, because immediately after the sale, Sir John Stewart Hamilton requested the executors of Robert Carson not to suffer the purchase to be completed, promising that he would shortly pay to them the full amount of the sum so decreed, with interest, and all costs attending the same: whereupon the executors, and George Gordon Carson, assented to postpone the completion of [175] the sale, in order to give time for payment. The bill further stated, that Sir John Stewart Hamilton having, after the pronouncing of the decree, become greatly embarrassed in his circumstances, took upon himself to execute several deeds of mortgage of the lands comprised in the decree, whereby John Potter had been obstructed in establishing his rights under the decree: and the bill prayed, that Sir John Stewart Hamilton might be compelled to come to account with the plaintiff, on the foot of the decree, and to pay him what should appear to be due on the foot of such account, for principal, interest and costs, and that the decree might be carried into execution and confirmed.

Before any further proceedings were had in the cause, John Potter and Sir John Stewart Hamilton died, and the appellant, upon the death of Sir John Stewart Hamilton, (according to the allegations of the appellant's case,) as his only son and heir at law, became entitled to the hereditaments and premises comprised in the deed of the 13th May 1758.*

On the 12th of June 1802, the respondent, who is the executor of John Potter, filed a bill of revivor against the appellant as the heir at law † of Sir John Stewart Hamilton, and the cause was duly revived.

[176] On the 29th of May 1806, the appellant put in his answer to the original bill, and bill of revivor, insisting that Robert Carson was not entitled to interest on the sum of £350, or to the sum of £50, which he claimed upon an allegation (not admitted) of a parol promise made by William Hamilton, who died seventeen years before the decree was pronounced: that Henry Hamilton, one of the trustees named in the deed of the 13th May 1758, was alive at the time when the decree was pronounced, and lived several years afterwards, and that although he was the surviving trustee named in the deed, he was not made a party to the original suit; that the decree had not been prosecuted for more than twenty years after the same had been pronounced, and the appellant, by the answer, farther insisted upon the statute made in Ireland for the limitations of suits: and prayed the same benefit as if he had pleaded the statute.

On the 3d day of February 1804, the respondent filed an amended bill against the appellant, stating admissions and acknowledgments by letters and conduct on the part of Sir John Stewart Hamilton, of the fairness of the decree, and the validity of the demand against him, especially as to the interest, and containing allegations of various other facts not material to be stated.

On the 5th day of December 1808, the appellant filed his answer to the amended bill, representing that the admissions and acknowledgments set forth in the bill might be as therein alleged, but were owing to the negligence and indolence of his father, Sir John Stewart Hamilton, and his consequent ignorance of the facts of the case.

[177] The answer of the appellant having been replied to, witnesses were examined on the part of the respondent, who proved the exhibits, consisting of the deeds in the pleadings mentioned, some letters of Sir John Stewart Hamilton, and a draft, or

* Upon this statement the Lord Chancellor observed, that there was some inaccuracy in the statement of the printed cases, as to the manner in which the appellant became entitled; and that these inaccuracies occurred so often in the Irish appeal cases, that the House of Lords was always in a state of uncertainty as to matters which might form the grounds of their judgment.

order, dated the 2d day of June 1781, drawn by Sir John Stewart Hamilton on Francis Vesey, esq. in favour of one of the executors of Robert Carson for £300, etc. The witnesses on the part of the appellant proved that Sir John Stewart Hamilton was a man of indolent disposition, inattentive to his own concerns, and totally unacquainted with business; that Henry Hamilton, afterwards Sir Henry Hamilton, bart. was the survivor of the trustees named in the deed of the 13th day of May 1758, and that he was living at the time when Robert Carson filed the bill against Sir John Stewart Hamilton.

The cause came on to be heard in the Court of Exchequer, upon the 14th of February 1812, when it was decreed that the respondent was entitled to the sum of £350 in the pleadings mentioned, without interest, and that the appellant should, within three calendar months, to be computed from the day of the date of the decree, pay to the respondent, as executor of John Potter, the sum of £350, with legal interest from that day until paid, together with his costs to be taxed by the proper officer, or that in default of payment, the Remembrancer should sell the lands and premises therein mentioned, or a competent part thereof, and that out of the money arising from such sale, the respondent should be paid his principal, interest and costs, and that if any overplus should remain, the same should be paid to the appellant, or such person as should appear entitled [178] thereto, upon the making out a good title to the purchaser.

By an order dated on the 21st of February 1812, and made upon the petition of the respondent, it was ordered that the cause should be re-heard, and the cause came on to be re-heard on the 26th day of June 1812, when it was declared that the respondent was entitled to the benefit of the decree pronounced in the cause of Carson v. Hamilton, on the 23d day of February 1780, and that the same should be carried into specific execution, save only so far as related to the sum of £50 therein mentioned; and that the Remembrancer should take an account of what was due to the respondent, as the executor of John Potter, on the foot of the decree of the 23d of February 1780, for principal, interest and costs, deducting therefrom the principal sum of £50.

In pursuance of the decree, upon re-hearing, the Remembrancer made his report, bearing date the 6th day of June 1813, whereby he certified, that there was due to the respondent, as executor of John Potter, on the foot of the decree of the 23d Feb. 1780, for principal, deducting the sum of £50 - - - £805 19 6

[179] This report was confirmed, and on the 20th of November 1813, the cause came on to be heard upon further directions, when it was ordered and decreed, that the register should compute interest upon the sum of £805 19s. 6d. due to the respondent, as executor of John Potter, from the 23d day of June 1813, being the time to which interest was computed thereon by the report to the 20th day of November: which he having done in court, and the same amounting to the sum of £20 3s. and which being added to the sum of £2525 7s. 8d. reported due, amounted in the whole to the sum of £2545 10s. 8d. it was further ordered and decreed, that the appellant or such other of the defendants as ought so to do, should, within three calendar months, pay to the respondent, the sum of £2545 10s. 8d. with interest from the 20th day of November until paid, together with the costs of the respondent and the said other defendants, or in default thereof, that the appellant should be barred and for ever foreclosed of and from all right and equity of redemption in and to the lands and premises in the pleadings mentioned; and that the Chief Remembrancer of the court, or his deputy, should set up and sell to the public, and to the highest bidder, the said lands and premises, or a competent part thereof; and that out of the money arising by such sale, the respondent should be paid the sum of £2545 10s. 8d. so due to him, as executor of John Potter, with interest and costs, and that the remainder (if any) of the money to arise by such sale should be disposed of as the court [180] should thereafter think fit to direct; and that the other defendants in the cause should recover their costs from the respondent, and the respondent should recover the same, together with his own costs out of the monies to arise by such sale.

The appeal was brought to reverse or vary the decrees and decretal order of the 14th day of February 1812, 26th day of June 1812, and of the 20th day of November 1813.

For the Appellant, Mr. Wetherell and Mr. Treslove.

The decree of the 23d day of February 1780, was made in the absence of Henry Hamilton, afterwards Sir Henry Hamilton, baronet, who was the surviving trustee named in the deed of the 13th day of May 1758, and was then living, and was therefore a necessary party to that suit.

Even assuming the said decree of the 23d day of February 1780, to be valid, yet, twenty-three years having elapsed before steps taken in prosecution thereof, the respondent was barred from recovering the money certified to be due by the report made in the cause of Carson v. Hamilton; or the same ought, at the time when the said John Potter filed his bill of complaint against Sir John Stewart Hamilton, to have been presumed to have been satisfied.

The debt of £350 due from William Hamilton to Robert Carson, was a simple contract debt, and no interest is provided in respect of that debt by the deed. There was no evidence of any contract to pay [181] interest. A debt by simple contract is not made special, because the creditor signs a deed of trust, which provides for the payment of that, with other debts bearing interest by contract. That was supposed to have been the opinion of Lord Hardwicke, from the report of the case of Carr v. Lord Burlington, 1 P. W. 229. But it appears from the decree, as given in the notes of Mr. Cox, that Lord Hardwicke in that case, made an order, referring it to the Master to compute interest on such of the debts as in their nature bore interest; and the case of Barwell v. Parker, 2 Ves. 363, shows that such doctrine was never intended to be understood as a general proposition of law.

The Lord Chancellor:—That will depend upon the language of the deed. If there be debts with and debts without interest, and the words are general, it must be construed reddendo singula singulis. In decrees, the language is guarded with that special view. The Master is directed to compute interest on such of the debts as bear interest.

For the appellant:—

There is nothing in the provisions of the deed which shows an intention to give interest, on the contrary, the word "interest," which is subjoined to the specialty debts, is not set opposite to this and other debts by simple contract. In the case of a will, providing for the payment of interest upon debts, it was held not to extend to debts by simple contract, Tait v. Lord Northwick, 4 Ves. 618. The same construction has prevailed as to arrears of annuities, Crenze v. Hunter, 2 Ves. jun. 157, 4 B. C. c. 316 (see also Anderson v. Dwyer, 1 S. and L. 301). [182] Upon a judgment at law, interest is only given upon the new suit. Here the original decree was erroneous and defective for want of parties, and the assignee cannot have the benefit of such a decree. When a suit is instituted to carry a decree into execution, the court "sometimes consider the directions, and varies them in case of a mistake, and it has, on circumstances, refused to enforce the decree," Mitf. 75 *. Upon this principle the decree was varied on re-hearing in the Court below.

The sum of £805 19s. 6d. upon which the decree of the 26th of June 1812, directs interest to be calculated from the 23d day of February 1780, the date of the decree in the cause of "Carson against Hamilton," was in part composed and made up of accumulations of interest upon the original debt of £350. If the respondent is entitled to interest upon the original debt, he is not entitled to interest upon the aggregate of interest and principal.

For the Respondents, Mr. Hart and Mr. Raithby.

The decree of 13th February 1780, is binding and conclusive on all parties, until reversed by original bill or bill of review for fraud, or error apparent on the face of the decree, and the appellant, claiming as heir at law, is equally bound by the decree as Sir John Stewart Hamilton, his father, and estopped from averring any matter dehors the decree, because the decrees of the 14th February 1812, the 26th June 1812, and the 20th November 1813, are decrees [183] founded on a suit filed merely to revive and carry into execution the decree of the 13th February 1780, which has never been disputed. In bills to carry decrees into execution, the law of the decree ought not to be examined into, or the decree varied, and especially in this case, where the appellant's father, during his whole life, and the appellant himself, have acquiesced in, and submitted to the decree.

* See the note, and the Attorney General v. Day, 1 Ves. 218; West v. Skip, Id. 241; Johnson v. Northey, Prec. in Chan. 131.

Supposing, but not admitting, that the appellant had a right to unravel the decree, as to the question of interest on the principal sum of £350, the decree is well warranted by the contract of the parties themselves, evidenced by the deed of the 13th of May 1758, whereby the lands and premises therein mentioned are conveyed to trustees, to pay thereout, by sale or mortgage, the sum of £350 with the other debts mentioned in the schedule annexed to that deed, with the interest due on the debts, and, in the mean time, to apply so much of the rents and profits of the premises as would satisfy the accruing interest. Even without any express direction as to the interest, whenever a trust deed is executed for payment of debts, and a schedule made of such debts, the simple contract debts are then in the nature of specialties, and a specific interest given in the fund out of which payment is to be made.

The case of a trust by deed is distinguished in the case of Barwell v. Parker, from a trust by will for the payment of debts by simple contract, which are not thereby converted into debts by specialty. In the latter case, it is the voluntary [184] act of the testator; in the former, the debts are charged on the land by contract, and the remedy of the creditor by legal process, is stayed for the benefit of the debtor. The doctrine of Lord Hardwicke, in Barwell v. Parker, is recognized and adopted in Shirley v. Lord Ferrers, 1 B. C. C. 41. With respect to the construction of the deed it is said, that interest is computed and charged on the specialty debts, and is omitted as to this and other debts by simple contract. It is not probable that any of the creditors would give up their legal remedy without securing their right to interest.

Lord Redesdale: The nature of the deed must be observed. It is not one by which the debtor alone charged the estate. He was only tenant for life. The charge was made by the concurrence of the son, who was the owner of the inheritance. There is a clause in the deed to indemnify the son, and that extends only to the principal of the debt.* The decree is at all events erroneous, being made in the absence of the person having the legal estate.

For the Respondents: There is an admission, by inference, from the answer of the appellant, that Scott was the surviving trustee. And where a bill is taken pro confesso, the facts stated are conclusive against the defendant.

Lord Redesdale: Only as to those facts which are in his knowledge. If you take a decree against [185] a person having no interest, what operation can it have? The decree is moreover erroneous, because it directs no enquiry as to the debts owing and payable under the trust, such enquiry should have been directed, and that the debts should be paid according to their priority.

The Lord Chancellor: The decree does not direct that the scheduled creditors should be called in. If the charges in the bill, that the trustees entered and received the rents, but did not pay, are to be taken as true; the suit is defective for want of parties. The representatives of the tenant for life should have been before the Court (see p. 171). He was bound to keep down the interest of the debts until the execution of the trusts.

In the subsequent decree nothing is said of the mortgagees or other parties mentioned in the bill. The respondent states in his case, that the cause, as against all the other parties, was set down on bill and answer (see p. 173). Should not the Court have made some deliverance as to those other defendants? The subsequent incumbrancers raise questions, which they had a right to have decided. How far can the decree be considered as valid against them? In the decree of 1813, as stated in the case, it is only directed, that the appellant, or such other of the defendants as ought so to do, should pay, etc. or otherwise, the premises should be sold. This is a defect in the decree. But the parties interested do not appeal.

Lord Redesdale: It seems that the decree on rehearing does not order a sale of all the estates, or [186] do more than direct that the plaintiff shall have the benefit of the former decree.

In reply: Lord Hardwicke, in Crenze v. Hunter, does not decide what precise species of deed shall be sufficient to convert a debt by simple contract into specialty. As to Shirley v. Lord Ferrers, it is an authority in favour of the appellant.

The Lord Chancellor: The decree in that case, at least, is not adverse. The mere direction by deed to pay a debt, does not infer either contract or trust to pay interest upon debts by simple contract. As to contract, the creditors did not execute the deed. There was nothing to prevent their suing the debtor after the execution. They did not contract for specialty, and no consideration was given to the debtor by charging the land and discharging the person. The debt, after the deed was executed, remained as before, a debt by simple contract.

Lord Redesdale: It is the practice in Ireland, where the Court orders money to be paid, and it is not paid, to give interest from the date of the order. But the great difficulty is, that the decree is erroneous for want of proper parties to the suit, and proper directions in the decree.

Mr. Hart: There is no appeal against the original decree.

The Lord Chancellor: That brings it to the question, whether the assignee can have the benefit of a decree which is erroneous.

Lord Redesdale: It is the decree of the creditor, and taken upon sequestration pro confesso. [187] In such a case it is the business of the party taking the decree to see that it is right.

The Lord Chancellor, on moving the judgment, in the course of stating the facts and pleadings of the case, censured the general inaccuracy of the Irish cases, and remarked, that whether the bill filed by Robert Carson was on his own behalf, or for others also, was not very material, considering that he was thereby demanding the execution of the trusts of a deed: that if Hamilton was the surviving trustee, to sell and mortgage for the payment of debts, the surviving trustee or his heir was not before the court to sustain the interests of the person for whom he was trustee: that the trust was not for the payment of the individual person of the name of Carson, but for the payment of "all and singular the debts and incumbrances in the schedule to the release annexed, together with all interest then due thereon respectively;" that the decree carrying into execution the trusts of such a deed, should not have made provision for the debt of Carson only, but should have called on the Master to enquire what debts and incumbrances remained to be paid under the effect of that trust: bringing before the Court all persons interested in that enquiry, and then paying and satisfying them proportionally, if the funds would not pay all the creditors: paying them entirely, if the fund would pay them all; paying interest to such of them as were entitled to interest, and not paying interest to such of them as were not entitled to interest: that by the original decree, which was [188] taken pro confesso against Sir John Stewart Hamilton, the officer of the Court of Exchequer was to do no more than to audit and state an account of what was due to the executors of Robert Carson alone, on the foot of the deed of the 13th of May 1758, for principal, interest and costs: and whether this decree as to the title of Carson to interest, meant to leave that question to the officer of the court, when he was to take the account on the footing of that deed, to take an account of principal, interest and costs, if, according to the true construction of that deed, interest was due, or whether it was meant to determine that interest was due, and to call upon the officer of the court to take an account on the footing of the deed of the 13th of May 1758, of principal, interest and costs as due, did not distinctly appear.

After these observations, which were intermixed with statements of the facts and pleadings, the Lord Chancellor proceeded thus: The appeal complains, that the decree was taken in the absence of Henry Hamilton, afterwards Sir Henry Hamilton, bart. who was the surviving trustee named in the deed of the 13th day of May, 1758, and was then living, and was therefore a necessary party to that suit. This is the objection made to the decree of the 23d of February 1780, which is sought by the subsequent proceedings to be carried into execution, and the benefit of which is sought thereby. If that decree was an erroneous decree, they were not entitled to have it carried into execution. It appears upon the evidence, that Henry Hamilton was the surviving trustee, living at the time when this decree was [189] made, he was therefore the proper person to represent the cestui que trusts.

This ought not to have been the decree made in the cause, even supposing Henry Hamilton, or the other trustees to have been dead, because, as this was a deed to pay all creditors, it should have been made in the ordinary course in which decrees in such cases are made, viz. providing for the payment of all creditors, and not merely a decree for the payment of this particular creditor: in that respect also it is wrong. In the next place, the appellant, by his case, insists upon length of time, as a bar to the right claimed under the decree: but as that point is now abandoned, it is unnecessary to discuss the question. He then further insists that the debt of £350 was a debt which ought not to have carried interest. That would be a reason for setting up the decree on the original hearing of the 14th of February 1812, which declared that the £350 was a debt of that kind, which ought not to have carried interest, except from the date of that decree. Then is stated the objection to the accumulation of interest upon interest.

The questions here, are really these: In the first place, it has been suggested at the bar, that there is a presumption, from lapse of time, that this £350 must have been paid, and that neither principal nor interest can be claimed after so long an interval. It does not appear to me, from these pleadings, that we can take that for granted; but if there were other creditors, whose demands ought to have been provided for by this decree, they might have had a right to insist upon that proposition. The [190] original decree appears to me to be a decree, the benefit of which cannot be had in this suit. That original decree is at least wrong in these respects, viz. First, that the surviving trustee was not before the Court; Secondly, that it was not a species of decree which ought to have been made to carry into execution the trusts of such a deed as this. If I were asked which of these decrees, that giving interest or that not giving interest, was right, I should certainly say, it is my opinion, that the decree which did not give interest, was correct. The meaning of that deed was not to give interest on debts not carrying interest, and the state of the accounts tends to that opinion; but under the circumstances of this case, it appears to me, that we can do no more than displace all these decrees, with liberty to the party to go before the Court again, and to amend these pleadings, if he shall be so advised.

Lord Redesdale: I perfectly concur in the opinion already expressed upon the merits of the case, and upon the construction of the deed under which the sum of £350 was claimed by this suit. It appears to me perfectly clear that the deed has not given interest; the deed does not alter the nature of the debt, but merely provides for the payment of the debt. It expressly provides for the payment of interest on debts, which did carry interest, and it is silent as to any interest upon this debt. I am therefore of opinion that the deed itself does not give interest upon that debt. Whether under any circumstances interest ought to be calculated upon that debt is another question, which may come to [191] be decided when there are proper parties before the Court for that purpose. The decree of the 14th of February 1812, considers the person filing that bill as entitled to the £350 principal sum, with interest from the date of that decree. Whether that is correct or not, and especially as there were not the proper parties before the Court, I will not venture to say. It appears to me that nothing should be said upon the subject of the interest in the order of the House, but that the question should be left perfectly open. That decree proceeded, I suppose, on the ground that when the Court decreed the sum of £350 to be due, it was considered as the judgment of the Court, upon which interest ought to be calculated; that is not quite according to the course of a court of equity. The usual course is to direct the payment of the sum at a certain day, and then, in case of non-payment at that day, interest to accrue from the time appointed for payment. Such, however, is the form of this decree. Upon that subject I should rather wish to leave the question open.

The decree of 1780 could only be sustained under the authority of a deed, by which the estates were vested in trustees in trust for the payment of certain debts. Subject to that charge they were limited to William Hamilton (who was the debtor) for life, with remainders over. The charge was introduced upon the estate, by an agreement between the father and the son, that the son should suffer a recovery and charge these debts of his father upon the estate. The interests therefore which were taken under that deed were the interests of all the creditors who were specified in that deed. The [192] trustees hold the estate in trust for these creditors, and, subject to the claims and rights of these creditors, were trustees for Mr. Hamilton, the father, for his life, and after his death for the several persons who were entitled in remainder under the deed.

It is perfectly clear that no proper decree could be made for the purpose of raising any sum of money under that deed, without having before the Court all the persons who were interested in the property. The parties before the Court upon the original suit in which the decree of 1780 was made, were the claimant of this sum of money of £350 and a further debt, a person who was represented to be the heir of the surviving trustee, and the person who was then entitled as tenant in tail to the property, subject to the payment of those debts. If Henry Hamilton, who appears by the evidence in this suit to have been at that time living, and the surviving trustee, had been a party to the suit, the decree should have directed the trusts of the deed to be carried into execution; that an account should be taken of all the debts remaining unpaid; that the amount of those debts should be raised by sale or mortgage of the estates; and that the surplus, whatever it might be, should be settled to the uses contained in that deed. The decree, instead of being to that effect, is a decree providing for this particular debt, and directing a sale to take place in consequence of non-payment of the debt, and as I observed, having before the Court not the surviving trustee, but the heir of a person who was represented to be the heir of another trustee then dead, and which heir of that trustee had no estate vested in him, for the estate [193] had vested at that time in Henry Hamilton, the surviving trustee.

It is clear that the decree was erroneous in every respect; it was erroneous, unquestionably, in decreeing the party to that deed entitled to that which it then gave him; it was erroneous in decreeing that he was entitled to any thing, without giving the same benefit to the other creditors entitled under the trust; it was erroneous in proceeding to a sale without having the surviving trustee before the Court; and therefore it is a decree which the Court can never carry into execution. The party who comes into a court of equity to have the benefit of a former decree, must show that it was a right decree, if the decree appears to be erroneous, the Court cannot carry it into execution.

In the present suit, Mr. Houghton claims as assignee under different assignments, and so far may be considered as the assignee of the debt of £350 charged by the trust deed. The decree obtained by him in the Court of Exchequer on the 26th of June 1812, by which he was declared entitled to the benefit of the decree of 1780, proceeding upon that ground, and giving him the aggregate sum which that decree provided, (except as to a sum of £50 which was so manifestly erroneous that the Court of Exchequer altered so much of the former decree); but declaring that the aggregate sum, with subsequent interest calculated upon it, should be paid to Houghton, is throughout erroneous. The Court of Exchequer had, on the 14th of February 1812, made a decree, by which only £350, with interest from the date of that decree, [194] was given to the appellant. That decree is also erroneous, because that decree had not the proper parties before the Court.

The order which ought to be pronounced is, that the decree of the Court of Exchequer of the 26th June 1812, and that which followed upon it of the 20th November 1813, on further directions, should be reversed, they being manifestly throughout erroneous, and that the decree of the Court of Exchequer on the 14th of February 1812, should be also reversed; but observing that decree to be confined to the £350, to order that that decree should be also reversed, inasmuch as although the respondent may be entitled to the sum of £350, we cannot assert that he is entitled, because there are persons who ought to have been before the Court, who might have disputed whether he was so entitled or not. Although the respondent may be entitled to the sum of £350 under the provisions of the deeds of the 12th and 13th of May 1758; yet the former decree, the benefit of which was sought by the respondent, and the decree of the 14th of February 1812, do not provide for the due execution of the trusts of the deeds of the 12th and 13th of May 1758, and as there were not in any of the suits in which such decrees were made, the proper parties before the Court, the cause should be remitted to the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, with leave to the respondent to amend his pleadings, by introducing parties thereto, or otherwise, as he shall be advised. The amendment to this bill may be not only by making proper parties to it, but by framing his bill according to the rights of the parties, namely, to [195] have the proper trusts carried into execution. The minute which I have drawn out will comprise all these particulars.

Die Veneris, 21 Julii 1820.

It is ordered and adjudged, by the Lords, etc. That the decrees of the 26th of June 1812, and the 20th of November 1813, complained of in the said appeal, be and the same are hereby reversed. And it is hereby declared, that although the respondent may be entitled to the sum of £350 under the trusts of the deeds of the 12th and 13th of May 1758, yet inasmuch as the former decree, the benefit of which was sought by the respondent, and the said decree of the 14th of February 1812, did not provide for the due execution of the trusts of the said deeds of the 12th and 13th of May 1758, and there were not, in any of the suits in which such decrees respectively were made, proper parties before the Court for such purpose, It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the said decree of the 14th of February 1812, also complained of in the said appeal, be and the same is hereby also reversed; and it is further ordered, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, and that the respondent be at liberty to apply to the said Court for leave to amend his bill by making proper parties thereto, or otherwise as he shall be advised.

SCOTLAND.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

ARCHIBALD, Duke of HAMILTON, etc. (since deceased), and ALEXANDER, Marquis of DOUGLAS, etc.: And by Revivor, ALEXANDER, Duke of HAMILTON, etc.—Appellants: Mrs. H. P. ESTEN, (now Scott Waring,) and JOHN SCOTT WARING, her Husband, for his interest.—Respondents [24th July 1820].

[Mews' Dig. xiv. 412 (on the point noted at p. 209 as to illegality of trust for future illegitimate children); 3 Scots R.R. 581. See Boyes v. Waring, 1822, 1 Shaw, App. 121.]

Under a strict tailzie prohibiting alienation, but containing a power to grant leases, provided they do not exceed twenty-one years, and be not let with evident diminution of the rental; the heir of tailzie in possession, acting upon the opinion of counsel, made leases to his steward at rents a little above the former rents of the lands leased, but far below their market value; with intent that the steward should underlet the lands at their full value, and pay the surplus, beyond the rents reserved in the principal leases, to persons named by the grantor of the leases, the heir of tailzie in possession. The steward accordingly underlet the lands at rents exceeding the principal rents by £1371, and, some time after the grants of the principal leases, executed a trust obligation in favour of the objects of the trust. Held, that the leases, from the time of the grants until the declaration made by the trust obligations, were held in trust for the grantor, and that they were invalid as a violation of the prohibitions, and not within the permission of the deed of tailzie.

[197] Whether receipt of the rent reserved upon the principal leases, or knowledge of and acquiescence for a considerable time in the payment to the objects of the trusts of the surplus, arising from the rents reserved upon the underleases, constitute homologation, Quære.

The family estates of the Dukes of Hamilton, in Scotland, are held under the letters of a strict entail, with all the requisite clauses to make such an entail effectual, containing an express prohibition against alienation, and a permission to let leases, provided they do not exceed twenty-one years, and be not let "with evident diminution of the rental."

Douglas, Duke of Hamilton, having cohabited with the respondent, Mrs Scott Waring, (then Mrs. Esten,) who during the cohabitation had borne a daughter, the reputed issue of that connexion, and being anxious to make a provision for the mother and child, entered into a correspondence* with his agents, and took the opinion of counsel as to the most secure and effectual mode of making such provision, by granting beneficial leases of the entailed estates, to be held in trust for their benefit. In consequence of advice upon the opinion thus taken, the Duke, by a lease executed the 30th of November 1798, let to his steward and agent, John Boyes, his heirs, assignees, and subtenants, certain farms, part of the entailed estates, for twenty-one years from Martinmas 1798 and 1799, at a rent nominally higher than had been paid on former leases.

[198] By another lease, executed on the 8th of February 1799, the Duke let to Mr. Boyes, his heirs, assignees and subtenants, for twenty-one years from Martinmas 1798, other farms, being also part of the entailed estates, at rents just exceeding the rents payable on leases lately expired.

By a third lease, of the 20th and 25th of June, a farm called Bonbard was let to the same person, and for a similar rent.

On the 2d of January 1799, about a month after the date of the first lease, Mr. Boyes executed an obligation, which reciting that lease, and certain causes and considerations, proceeds to declare the trust, which is in the form of an agreement between Mr. Boyes and Mrs. Esten, and an obligation on his part to underlet the lands or assign the leases for the highest rents and prices which could be obtained, and after paying the rents reserved in the principal leases, to hold the surplus rents or prices which might be so obtained for the use of Mrs. Esten, during her life, and for Anne Douglas Hamilton, her daughter, and any other after-born child or children of Mrs. Esten and the Duke of Hamilton, in such manner as in the trust obligation specified.

On the 26th of April and 3d of October 1799, Mr. Boyes executed similar obligations by way of declaration of trust, with respect to the second and third leases respectively.

These trust obligations were not produced or known to the appellant until long after the death of Douglas, Duke of Hamilton. Whether they [199] were ever by the grantor delivered to or in behalf of the respondent, Mrs. Scott Waring, and if so at what time they were so delivered, did not appear.

Douglas, Duke of Hamilton, died on the 1st of August 1799, and immediately after his death Mr. Boyes granted subleases of the lands comprised in the principal leases at rents which created a surplus of £1370 beyond the rents reserved upon the principal leases.

Upon the death of Douglas, Duke of Hamilton, he was succeeded in the estates and honours of the family by Archibald, Duke of Hamilton, the original appellant.

After the death of Duke Douglas, Mr. Boyes became the steward and agent of Duke Archibald, and accounted with and paid to him the rents reserved upon the three principal leases granted by Duke Douglas to Boyes, as trustee for Mrs. Esten and her issue by Duke Douglas; and with the knowledge and acquiescence of Duke Archibald, accounted with or paid to the respondent, Mrs. Waring, the surplus rents arising out of the subleases made by him to his subtenants.

Mr. Boyes died in 1812, and upon his death the principal leases vested in John Boyes, his son, as his heir and representative.

The respondents (who had lately intermarried) finding that some question was about to be raised on the part of the appellants, as to the validity of the leases and trust, required Mr. Boyes, as the representative of his father, to execute a conveyance of the principal leases and under leases in favour of new trustees; with which requisition, he having [200] delayed to comply, an action of adjudication in implement, and of count and reckoning, was brought against him by the respondents in the Court of Session.

The summons in this action concluded that it should be declared that the principal and sub-leases were held by John Boyes, deceased, in trust for the respondent, Mrs. Scott Waring, under the trust-obligations, and that they were binding on "John Boyes, as representing his father, and that he should be decerned to render to the pursuer, Mrs. Scott Waring, or to Captain Donald Macleod and Alexander Forsyth, as trustees nominated by her, a just and true account of his intromissions with the rents of the farms therein specified, (parts of the entailed estate of Hamilton,) and should be decerned and ordained to denude and convey two leases, which the said deceased John Boyes held of these farms, and several subleases therein specified, in favour of the said Donald Macleod and Alexander Forsyth, or otherwise, on his failing so to do, that the said leases and sub-leases should be adjudged from the said John Boyes, and decerned and declared to pertain and belong to the said trustees, in trust for the use of the pursuer during her lifetime."

Upon this action being raised, the appellant, the Marquis of Douglas, raised an action of exhibition, count, reckoning, and payment, against Mr. Boyes and the sub-tenants, demanding that they should produce the principal lease and the subleases: and that it should be found that they had no right to possess the lands demised, and that they should be [201] bound to account to him for the whole rents actually payable by the sub-tenants.

The appellant, at the same time, gave in defences in the action at Mrs. Scott Waring's instance, mentioning the action which he had brought, and praying that proceedings should be sisted, until they were conjoined. In the meantime an action of multiple-poin ding was brought in the name of Mr. Boyes, with the view of trying the validity of the claims of the parties.

By an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the 10th of March 1812, the three actions were conjoined: and on the 11th March 1812, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the three processes now conjoined, the representation for the Marquis of Douglas, separate representation for John Boyes, esquire, and having heard parties procurators upon the whole of the action of multiple-poin ding: prefers Mrs. Scott Waring and her husband, so far as he may have an interest, to the sums that may be in the hands of the raiser of the multiple-poin ding, and decerns in the preference accordingly under deduction always of the necessary expences incurred by the raiser of the multiple-poin ding, etc.; prefers Mrs. Scott Waring and her husband, so far as he may have an interest, for such of the rents as may be received for the year 1813, as well as for the preceding years, and decerns in the preference accordingly."

Against this interlocutor the appellants gave in a representation which the Court appointed to be answered.

On the 12th of May 1814, the appellants brought [202] an action of reduction and declarator against John Boyes, and the respondents, Mrs. Scott Waring and her husband, for his interest, (but taking no notice of Miss Hamilton, the respondent's daughter,) wherein they called for the production of the two leases granted by Douglas, Duke of Hamilton and Brandon, in favour of John Boyes deceased, and also the obligations of trust granted by the said John Boyes, in favour of Mrs. Scott Waring, and concluding that these writings should be reduced, set aside, and decerned, and declared to have been from the beginning, and in all time coming, to be null and void, and that the appellants should be reponed and restored against the same for the following reasons:—1st. Because they were vitiated and erased in substantialibus, and defective in the solemnities required by law.—2dly. Because the said leases were granted fraudulently and confidentially by the said Duke to the said John Boyes, his factor at the time, without any value, and with a view to defraud the heirs of entail in the dukedom and estate of Hamilton.—3dly. Because the foresaid tacks and relative obligations of trust were granted, ob turpem causam et propter causam adulterii, that they were not actionable and could bear no faith in judgment or out with the same, and that the said leases and trust obligations being so reduced and set aside, it should be found and declared that the appellant, the Duke of Hamilton and his successors in the entailed estate of Hamilton, had the only right and title to possess the lands contained in the said leases, and that the said John Boyes and his sub-tenants, should be decerned and ordained to flit and remove themselves from the said lands, in order that the pursuers might enter thereto.

[203] By an interlocutor dated the 9th of July 1811, the Lord Ordinary found, "that the leases being granted in trust for Mrs. Scott Waring and Miss Hamilton, so far as they were for the benefit of Miss Hamilton, they must be held to be altogether legal and unexceptionable; and so far as any benefit was by the leases conferred on Mrs. Scott Waring, it did not appear to have been with the view of her entering into or continuing in an improper course of life, but to secure a permanent income to a person, who had been induced by the granter to withdraw from a lawful and lucrative employment, and who was the mother of his only daughter; and *having been so long acquiesced in and unchallenged, it ought not to have been made the subject of judicial discussion; therefore, in the action of exhibition, count and reckoning, and adjudication by Mrs. Scott Waring and her husband, so far as he has any interest, decerns, declares, and adjudges in terms of the conclusions of the libel; the pursuers, before extract, finding security to relieve the defender of the engagements his father came under, as a trustee for the pursuer, in the process of multiple-poincing brought by Mr. Boyes, prefers Mrs. Scott Waring and her husband, so far as he may have any interest, to the rents and funds in medio; and decerns in the preference, and against the raiser of the multiple-[204]-poincing, accordingly; Mrs. Scott Waring and her husband for his interest, before extract, finding security as before mentioned; refuses the representations for the Marquis of Douglas and for Mr. Boyes; and, in fine, in the process of reduction at the instance of the Duke of Hamilton and the Marquis of Douglas, his commissioner, sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders from the whole conclusions of the libel, and decerns."

To this interlocutor the Lord Ordinary subjoined the following note:—"The former decisions upon the point of turpe pactum do not appear to be uniform. In the case of Sir William Hamilton, the Lords had set aside a bond in favour of a woman who was living in adultery with the granter, while they sustained an obligation to the child, which had been born of the same connection. And from the case referred to, (20th July 1622. Weir,) it appears, that a bond granted to a mother in similar circumstances for behoof of her child, was set aside. But in the case of Ross v. Robertson, in 1642, a bond which had been granted to a woman in the very same situation, and after her death, to her children begot in adultery, was sustained; and although, from the statement of the case, it would appear, that some argument had been raised upon the rule of the civil law, that turpiter facit quod set meretrix, non turpiter accipit cum sit meretrix, the more probable ground of decision seems to have been that stated by Lord Kames (Principles of Equity, B. 2, cap. 1, near the end), viz. that it was a duty and not a wrong to provide for a natural child, and for a woman, that the man had robbed of her [205] chastity. It appears, too, (which, in a question depending on general principles of jurisprudence, must be of great weight) that in England, in a similar case (The Marchioness of Annandale v. Harris, 2 P. W. 432, and 3 B. P. C. 145), a decree in the courts of law (Chancery) had been affirmed in the House of Lords (in 1728), though the precedent appears to have been overlooked in the case of Sir William Hamilton; and there is this difference between the formerly decided cases and the present, that there, the obligation granted to the woman and to the children of an illicit connection could not be enforced without the aid of a court of law, whereas in this case, the right of Mrs. Scott Waring and her daughter has been carried into effect, and must continue in full force, unless challenged and set aside in a court of law."

The case having been brought before the second division of the Court, at the instance of the appellants, the Court, by two successive interlocutors, affirmed the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The appeal was brought against the several interlocutors before stated.

* This is to be taken (semble) as an opinion and decision against the appellants, upon the ground of acquiescence, (by receipt of rents, etc. p. 199.) and laches, as distinguished from homologation. See pp. 206 and 225. To what antecedent the relative pronoun it in this passage refers does not very clearly appear. Whether to "leases" (by inadvertence,) or to "benefit," or generally to the whole subject matter of the litigation.

For the appellants, The Attorney General, and Mr. Abercrombie.

For the respondents, Mr. Warren, and Mr. Wetherell.

The question as to the illegality of the consideration, though strenuously argued in the Court below, [206] and discussed with much ability and learning, and supported by many authorities in the printed papers, was waived in the argument before the House of Lords.

The question of homologation was argued at great length before the House of Lords. But the House being of opinion that there was nothing in the judgments of the Court below upon that point amounting to a decision, gave no opinion upon that question. The arguments therefore, and the authorities upon these two points are omitted.

The validity or invalidity of the leases, under the power, or as affected by the prohibitions of the tailzie, was the only remaining question, and that was argued by the appellants upon the authority of the judgments in the Westshiell's Case, and the Queensberry Leases, (ante, vol. 1.) and for the respondents the same arguments as in that case were repeated.

The Lord Chancellor, in moving judgment, observed, that Miss Hamilton had not been a party in any of the suits, and upon a statement made by the agents in the cause, that she had no interest, because the leases had expired; the Lord Chancellor asked, whether they had expired at the time when this suit was instituted? to which question an answer was returned in the negative.

The Lord Chancellor then further observed, that upon the question of homologation, the House could give no opinion whatever, there being no passage in any of the interlocutors, which expressed any opinion (See the interlocutor of the L. O. p. 203, and the observations, post, 225) of the Court of Session as to [207] that question, and having put a question to the agents, whether he was right in that apprehension, in which they concurred, the Lord Chancellor then proceeded thus:—It is desirable that we should know, whether we are right in that, because the question on the validity of the leases, is certainly a very important question; but if there had been any opinion given by the Court of Session, in the terms of their interlocutors, that there was homologation sufficient to sustain the leases, then if we had concurred in opinion with them, that there was homologation sufficient to sustain the leases, it would have been unnecessary to consider how the question ought to be determined about the validity of the leases, supposing there had been no such homologation; but as far as I can find, looking anxiously at the terms of the interlocutors, the court has given no opinion whatever as to the homologation.

I can collect from the notes of the Judges opinions, what each of them probably thought about this matter of homologation; but we cannot take that to be a matter decided in the cause, unless it is decided in the terms of the interlocutors, and that therefore will reduce the question to this way of being considered, namely, whether if it should turn out (and I am not stating any thing now with reference to that question), that we should think the leases not good leases, we must not necessarily send it back again on the point of homologation. If we thought the leases bad, it would become absolutely necessary to consider, whether they have been homologated or not; if we thought them good, it [208] would be unnecessary to consider the effect of homologation.

I know what the parties contend, and I have an opinion as to the merits of the case on the point of homologation; but we, upon that question, cannot, according to our forms, give any opinion, if it should become necessary to give an opinion, because that point appears not to have been decided in the Court below.

If the agents are agreed as to that question, we shall know how to decide the case.

Upon the question of the validity of the leases, I have made up my opinion; but as it may be necessary to go to some length in the statement of the reasons upon which our opinions must be founded, we propose to move the judgment upon the validity of the leases to-morrow. If that opinion should be that the leases are good, then it is not necessary to consider homologation at all; if on the other hand, it should be the opinion of the House that the leases were originally bad, we cannot determine whether homologation has or has not made them good. In that case the cause must be remitted. I will go so far now in the case, as to state the circumstances.

All that relates to the turpitude of the transaction, has been given up at the bar.

I do not mean to say given up because it could or could not be sustained, but because it has been thought right to give it up; that is therefore a point not to be the subject of decision: but I would observe, that whatever might have been in England the law with respect to a provision for Mrs. Scott Waring [209] (Mrs. Esten as she then was), and the child which was her child, and supposed to be a child by the Duke of Hamilton: if the provisions for these two persons could have been supported, I apprehend, that according to the decisions of English courts, a trust for illegitimate children to be begotten between A. and B. could not be supported. I will say no more, however, upon that point; and with respect to homologation, if the leases are held to be invalid, there being no opinion of the Court of Session given upon that point, the cause must be remitted.

By the case as it is stated by the respondents, in whose printed case the whole history of this transaction is minutely traced, it appears, that Douglas Duke of Hamilton having communicated his intention to Mr. Cochrane, one of the commissioners of the excise in Scotland, who was also a commissioner for the management of the Duke's affairs, and much in his Grace's confidence, and also to Mr. Hugh Warrender, writer to the signet, his confidential agent, a correspondence ensued between the former of these gentlemen and the respondent Mrs. Waring, respecting the most eligible method of accomplishing his Grace's intentions. In a letter from Mr. Commissioner Cochrane, in answer to one from the respondent, Mrs. Waring, relative to the expediency of taking the proposed leases in her own and her daughter's name, or in the name of Mr. Boyes, the Duke's chamberlain, he says, "When I first thought of this subject, it occurred to me, that provided it could be done, the simplest and most natural method was what I see has also occurred to you, that the leases should be in [210] your own name; I accordingly some time ago mentioned this to Mr. Warrender, (the Duke's agent in Edinburgh) who was of opinion, that in case of the Duke's death, such leases might be liable to be reduced by his successor in the entail, and that therefore using (the name of) some other person might perhaps be safer: I made it my business to meet with Mr. Warrender this morning, and again fully stated the matter to him, showing him at the same time your letter: the result of our conversation was, that the safest and most satisfactory thing which could be done, was to follow your suggestion, and to lay the matter at once before counsel: I mentioned Mr. Blair, Solicitor General, (afterwards Lord President of the Court of Session) as undoubtedly the best in every respect which this country can afford; such matters are understood to be entirely confidential, and the most perfect reliance may be put, as well upon his honour as upon the soundness of his opinion; Mr. Warrender agreed with me, and the opinion of Mr. Blair is accordingly to be got as soon as possible." In an after part of the same letter, Mr. Cochrane says, "with regard to your questions, how you and your child would be situated in case of Mr. Boyes's death, and how your claim would be ascertained while he is living, I have only to repeat what I mentioned in my letter to Mr. Boyes, that it was understood that he was to execute a proper deed, obliging himself and his heirs to account for the surplus rents for behoof of you and your daughter." In this sentence the plan is developed, which was finally adopted in regard to these leases. There is [211] a series of letters from Commissioner Cochrane, which give a clear view of the progress and the various steps which preceded its completion.

In another letter to the respondent, Commissioner Cochrane says, "Immediately upon receiving your letter this morning, I went to Mr. Warrender, who put into my hands the list of farms which he had just received from Mr. Henderson, (the Duke's sub-factor). I have accordingly requested Mr. Warrender to draw up the form of a lease to Mr. Boyes, containing these farms which expire at Martinmas 1798 and 1799, to be submitted to Mr. Solicitor Blair for his consideration and opinion, and this you may depend upon being done as soon as possible. The surplus arising from these farms, according to Mr. Henderson's estimate, is I see £4313," that is, the surplus arising upon sub-leases, beyond the rents payable on the principal leases. In a postscript to a letter of this date, Mr. Cochrane says, "Since writing the above, I have this moment received from the Solicitor his opinion, of which I now send a copy, and wait your further instructions."

The case as laid before Mr. Solicitor Blair, (a very great authority undoubtedly,) is stated thus:

A. B. holds an estate under entail, with prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses against selling, contracting debt, wadsetting or granting infeftments in security. Having no lawful issue, the estate, failing him, devolves on a relation who is heir of entail. By a female friend living with him he has a daughter, and in the event of his predeceasing them, he wishes to have some provision secured to [212] them. In consequence of the entail, and their particular situation, it is not in his power to grant them any provision on the estate; and though he has some real and personal estate, yet, as there are debts which may go far to exhaust the value of them, he would not wish to rest their dependence solely upon what surplus might remain. Several of the farms on the estate are out of lease at Martinmas next, or Martinmas thereafter; and owing to the progressive state of improvement, as well as the general rise of rent through the country, a considerable increase of rent will certainly arise from them. In his particular situation, it has occurred, that by granting leases to his female friend, or some trustee for her and her child, of the farms so now falling out of lease, at the present or some small additional rent, with the power of subsetting, a considerable surplus could be had by them upon subsets, and in that mode he may attain his wish of securing some provision for them. It never has been his practice to take any grassums, but always to let farms, as they became open, at the best rent that could be had, on leases for nineteen years, so that every justice in that respect has been always done to the future heirs of entail; and he does not feel that he could be accused of impropriety to them, if, in his situation, for the purpose of subsistence for his child, he should endeavour to appropriate to her the additional rent only, that might hereafter be got on a small part of his estate, during the currency of one lease. By the entail, "notwithstanding the prohibitive and irritant clauses," it is declared, that it shall be lawful to the first institute "and the other heirs of tailzie above spe[213]-cified, to set tacks of the said estate, or any part thereof, for the space of twenty-one years, or the setter's lifetime, the same not being set with evident diminution of the rental." Was there but one farm or two, on which a surplus rent might arise to the extent of what was wished, the matter might, it seems, be easily carried into execution; but the farms in general, in that part of the country, are small, and therefore, though the increase on each might be considerable, in proportion to the rent presently payable, yet, in order to raise on the whole a surplus equal to the provision he would wish, it would require a very considerable number of farms to be so let. His female friend is also in a particular situation. She had been formerly married in England, where her husband yet is. Articles of separation were long ago entered into betwixt them, and they have ever since lived separate. A divorce has taken place in the Doctor's Commons, but has not been carried through the House of Peers.

On the whole, under all the circumstances, the opinion of counsel is requested:—and more particularly,

1. If it is not in the power of the memorialist, to let leases at present, of such of his farms as expire at Martinmas next, or Martinmas 1799, for any period of years not exceeding twenty-one, and at the present rent?

2. If the granting such a lease to his female friend, or a trustee for her, would be effectual, although not actual resident tenants?

3. If so, could he, instead of one farm only, include perhaps twenty or thirty in one lease?—Or [214] would a separate lease for each be necessary, and would all of these be effectual?

4. If one lease, to comprehend the whole, should be deemed sufficient, would it be necessary in it to specify the rent presently payable for each, and make a specific rent payable for each? Or would a general set and cumulo rent for the whole be sufficient, resting on the knowledge that the rent was not less than the present?

5. Under the particular circumstances of her situation, would it be advisable to have any lease in the name of the lady herself?

6. If in the name of a trustee, would it not be sufficient that he granted a declaration of the lease being only in trust, with an obligation on him and his heirs to pay the surplus rent arising from the subsets?

The Solicitor General gave the following opinion.

"As to the first query, I have no doubt that A. B. may at present grant leases for twenty-one years, for such of the farms as will be out of lease at Martinmas next or Martinmas 1799, such leases being granted without diminution of the rental. I even think, that A. B. is under no limitation with respect to the endurance of the leases, which he may choose to grant upon the entailed estate, for although there is a clause in the entail giving power to the heir in possession to set leases for the space of twenty-one years, or the setter's lifetime, which would seem to imply, that the heir was understood to be restrained from granting leases for a longer endurance, yet I observe no such limitation in the clauses of the entail [215] itself, and it is a received rule in the construction of entails, that restraints of this sort are not to be fixed upon an heir by implication alone, or from the presumed will of the entailor, however clear. An heir of entail in the eye of law, is proprietor of the entailed estate, and is entitled to exercise every power inherent in the right of property, except so far as he is limited and restrained by the express words of the entail. Query second. I do not think it will affect the validity of the lease, whether granted to the lady herself or to a trustee for behoof of her and her child, that the lessee does not reside upon the farms, and cultivate the same personally, as the lease may contain an express power to assign or sublet."

Much argument has been made at the bar, upon the question, whether supposing this had been bonâ fide a transaction between the lessor and lessee, the lessee at the time when the lease was constituted, and for some time after, was not a trustee for the lessor. If the appellant herself had been made the lessee, it might have been otherwise; but it is insisted, that during an interval of time (how short they say does not signify) the lessee is trustee for the lessor, and that he did not become at the time when the lease was executed immediately a trustee for the lessee, whereas, if the lady herself had been made the lessee, I think, (under the circumstances, which I shall have occasion to speak to presently,) that argument could not have been urged.

With respect to queries three and four, the learned counsel says, "I see no objection to including any number of farms in the same lease; it may, however, be proper to specify a separate rent to be [216] paid for each farm, so as to make it appear with certainty, that there is a rise of rent, however inconsiderable, upon each farm, or at least, that they are all set without diminution of the former rental. Queries five and six. Under the whole circumstances of this case, I consider it to be the most eligible plan, that the proposed lease should be granted to a trustee, who must execute a back bond, declaring that he holds the same in trust, and binding himself to account for the surplus rents to the lady for behoof of herself and child, in such proportions and in such manner as shall be agreeable to the parties, and in the event of either dying during the currency of the lease, to be accountable to the survivor for her sole benefit."

It will be recollected, that other great lawyers have in former cases given opinions more qualified, by stating, that this would be all right, unless it could be said to be in fraud of the entail, and it was that expression which led to a discussion in former cases (Queensberry Leases, Bl., vol. i.) in this House, as to what was fraud upon the entail, and that qualification of the opinion to which I have alluded, was certainly of some importance; I mean, if there can be such a thing as fraud upon an entail.

Acting upon the advice of that eminent lawyer, the parties finally resolved that the leases should be granted to Mr. Boyes, and that he should declare, by a separate deed, that they were held in trust by him for the respondent and her daughter, and oblige himself to account on their behalf for the excrement rents.

Accordingly, in a letter to the respondent Mrs. [217] Waring, Mr. Cochrane says, "Agreeable to your desire, the scroll of the lease was sent to Mr. Eiston, who, after revising it, returned it to Mr. Warrender. Two copies being necessary, one to be kept by the Duke, the other by Mr. Boyes, I accordingly send them both by this night's post, under covers addressed to the Duke. Mr. Boyes will explain the form, as to signing and witnesses. Upon the Duke's executing this lease, it will become necessary that Mr. Boyes should on his part execute the trust obligation in regard to the surplus."

The respondents then state, in their case, that "instructions were accordingly given to Mr. Eiston to frame the trust obligations." Mr. Eiston is represented, however, as labouring under indisposition, and for that reason, as it is alleged, the execution of the deeds was delayed, and this, they say, is "a circumstance which will explain the interval of time between the dates of the principal leases and the dates of the trust obligations."

In another letter to the respondent, Mrs. Waring, dated the 27th of December 1798, Mr. Cochrane says, "Mr. Eiston will, I suppose, have mentioned to you the cause of the delay in drawing up the back bond, (that is, the declaration of trust,) occasioned by his health not permitting him to attend to it. I have, however, been this moment informed by Mr. Warrender, that Mr. Eiston will send it to you in a day or two." On the 9th of January 1799, Mr. Cochrane writes to the respondent, Mrs. Waring—"Immediately upon receiving your letter this morning, I went to Mr. Warrender who informed [218] me, that the obligation which he had sent off to Mr. Boyes, had not been as yet returned to him. As soon, however, as it is returned to him, I shall not fail to acquaint you."

On the 30th of November 1798, the Duke let to Mr. Boyes, his heirs, assignees and subtenants, certain farms, parts of the entailed estates of the family (the names of which it is unnecessary to detail), some for twenty-one years after Martinmas 1798, and the rest for the same period after Martinmas 1799. These farms (as the case of the respondent states) were all out of lease at the time, and a separate rent is stipulated for each, somewhat higher than had been paid by the former tacks. At the same time, the regulations, which were in use to be observed on the estate for the cultivation of the farms, were carefully preserved, and other clauses were super-added, which they say "are greatly for the benefit of the heirs of entail." The case of the appellant states that the farms so let were thirty-nine different farms.

By a second lease, dated on the 8th of February 1799, the former having been executed on the 30th of November preceding, (and therefore about two months and eight days afterwards), his grace also let to Mr. Boyes, his heirs, assignees and subtenants, for twenty-one years after Martinmas 1798, certain other farms, being also part of the entailed estates of the family, specifying a separate rent for each, exceeding the rents payable by the tack which had just expired, and the lease contains the same conditions and provisions as the former, for securing the interest of the grantor and the heirs of entail.

[219] A third lease was made on the 20th and 25th of June 1799, by which there was let to Mr. Boyes, also for twenty-one years, the farm of Bonhard, in Lindlithgowshire, for a rent exceeding the former tack duty, and upon the same conditions and provisions as were contained in the former leases. The declarations of trust bear date on the 2d of January, the 26th of April, and the 3d of October 1799, the leases being dated on the 30th of November 1798, the 8th of February 1799, and the 20th and 25th of June 1799, so that there is an interval of time between each lease, and each declaration of trust, executed at those respective periods.

Mr. Boyes declares in the following manner: "that he held them in trust for the benefit of the respondent and her daughter," namely, "that for certain causes and considerations," (not stating what,) "it had been agreed upon between Mrs. Harriet Pye Esten and him, that whatever advantages or rise of money-rents could be obtained," (so that you observe here, Mr. Boyes is agreeing with Mrs. Esten, and Mrs. Esten is agreeing with Mr. Boyes, as to the advantages or rise of money-rents which could be obtained, that is, according to the ordinary sense of the language, could be obtained by Mr. Boyes from these leases), "by subsetting the lands and farms before mentioned, or by assigning the said leases, or any part thereof, should be held by him in trust for the use and behoof of the said Mrs. Esten during her lifetime, and of Anne Douglas Hamilton, her daughter, and any other child or children that may be procreated between the said duke and her, in manner underwritten, and that [220] she had further reposed in him the trust and charge of collecting the surplus money-rents to be obtained by subsetting, or the prices or considerations to be got by assignments."

On this narrative, Mr. Boyes bound and obliged himself and his heirs to use all manner of diligence in getting the said farms subset, and to report his progress thereon, by delivering to the respondent "a faithful and true account from time to time, of the rises of rent that might be obtained by subsetting, and to pay over to her during her natural life all and whatever sum or sums of money, as (which) may so be got, raised and recovered by him from subtenants or assignees, upon subsetting the said lands and farms, or any part or parts thereof, and after her death to pay over the same, along with what remains unaccounted for to herself, to the said Miss Anne Douglas Hamilton, or any other child or children she may have as aforesaid, equally amongst them or in such proportions as the said Mrs. Harriet Pye Esten may direct and appoint by any writing under her hand; and that yearly and ternly during the currency of the lease, and as soon as the same can be got in and uplifted and recovered by the ordinary and usual modes of process and diligence, deducting always all charges of management, and a reasonable allowance for his own trouble."

Within a very few weeks after granting the third lease, the Duke of Hamilton died, (I believe within the sixty days).

Mr. Boyes proceeded to grant subleases of the farms, whereby a surplus beyond the rents payable [221] to the proprietor was obtained upon the whole of about £1370.

The questions which arise in this case between the parties, (putting out of the case now all that has been stated about the vicious consideration of this transaction,) are, whether leases made under these circumstances are to be considered as leases made within the power which the possessor, as heir of entail, had, or whether they are to be considered as leases at all; whether they are to be considered as leases in trust for Mrs. Esten, or whether they were originally to be considered as leases granted according to the power, and from the moment when they were granted, leases in trust for her, and good against the succeeding heirs of entail.

These questions came to be discussed in different actions, which have produced different interlocutors. The last interlocutor, which is a material one, is to this effect, "having considered, etc. finds, that the leases in question are proved to have been granted in trust for the pursuer, Mrs. Scott Waring, and her daughter Miss Hamilton, and not as in the case of Westshiel, to create in or reserve to the grantor a right to part of the rents of the lands, after his interest in them as proprietor under a strict entail had ceased."

The case of Westshiel was a case where a person in possession of a tailzied estate, let leases without a diminution of the rental, that is, not below the last rent that was paid; but at the same time, instead of taking a grassum, that is, instead of taking what the Scotch call a slump sum, at the time when the leases [222] were made, he took bonds from the tenants to pay him yearly certain sums of money.

If I recollect that case rightly, the yearly sums were not reserved payable at the same period as the rents, but they were reserved payable by bonds yearly from the respective tenants.

It was contended on the one hand, that this was to be considered as a grassum. It was held that it was not a grassum, because it was not a slump sum, according to the then notions of grassum.

On the other hand, it was said, inasmuch as the heir of tailzie in possession might have taken grassum, there was no reason why he who could have taken £1500 at once, might not reserve £1000 to be paid to him at certain times during the currency of the lease; and if he might reserve £1500 to be paid to him prior to his making the demise, it was nothing to the subsequent heirs of tailzie what he got from the tenants for the forbearance. Instead of taking it in one sum he took it in portions of yearly payment, having just as much for his forbearance in that respect, as the value of the money during that period.

The Court of Session was at last of opinion, that although he might have taken £1000 in presenti, (for such was the position in that case) although he might have enjoyed that £1000 together with the interest of it, by laying it out in loans to a third person, yet that he could not lend the money to the tenants themselves, but that what was secured by these bonds was to be considered as rent, and that although the bonds had been assigned, or might have been as [223] signed, for a valuable consideration, they were in truth to be taken as so much yearly rent, and being to be taken as so much yearly rent, the succeeding heirs of entail were entitled to these yearly payments, although they would not have been entitled, as the law then stood, to any part of the £1000 if it had been paid before, or at the time of executing the lease.

We then, as it appears to me, get into a considerable difficulty in this case, because if the Duke of Hamilton could not have reserved these surplus rents for his own benefit, in the form of bonds for money, and if the surplus rents, reserved for his own benefit in the form of bonds for money would have been bad in the hands of persons holding for a valuable consideration, you will have to consider whether it is argued unanswerably at the bar, that nothing was reserved for himself. Surely, as between the tenant in tail in possession, and the person to take after him, it is a very nice distinction, that for the actual use and enjoyment of the tenant in possession, he cannot reserve, by a separate security, such a payment; but if he has to provide for a person with whom he cohabits, and her natural daughter, he may then relieve himself of the necessity of making that provision out of another part of his fortune, and make it at the expense of the entailed estate.

That is one way in which the House will have to consider this case.

The interlocutor proceeds in these words: "finds, that in so far as the leases were granted for the benefit of Miss Hamilton, they must be held to be [224] altogether legal and unexceptionable; finds that so far as any benefit was by the leases conferred on Mrs. Scott Waring, it does not appear to have been with a view of her entering into or continuing in an improper course of life, but to secure a permanent income to a person who had been induced by the grantor to withdraw from a lawful and lucrative employment, and who was the mother of his only daughter, and having been so long acquiesced in and unchallenged, it ought not to have been made the subject of judicial discussion."

This was afterwards adhered to by subsequent interlocutors.

In this interlocutor of the 9th of July 1814, there are many findings, which it has become unnecessary by what has been stated at the bar to attend to, and the question in which alone the House can deliver any judgment now, is, whether under all the circumstances appearing in this case, under which these instruments were made, (call them leases, or by whatever denomination you think proper to give to them), this is to be considered as a transaction which lies within the true intent and meaning of the power which the Duke of Hamilton had, or whether on the other hand, this transaction is of such a nature, that it cannot be sustained against the subsequent heirs of entail.

I will at this time only add again, that with respect to the other question, which has been very largely argued at the bar, (the question of homologation,) I am afraid we cannot deal with it. If we could, provided there has been sufficient homologation, it would not be necessary to consider whether these leases [225] are in themselves good or bad; but as we are not in a situation to authorize us to consider whether there has been homologation, we must enquire whether the leases themselves are valid according to the law of Scotland. I move that the discussion which belongs to that important question, be reserved till the House shall meet to-morrow.

The Lord Chancellor:—I have stated from the papers, the case of the Duke of Hamilton and Brandon against Mrs. Scott Waring.

The two questions which have been submitted to your consideration are, first, whether the leases which were made by the late Duke of Hamilton are to be considered as valid and effective leases? and secondly, if they are not, whether you are to consider the circumstances which have been stated to you in argument, as circumstances proving that these invalid leases have received validity from what is called homologation; or whether on the other hand there is only acquiescence, not in its effect equivalent to homologation? With respect to the latter question, I stated the other day, that it appeared to me that we should not rightly proceed according to our usage, if we now gave an opinion upon it.

If you hold the leases to be valid, it is not necessary to consider the other question: if you hold the leases to be invalid, it appears to me it will be absolutely necessary to remit the cause to the Court of Session, in order that the court may consider whether the circumstances stated to amount to homologation, do or do not give validity to these leases.

[226] The first question, whether the leases are valid or not, is certainly an important question in a great many views. It appears to me, that your decision may bear on a great many cases which have not yet come into controversy. I have endeavoured to look at the case in all the points of view in which it may possibly affect such cases, but into the discussion of those points it does not appear to me prudent, or at all events necessary at present to enter. The opinion which I have formed with respect to these leases, (an opinion which I entertain with great confidence) is, that these leases are not valid. The ground upon which I satisfy my mind as to that question, is, that when these leases were executed, they appear to me to have been leases for the benefit of the Duke of Hamilton himself. Without entering into the question whether the making a provision for another person is a benefit for himself, it appears to me, that at the time when these leases were actually made and in existence, the Duke of Hamilton might have disposed of the leases as he pleased. He was under no more obligation to give them to Mrs. Esten than to any other person, and if a lease under such circumstances, executed by the person in possession of an estate tail, would not be a good lease, it appears to me that it will make no difference in principle, whether he makes a present of that lease soon after it is executed, or at a distant period from the date of its execution, and upon that ground alone, my opinion is, that these leases were not good. There are other grounds also on which, as it appears to me, the validity of the leases [227] might be affected; but it is not necessary for me, at least in my view of the case, to proceed to examine those other grounds.

The judgment, therefore, which I think the House ought to pronounce is, a judgment asserting the invalidity of these leases, and sending the case back again, with that finding, to the Court of Session, in order to have the question determined how far the plea of homologation can or cannot be supported. I therefore move the House to find, that the leases in question were leases not warranted by the power contained in the deed of entail, and were therefore subject to reduction, unless the same were homologated by the late Appellant Archibald Duke of Hamilton, deceased, and by the present Duke of Hamilton and Brandon; and so far as the same were not so homologated, to reverse the interlocutor complained of, and to remit the cause to the Court of Session to review, subject to this finding, and to do therein as is consistent with right.

24th July 1820.

The Lords find, that the leases in question were not warranted by the power contained in the deed of entail, and therefore subject to reduction, unless the same were homologated by the late Appellant Archibald Duke of Hamilton, deceased, and by the Appellant Alexander now Duke of Hamilton, and so far as the same were not so homologated respectively; and therefore, it is ordered and adjudged, that the interlocutors complained of be reversed; and it is further ordered, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session, to review the same, subject to the above finding.

[228]

IRELAND.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

ROGER MONTGOMERY HAMILTON M'NEILL, and DANIEL M'NEILL, Esquires,

—Appellants; MICHAEL CAHILL, and ROBERT GROVE LESLIE, Esquires,

—Respondents [24th July 1820].

[Mews' Dig. i. 35, 65, 328; iv. 221; v. 345; vii. 182, 220; vi. 877; xii. 945. As to omission in pleading, commented on in Hosking v. Terry 1862, 15 Moo. P.C.C. 193 at p. 501. As to agreement with creditors, see Bankruptcy Act 1890, s. 3.]

Where a deed of marriage settlement is drawn up, as between the intended husband and wife, and their respective fathers; and the father of the wife secures to the father of the husband, a sum of money, as the portion of the wife, according to a provision of the deed, but neither he nor his daughter execute the deed, and it is executed only by the intended husband and his father; it is binding upon and as between the parties who execute, and creates efficient rights for the objects of the settlement.

If two deeds be executed, bearing different dates, that which is first registered, even with notice of the other deed, has priority both in law and equity, although it be posterior in date and execution.

On points, in which the two deeds are inconsistent, the deed last registered is personally binding on the parties who execute: and the lands and property comprised in the deed first registered, are also bound, after satisfying the trusts of the first, by the contracts and trusts of the deed last registered.

A transaction of sale made upon a false or mistaken consideration between parties in the relation of brothers-in-law: the vendor being an heir succeeding to the estate sold, and the purchaser executor of the will of the vendor's father, and where the party selling is under circumstances of great pecuniary embarrassment and distress, will not be impeached if fairly made: but if the consideration for the purchase was the balance of an account, which appears to be erroneous, the whole transaction must be so far investigated as to correct the accounts.

[229] Upon a bill by the vendor, seeking to rescind the sale, on the ground of fraud and oppression in the transaction, and error in the accounts, although the prayer to rescind the sale was refused, the account was opened after a considerable lapse of time.

If the plaintiff in a suit omits to put facts in issue by his original bill, or by amendment, leave to file a supplemental or amended bill, after the suit is at issue, ought not to be granted by the court, on the ground of inadvertence. A petition to obtain such leave ought to make out a case of new evidence lately discovered, material to the plaintiff's equity, and which, with reasonable diligence, could not have been discovered before: but in such case the suit ought to be disposed of without prejudice to the matter omitted to be put in issue, which the plaintiff may prosecute in any future suit.

If the plaintiff in a suit has, by the course of the court, a right to a decree for an account, he does not forfeit such a right by refusing an account which is offered by the defendant or the court at the hearing. It is the duty of the court to decree an account ex officio: and if such decree is not made, it is a valid ground of appeal, notwithstanding the refusal of the plaintiff.

An agreement between an insolvent debtor and his assignee, by which an estate of the insolvent is to be held in trust by the assignee, to pay out of the rents and profits, annuities to the insolvent and his wife, and the surplus towards the extinction of a debt owing to the assignee, is a transaction which, being brought before a court of equity, at the instance of the insolvent himself, must be rescinded, on the ground of public policy.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Chancery, in Ireland, made in a cause in which the appellants were plaintiffs, and the respondents were defendants, by which decree the plaintiff's bill was dismissed with costs: and from a subsequent order of the court, by which an application, on behalf of the plaintiffs, for liberty to file a supplemental bill, was refused with costs.

[230] The case, as it appeared in the pleadings and proceedings, comprised the following facts:

By a marriage contract, dated the 15th of June 1743, and made between Roger (Hamilton) McNeill (the father of the appellant Roger) on the one part: and Elizabeth Price, his intended wife, and Cromwell Price, her father, on the other part, and executed according to the forms of the law of Scotland, Roger, the father, bound and obliged himself to settle a certain estate, called the Taynish estate, in Scotland, upon the heirs male of the intended marriage, subject to a life rent or estate for life to himself, and to a jointure and portions for the younger children of the marriage, and subject also to the charges and conditions therein mentioned.*

By the Appellant, on the application for leave to file a supplemental bill, it was alleged that the limitation of the estate was perfected according to the law of Scotland; and that one part of the settlement having been deposited and recorded in the proper office in Edinburgh, in the year 1768, Cromwell Price in 1769, instituted certain proceedings, and obtained, in the courts of Scotland, an inhibition restraining Roger, the father, from selling, aliening or encumbering that estate.

* This contract was not put in issue in the cause, and it became the subject of discussion only, so far as the right to give it in evidence, or to amend the bill, or file a supplemental bill, to put it in issue, was in question.

The marriage took place, and there was issue two children, viz. a son, (the Appellant Roger,) and a daughter, Margaret.

In the year 1773 the Respondent Cahill intermarried with the daughter Margaret.

In the year 1777 the appellant Roger inter-[231]-married with Catherine Chambers, the daughter of Daniel Chambers.

At the date of the Appellant's marriage, the Irish estates of the McNeill family stood limited as follows, viz. the Shanvally, or Dunseverick estate, in the county of Antrim, (the rents of which amounted only to the sum of £231 a year, above chiefry and other charges of receipt, etc.) was limited to Roger the father, for life, with remainder to the Appellant Roger in tail, with the reversion in fee to him and his heirs; the Ballylesson, or Newgrove estate, in the county of Down, was limited, (subject to certain charges,) to Archibald McNeill Montgomery, a brother of Roger the father, for life, with a general power to charge the estate with £2000 (which power was exercised by will,) with remainder to Roger, the father, for life; with remainder to the Appellant Roger, for life, with a power to charge the estate in favour of any wife, with a jointure of £200 a year, with remainder to the first and other sons of the Appellant Roger, successively, in tail male, with remainders over; and the lands called Sheeplands, in the county of Down, held by lease for lives renewable for ever, and the lands called Loughmoney and Carrowearland, in the same county, held under fee farm grants, were limited to Archibald McNeill Montgomery, in tail, or quasi tail, with remainder to Roger the father, for life, with remainder to the Appellant Roger, in tail, or quasi tail, with remainders over.

Archibald had demise the Ballylesson estate to his brother Roger, for the term of Archibald's life, at the rent of £400 a year, under which demise Roger, the father, was then in possession of that estate.

[232] By an indenture, dated the 15th of October 1777, being a settlement made previously to the marriage of the Appellant Roger, and Catherine Chambers, the Dunseverick estate was vested in William Gillespie, (the attorney of the McNeill family,) in trust, in the first place, for the payment of certain debts mentioned in a schedule annexed to the indenture; and then, out of the rents, to pay £200 a year to the Appellant Roger, during the life of his father, for a present maintenance, (which was to be increased to £400 a year, chargeable on other lands therein mentioned, and which devolved to Roger, the father, on the death of Archibald McNeill Montgomery,) and subject thereto, to the use of Roger, the father, for life, with remainder to the Appellant Roger, in tail male, with reversion to him in fee. By this deed, the appellant Roger, in exercise of his power, charged the Ballylesson estate with a jointure of £200 a year, in favour of Catherine Chambers; and Daniel Chambers agreed to pay Roger, the father, the sum of £500 as a portion with his daughter. The deed contained an agreement to suffer a common recovery of the estate, which was duly suffered accordingly in Trinity term 1778.

The debts set forth in the schedule to the settlement were, a debt of £1500, due to William Gillespie; a debt of £150, due to Sir Patrick Hamilton; and a debt of £250, due to Skeffington Thompson, and others; all these debts, except that to Sir Patrick Hamilton, had been previously secured by the Appellant Roger, and his father, jointly.

The debt of £1500 was owing to Gillespie for his bills of costs, and for money advanced by him in a suit between Roger, the father, and his brother Archibald [233] relative to the Ballylesson estate, and which was compromised on the settlement of the estate, according to the limitations before stated. The debt of £150 was originally the debt of the father; the debt of £250 was the debt of the appellant Roger.

Roger the father, the appellant Roger, and William Gillespie, executed this settlement, but Chambers and his daughter refused to execute, and prevailed on the appellant Roger, before the marriage had been solemnized, to execute another settlement in the form of marriage articles, bearing date the 25th of October 1777. By those articles, the appellant Roger covenanted, that as soon as he should become seised of the several lands of Dunseverick, etc. of which his father was then seised in the counties of Down and Antrim, he would vest the same in trustees therein named, to the use of himself for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of the marriage, successively in tail male, subject to a jointure to Catherine Chambers of £400 a year, £200 a year of which was to issue out of the Shanvally or Dunseverick estate, and with a provision for raising £6000 as portions for the younger children of the marriage.

In these articles no notice was taken of the first settlement, or of the debts mentioned in the schedule annexed to it, or of any of the provisions contained in that settlement.

By the activity and contrivance of Daniel Chambers, the articles were registered before the indenture of settlement; the articles having been registered on the 7th, whereas the settlement was not registered until the 13th of November 1777.

[234] Notwithstanding the execution of the articles, and refusal to execute the settlement, Daniel Chambers sent to Roger, the father, his bond to secure the £500 portion provided by the settlement; and William Gillespie, the trustee, was permitted to enter without dispute into the possession of the Dunseverick estate, under the trusts of the settlement; the yearly sum of £200 was paid to the appellant Roger, and the surplus rents were applied by Gillespie in the reduction of his debt.

Roger, the father, was not informed of the execution of the articles until after it had been accidentally discovered in 1781, on searching the registry; but Gillespie having obtained information of the fact, took preliminary steps for obtaining a custodiam against the Ballylesson estate, in order to enforce the payment of his debt. To prevent that proceeding from being executed, Roger, the father, paid Gillespie £1150, part of his debt.

The father also paid some debts of the appellant Roger; and by the request of the father, the respondent Cahill paid other debts.

In the year 1779, Roger, the father, sold the Taynish estate to Sir Archibald Campbell, for £21,000; which sum was paid to Roger, the father, or allowed in account with the respondent Cahill, as his executor.

A sum of £10,000 or thereabouts, part of the £21,000 for which the Taynish estate was sold, was applied in paying off different incumbrances on the estate, including £2000 the portion of the respondent Cahill's wife, as the only younger child of Roger, the father, and Elizabeth, his wife; and the [235] remainder of the £21,000, except about £700, was received by Roger, the father.

In the year 1779, Roger, the father, granted to the respondent Cahill a lease of Mountain farm, part of the Dunseverick estate, for three lives, or sixty-one years, at the rent of one shilling a-year during the life of the lessor, and of £14 a-year afterwards. It having subsequently appeared that this lease exceeded the power of Roger the father, the appellant Roger, in the year 1785, confirmed the lease, by a memorandum indorsed on the instrument of demise, noticing the defect, and also executed in favour of the respondent a lease of the farm for sixty-one years, to commence from the death of Roger the father, at the rent of £14 a-year, at the same time promising, that when he came into the possession of the estate, he would grant a lease for the like term at a nominal rent. This he did, of his own accord, in the year 1794, after his father's death, and instructed his bailiff not to demand the rent of £14 accrued during the interval.

In December, in the year 1784, Archibald McNeill Montgomery died without issue, when the estate of Sheeplands, Loughmoney and Carrowearland devolved to Roger, the father, under the limitations before stated, and the appellant Roger, from that time received the additional £200 a-year, provided by the settlement.

On the 10th March 1788, Roger, the father died, having made his will, whereby he made the respondent Cahill's wife residuary legatee of his personal estate, and the respondent Cahill his executor. By a clause in the will, the following direction was given: "as to all sum or sums of money, which I have paid for [236] or on account of my son, Roger McNeill, and for which he was joined as security with me, it is my will, that all such sum and sums shall remain and be a charge against my son and his estate, and that the same shall be paid to my daughter, or be by her raised off the said estate, by sale or otherwise, as the law shall enable her to do: in regard, I did, by a settlement executed on my son's marriage, grant to him an annuity off my said estate during my life of £200 a-year, and also gave him up the estate of Sheeplands, in consideration, that he should pay off certain debts, and also exonerate me from said joint securities, which he has failed to do," etc.

The Appellant, Roger McNeill, for several years before the death of his father, had been very much involved in debt. At the time of his father's death he was in Scotland. The respondent Cahill, in the year 1789, called upon him there, and showed him a list of debts, which he alleged had been paid by Roger the father, for the Appellant Roger McNeill; and the respondent claimed to be entitled to the amount thereof, under the will of the father, against the appellant Roger McNeill, and his estates. The respondent Cahill also represented to the appellant, Roger McNeill, that his estates were liable to those debts; and knowing the embarrassments of the appellant, (as he alleged,) the respondent proposed to lend him a sum of two hundred pounds upon his bond, which the appellant agreed to borrow, and thereupon was induced, for the consideration of £3500, part of the alleged debts, to convey to the respondent Cahill, the lands of Loughmoney, Carrowearland and [237] Sheeplands, being of the annual value of £180 or thereabouts, by deed dated the 28th day of May 1789.

The claims set up by the respondent Cahill, as executor of Roger H. McNeill, against the appellant, Roger McNeill, and his estates, consisted of the following items of account:—

[238] This account was furnished by the respondent Cahill, to the appellant Roger McNeill, in Scotland, a few days previous to the execution of the deed of conveyance, and at a time when the appellant Roger McNeill, (as he alleged) was unacquainted with the nature or particulars of the account, or with his late father's affairs, and when he was, to the knowledge of the respondent, in great distress, and had no opportunity of having the advice of his friends or legal assistance.

The principal sum of £1500 due to Gillespie, as mentioned in the account, with interest to the amount of £990, which (as appears by the date in the schedule) accrued in the lifetime of the testator, was the proper debt of the father, Roger Hamilton McNeill, the appellant Roger being a mere surety. Part only of the debt to Gillespie had been paid by Roger Hamilton McNeill, namely, to the amount of £1130 principal money, which was paid out of the purchase monies of the Tainish estate. The balance of Gillespie's account, to the amount of £392 9s. 7½d. had been paid by the appellant Roger McNeill, since his father's decease.

The debt to Sir Patrick Hamilton, (being a judgment) for £150, with ten years interest, amounting to £99, which accrued in the lifetime of Roger Hamilton McNeill, was the sole exclusive debt of Roger Hamilton McNeill, the appellant not being joined therein as a surety.

The debt to Fulton, amounting to the principal sum of £1100 6s. 3d. with seven years and a half's interest thereon, amounting to £495, consisting partly of debts owing by Roger Hamilton McNeill, [239] and partly of debts owing by the appellant Roger McNeill, discharged by his father, and principally paid out of the purchase money of the Tainish estate.

No consideration was given or paid by the respondent Cahill for the conveyance of 1789, except the credit on the foregoing account to the amount of £3500, and the sum of £200 lent by the respondent to the appellant Roger McNeill, which was secured by his bond and warrant of attorney, to confess judgment.

The appellant Roger McNeill, in the month of May 1790, was arrested for debt, and detained a prisoner at the suit of several of his creditors until the month of June 1791, when the respondent Cahill, claiming to be a creditor of the appellant, to the amount of £200, applied by petition to the Court of King's Bench in Ireland, under the compulsory clause in the Irish act 31 Geo. III. for relief of insolvent debtors, to compel the appellant to make discovery of his real and personal estate, to the end that the same should be applied in payment of his debts; and the appellant, having given such accounts and schedules as required by the act, was discharged from confinement under the provisions of that act.

Henry Coulson, one of the Masters of the Court of Chancery, was first appointed assignee of the estate and effects of the appellant, Roger McNeill; and upon his decease, by an order of the court, in the matter of the insolvent, bearing date the 3d day of August 1801, the respondent Cahill was appointed in the place of Henry Coulson, and acted as assignee.

[240] The respondent Cahill, after he became assignee of the estate of the appellant, entered into a treaty with him, upon the foundation partly of the old account, including some of the debts alleged to have been paid by the father, and claimed by the respondent Cahill as executor, according to the preceding statement; and by a memorandum of agreement, bearing date the 17th day of September 1801, after reciting that the respondent Cahill claimed to be a creditor of the appellant, Roger McNeill, as assignee of a judgment debt obtained by Skeffington Thompson, against the appellant, as assignee of a judgment debt obtained by Sir Patrick Hamilton against the appellant's father, on the foot of two judgments obtained by the respondent against the appellant; and also on account of a legacy devised by Ann McNeill to Margaret, the wife of the respondent; and also on account of the rents of the lands of Sheeplands, Loughmoney and Carrowearland, which were thereby stated to have been applied in payment of the custodiam and eligis debts of the appellant, (the several claims according to the respondent's statement, amounting to £3000,) and reciting that the claims were disputed by the appellant; and further reciting that the respondent had agreed to accept £1500 in full of all demands against the appellant; it was thereby agreed, that the respondent, as assignee of the appellant, under the order of the 3d day of August then last, should enter into possession and receipt of the rents of the Ballylesson estate, upon trust, in the first place, to pay thereout £227 10s. yearly in manner therein mentioned, to the appellant Roger McNeill; and also a sum of [241] £120 as a maintenance for Catherine McNeill, wife of the appellant Roger McNeill, and her family; and after payment thereof, to apply the surplus rents and profits in discharge of the sum of £1500 with interest

The respondent Cahill was afterwards, on the motion of the appellants, removed, and the respondent Robert Grove Leslie was appointed assignee in his place.

The original bill in this cause was filed on the 6th of June 1808, by the appellants, and Charles Crauford, a trustee for the appellant Daniel, under a conveyance by the appellant Roger M'Neill, against the respondent Cahill. The bill (comprising allegations of most of the preceding facts) stated, that Roger the father was seised of an estate for life in several lands in Ireland and Scotland, which were by certain deeds respectively limited in remainder to the appellant Roger, etc.; that at the time of the appellant Roger's marriage, he and his father were tenants for life of the estates in the county of Down, and also of the Scotch estates, except the lands of Taynish in Scotland, which the appellant Roger joined his father in selling for payment of debts; that the estate was sold at an undervalue; but by a deed on record in Scotland, it was stipulated that after payment of the debts affecting the estate, the remainder of the purchase money should be vested in securities for the benefit of the appellant Roger and his family; that the lease of the Mountain farm was obtained by undue influence; that the will also was obtained from the father by undue influence; that the debts mentioned in the will had been paid by the father out of the purchase money of the Taynish estate; that the sale and conveyance of Sheeplands was fraudulently, and with-[242]-out fair consideration, obtained by the respondent Cahill from the appellant Roger M'Neill, while he was in a state of embarrassment as to his affairs, and ignorance as to his rights; that the debts, which formed part of the consideration, were the debts of the father; and that the agreement of 1801 was obtained in like manner, and in fact for the same consideration, the appellant Roger M'Neill, being at the time insolvent, and the respondent Cahill, his assignee. The bill, among other things, prayed a general account, including the purchase money of the Taynish estate; and that the conveyance of 1789, the agreement of 1801, and the lease of the Mountain farm might be set aside.

The respondent Cahill, by his answer, denied that the appellant Roger M'Neill joined in the sale of the Taynish estate, and alleged, that the father was seised in fee of that estate. He denied the existence of any deed settling the residue of the purchase money, on the appellant R. M. H. M'Neill and his family. He denied also the imputed influence and fraud in obtaining the lease, agreement, conveyance and will. He contended, that the consideration for the conveyance was full and fair; that the judgment owing to Gillespie, was on a bond given to him for costs and services in a suit relating to the Ballylesson estate, from which the appellant derived benefit; and that the consideration was immaterial, because it became by contract a charge on the appellant's estate; that the father paid Gillespie £1150, and other sums to other creditors. He denied that the debts so paid were the debts of the father; and represented that the appellant's solicitor took objections to the accounts when [243] furnished, which were answered, and the appellant acquiesced.

After this answer was filed, the appellants made an application for an injunction and receiver, which was refused.

On the 8th of August 1811, before the examination of witnesses, the appellants filed a supplemental bill, which stated the appointment of the respondent Cahill, as assignee, and his removal; that the life interest of the appellant Roger M'Neill, in the lands in question, had been sold and conveyed to the appellant Daniel M'Neill, by the new assignee; that Crauford was no longer a necessary party, and prayed the same relief as the original bill, with a few variations, not material to be stated.

In his answer to the supplemental bill, the respondent Cahill stated, that the motion for removing him from his situation as assignee, was unopposed, owing to the absence of his counsel on the circuit, and the circumstance of the appellant's solicitor having detained an affidavit on which he intended to oppose the motion, and that the Lord Chancellor, in that instance, acted solely on the principle of the propriety of dissolving that kind of relation between persons so deeply involved in hostile litigation. He admitted the receipt of £1209 3s. 3d. as assignee, and that he applied the same in payment of the debt due to himself, and did not pay any other creditor of the appellant Roger, because no other creditor had proved any debt against the insolvent's estate; and if any other creditor had proved, that his own were the preferable debts; that by an order of the Irish Court of Chancery, a sum of [244] £6000 was lodged in the Bank of Ireland, to answer the demands of the fair creditors of the appellant Roger McNeill, and by another order made in December 1814, the appellant Daniel undertook by his attorney, in open court, to pay to the respondent any sum not exceeding £6000 which should finally appear to be due to him.

A replication was filed to the answer to the supplemental bill, and issue being thereupon joined, the appellants and the respondents proceeded to the examination of witnesses, and publication having passed, the cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, on the 20th of May 1816, the same having previously stood over to give the appellants time to amend their bill, for the purpose of bringing the respondent Robert Grove Leslie before the Court.

The only points particularly urged at the hearing, were those relative to the purchase money of the Tavnish estate, and the sale of Sheeplands. In regard to the former, the appellants were not allowed to read the marriage contract of 1743, nor the inhibition of 1769, as they had not been put in issue by the pleadings, and no deed having been produced, showing the appellant's title to any part of the purchase money for the Tavnish estate, according to the allegations contained in the bill. The following decree was made:—

“ Upon reading the proofs, etc. and the defendant having offered to account, as on foot of the deed of the 17th of September 1801, in the pleadings mentioned, and the plaintiffs declining the same, it is this day ordered, adjudged and decreed, [245] that the plaintiff's bill in this cause, and all and every the matters and things therein contained be and the same is hereby dismissed, with costs, to be taxed against the plaintiffs.”

On the 26th of June 1816, the appellants presented to the Lord Chancellor a petition for leave to file a further supplemental bill, on the ground of the new matter therein alleged to have been discovered, after issue was joined, and also for a re-hearing. It was supported by an affidavit of the appellant Daniel.

In this affidavit the appellant Daniel, after referring to the settlement of the 15th of June 1743, states:—

“ That one part of the settlement was deposited in the proper office for registering deeds in Scotland, and the other part always remained in the possession of Roger the father.”

“ That he did not, nor did the appellant Roger, as he believes, know of the registry of the said deed, or the proceedings had therein, or any of them; nor did deponent, or the appellant Roger, get possession of the other part of the original deed, until after the death of Roger the father.

“ That his solicitor procured the part of the said settlement now in his possession, at the time of the commission, which was sped for the examination of witnesses in Scotland in this cause, in the latter end of August, and beginning of September last, and not before; and until that time, deponent, and the appellant Roger, as he believes, were ignorant of the precise nature of their rights under the said deed of settlement, of the 15th June 1743, and the inhibition of the 15th August 1769, and therefore the same were not put in issue, etc.

[246] “ That at the time of the said examination of witnesses in Scotland, it was for the first time, as he believes, discovered by the appellants, that proceedings were had in the Scotch Courts in 1768 and 1769, at the instance of Cromwell Price, and Elizabeth Price, otherwise McNeill, his daughter, for the purpose of obliging Roger, the father, to carry the trusts of the said settlement of 1743 into effect; and on the 15th August 1769, an inhibition containing a statement of the said deed or settlement, was obtained from the said court, inhibiting or restraining Roger, the father, from selling, alienating, or incumbering the estate of Tavnish: an attested copy of which hath been regularly proved in the cause.”

The appellant Roger McNeill, made no affidavit in support of the petition.

Upon the coming on of the petition, on the 26th June,

“ It was ordered, that this cause be set down to be re-heard: And further, that plaintiffs be at liberty to file a supplemental bill in aid of such re-hearing, for the purpose of putting in issue the settlement of 1743, and the inhibition of 15th August 1769, and the effect and operation of the same according to the laws of Scotland, relating to the said Tavnish estate, upon paying costs, etc.”

The above petition having been presented without any notice being given of it to the respondents, and the order having consequently been obtained by surprise, the respondent gave the appellants notice of a motion to set aside the said order, so far as the same related to the filing of a supplemental bill; and a motion was made accordingly, on the 10th of [247] July 1816, when it was ordered, that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to file a supplemental bill, unless in ten days cause be shown to the contrary.

The respondent afterwards filed an affidavit, in answer to the appellant Daniel's affidavit. In this affidavit the respondent, among other things, states:

"That the cause or suit instituted by Cromwell Price, as the trustee of Mrs. McNeill, and her children, mentioned in the affidavit of the appellant Daniel, in which suit the inhibition was obtained, was as deponent believes, after the time when the said inhibition was granted, heard, and the said Cromwell Price failed therein, as deponent believes, and thereupon the said inhibition was determined.

"That the appellant Roger must have been fully aware, before the commencement of this suit, of the marriage settlement of 1713, and of his rights thereunder; for in a document proved in this cause, given to deponent by the said Roger, in the year 1807, a few months only before the filing of the bill, and drawn up shortly before on the part of the said Roger; it being a statement of claims made by him against one Doctor James McNeill, express mention was made of the said settlement, and the rights of the said Roger, under the same, are alluded to therein: that it is further evident from this, that the said Roger was acquainted with the said settlement; because at the time of the execution of the deed of conveyance of the said Tavnish estate to the purchaser, he, in the presence of the deponent, refused to execute the [248] same, and said that he would not part with his claim to the said lands: and the said Roger, at the time when deponent was in habits of intimacy with him, which continued at intervals until the year 1807, used repeatedly to talk of recovering the said estate from the purchaser."

On the 20th July 1816, cause was shown against the last-mentioned order, on behalf of the respondent Cahill, grounded on his affidavit. The respondent at the same time read from the appellant's original bill a passage, in which he speaks of the receipt of £2000 by the respondent Cahill, as the portion of his wife, and to which his wife was entitled under the settlement of the Tavnish estate. A passage was also read from a letter of attorney, executed by the appellant Roger, and recited in a state of claims, which was delivered by the appellant to the respondent and proved in the cause, in which it is provided, that the attorney "shall pay the rents of Raplock during the life of R. H. McNeill, agreeable to and in terms of the contract entered into between the said R. H. McNeill and Mrs. Elizabeth Hamilton Price, my mother." References were also made to the interrogatories filed by the appellant, and the depositions of a witness in the cause, Walter Moir, who in answer to those interrogatories, stated, that his father was the agent of the appellant Roger, and that on his father's death, the deed of settlement, of the Tavnish estate came into his hands as executor, among other papers relating to that estate. The court on this evidence set aside the former order with costs.

Against the decree of the 20th May 1816, and [249] the order of the 20th July 1816, this appeal was presented on the 10th of February 1817*.

* On the 4th of March 1817 a petition was presented to the Lords in the name of the appellant Roger, praying that his name might be struck out of the appeal, and that the appellant Daniel might pay costs incurred thereby. On the 21st of March the respondent Cahill presented a petition, praying to withdraw his answer to the appeal, so far as, etc. On the 25th of March the appellant Daniel presented a petition, praying that the two former petitions might be dismissed.

The petitions of the appellant Roger, and the respondent Cahill, set forth instruments executed by the appellant Roger, purporting to be a disclaimer and release, on his part, of the matters pending in the cause, and empowering his attorneys, therein named, to appear and disavow the proceedings. The petition of the appellant Daniel, setting forth various circumstances, represented that the instruments were procured by misrepresentation, fraud and circumvention, and by advantage taken of the distress and embarrassments of the appellant Roger, who was at the time a prisoner for debt.

The Lords Committee, to whom the petitions were referred, reported their [250] For the Appellants, Mr. Wetherell, Mr. Heald.

If the deed of settlement of 1743, the inhibition and other proceedings in Scotland, were not sufficiently put in issue in the pleadings, to intitle the appellants to read evidence of them on the hearing of the cause, yet, under the circumstances, and especially considering that the respondent had full notice of the settlement, and those proceedings, and had actually received £2000 under the provisions of the settlement; and as also witnesses had been examined on both sides in the cause, relating to the title of Roger Hamilton M'Neill to the estate in Scotland, and his right to dispose of that estate, the Court ought to have allowed the appellants, by supplemental bill, to put in issue the deed, inhibition, and other proceedings in Scotland.

Independent of the several matters relating to the sale of the estate of Taynish, and the right of the appellant, Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, to an account of the produce, there is sufficient evidence in the cause to intitle the appellants to a decree for setting aside the conveyance of the 28th of May 1789, made by the appellant Roger to the respondent Cahill, as fraudulent and void.

The agreement of the 17th of September 1801, cannot be considered of any avail in a court of equity, the same having been made between an insolvent debtor and his own assignee, to the prejudice of the general creditors of the insolvent.

For the Respondents, Mr. Hart, Mr. Lynch.

It appears, from the circumstances stated in the affidavit of the respondent Cahill, from the reference [251] in the original bill, and the affidavit of the appellant Daniel, to the instrument releasing the £200, the portion of the respondent's wife, which instrument recited the marriage contract of 1743, and inhibition of 1769; from the interrogatories exhibited in the cause by the appellants, as to the marriage contract; from the circumstance of the settlement being in the hands of the appellant Roger's Scotch agent, Walter Moir, (a witness in the cause,) and his father, as well as other circumstances mentioned in his deposition; and from the deed of ratification of 1782, executed by the appellant Roger, to Colonel Campbell, the purchaser of the Taynish estate; that the appellant Roger must have known of the settlement of 1743, and the inhibition of 1769, or at least the former, long before the filing of the original bill. The settlement and inhibition were proved in the cause by the appellants. They must, or might therefore, have known of them before publication was passed. At the hearing of the cause, the appellants did not ask for leave to file a supplemental bill, for the purpose of putting those matters in issue in the cause, and suffered a final decree to be pronounced against them.

opinion that the cause ought to stand over, that the parties might proceed, in such manner as they should be advised, to have it determined by a competent jurisdiction, whether the power of attorney and release was binding on the appellants, or either of them, and whether the appellants, or either of them, were entitled to be relieved against the said power and release.

An order of the House having been made according to this report, a bill was filed in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, by the appellant Daniel, against the respondent Cahill and the appellant Roger, stating the circumstances of misrepresentation, fraud, and duress; and further, that the appellant Roger, having discovered the fact, had revoked the power, and by a subsequent deed authorized the appellant Daniel to prosecute the appeal.

The respondent Cahill having put in his answer to the bill, and the cause being at issue by replication and rejoinder, witnesses were examined, and publication passed; and the appellant Roger having also answered the bill, the cause was set down on pleadings and proofs, as against the respondent Cahill, and on bill and answer, as against the appellant Roger; and upon hearing, the instruments of disclaimer, and power of attorney, and an indenture of release of the 29th of October 1816, were declared fraudulent and void, so far as they affected the right of the appellant Daniel to prosecute the appeal in the names of the appellants; and it was ordered that the respondent Cahill should be restrained from using the said instruments on the hearing of the appeal, and that the appellant Daniel should be at liberty to use the name of the appellant Roger in prosecuting the appeal. The appellant Daniel was accordingly, on petition, admitted to prosecute the appeal.

Upon inspection of the affidavit of the appellant Daniel, on the ground of which leave was in the first instance given to file a supplemental bill, it will appear that the prior knowledge of the marriage contract of 1743, and of the inhibition, is not unequivocally, or in fact at all denied.

As the appellant Daniel has not shown, or even stated himself to be interested in the question as to the Taynish estate, the affidavit, so far as it related [252] to that estate, ought to have been made by the appellant Roger, and more particularly as from the age of the latter, and his having been conversant with the different transactions relating to the Taynish estate, which chiefly took place before the former was born, the appellant Roger was more competent to speak upon the subject of the affidavit. It does not appear that the appellants could gain any advantage by filing a supplemental bill, putting the marriage contract and inhibition in issue; since, if Roger, the father, had not a full power of disposition over the Taynish estate, the proper remedy of the appellant Roger is against the purchaser. If the appellant Roger were held to be entitled to recover against his father's estate, in respect of any part of the purchase-money, such recovery would be no bar to his remedy against the purchaser, and the estate of the father might ultimately become twice charged on the same account.

If the marriage contract were in issue in the cause, the appellant could derive no benefit from it, on account of the internal defects in the contract itself, and in consequence of his interference with the rents of the Raplock estate, during his father's lifetime, and now demanding a certain portion of them by his bill.

The respondent is released from all claims of the appellant Roger, in respect of the purchase-money of the Taynish estate, by a release and disclamation made by him in the Scotch suit in 1789, which suit had reference to that purchase-money.

The appellant Roger, has not by any proof of mistake, or surprise in the settlement of accounts of [253] 17th September 1801; or by excepting to any item, or showing any error in the same, or for any other reason, shown sufficient grounds for avoiding that settlement of accounts, which was made after full opportunity had been given to the appellant Roger, to investigate those accounts, a statement of the respondent's claims having been in the appellant's, and his attorney's possession, and under consideration for eighteen months, and after he had, in fact, investigated them, as appears by the objections delivered to some of the items in the statement, which was made with the advice and assistance of the appellant's own solicitor, and by a deed prepared by that solicitor.

When an account was offered to the appellant by the Lord Chancellor at the hearing, on the foot of the second agreement of 1801, it was refused.

At all events, as the respondent has shewn that he gave a full and valuable consideration for the estate, the sale of the laids of Sheeplands, Loughmoney, and Carrowearland, ought to be considered a valid sale, and ought not to be disturbed; and the more especially, after the repeated confirmations thereof by the appellant Roger, during an interval of nearly twenty years, between the sale and the filing the bill.

The appellant Roger, has shown no ground whatever for his impeachment of the lease of Dunseverick Mountain farm, and the same ought not to be disturbed.*

[254] The Lord Chancellor and Lord Redesdale, in the course and at the conclusion of the argument, made the following observations.

* Upon the several points discussed on the hearing of the appeal, see the following authorities: as to reading evidence of matters not put in issue by the pleadings, Clark v. Turton, 11 Ves. 240.—That evidence of a distinct fact, as a declaration by an auctioneer, cannot be read without an allegation in the record, *Smith v. The first settlement followed by the recovery, the uses of which are declared by the deed, is different in its limitations and provisions from the second settlement, and by the operation of the registry act, becomes void as against the second, which, although subsequent in date was first registered. It is material to consider whether the first settlement was not a fraud. It is admitted, that the whole income of the lands settled, did not exceed £234 per annum. By the settlement, the father is to take £500, the fortune of the intended wife. Then debts, to the amount of £1800 are to be charged on the (Dunseverick) estate, of which only £250 was the proper debt of the son; all the rest was the debt of the father only, or of the father as principal and the son as surety. After this provision, an annuity of £200 is to be paid to the son for present maintenance, and the residue is limited to the father for life, with remainder to the son in tail. It is clear from the statement of the rental of the [255] estate made in the respondent's case, not only that there could be no residue, but that there could not be enough to pay half the annuity provided for the son. The father of the intended wife is said to have been dissatisfied. No person in his senses could be satisfied with such a settlement. It was in fact no settlement at all; the whole nearly of the rental or value would have been swallowed by the provision for debts.

A second settlement is then made, to which the father is not a party, and this, it is contended, is a fraud against him. In fact, the whole transaction appears to have been fraudulent on all sides, the father deceiving the son, and the son deceiving the father. The first deed is a delusion upon the face of it: the son permitting the debts of the father to be charged on his interest in the estate, without adequate consideration: the annuity of £200 being postponed to incumbrances, which would almost exhaust the estate, can hardly be deemed a consideration. The debts of the son, which form part of the charge, might have been paid out of the portion of his intended wife. That portion was taken by Roger the father. It was paid to him by the bond of the wife's father, by collusion between the parties to the second settlement, to induce him to believe that the first settlement was in existence and operation, a device which was so far successful, that for many years afterwards he did not discover the registry of the second settlement.

Lord Redesdale, in moving judgment, after stating the facts of the case, proceeded to make observations to the following effect:

[256] The schedule to the indenture of settlement of the 15th of October, contained one debt owing by the appellant Roger M. H. McNeill, amounting to £250; the rest were properly the debts of Roger the father. According to the terms of this instrument, the debts charged on the lands amounted to £1800 principal money. The annuity of £200 payable to Roger the son, for maintenance during the life of the father, was an additional and subsequent charge. It must have been the understanding of the parties, that the estate was of sufficient value to satisfy the debts, to pay the annuity for maintenance, and leave a surplus. It is a very informal, ill-worded deed, but that is the effect of it, as the agreement of the parties.

The articles of the 25th of October were registered before the deed of the 15th of October, and the priority of registry, both in law and equity, gives a priority to the instrument so registered, though subsequent in date and execution. But the deed nevertheless binds the appellant Roger, as his agreement. So far as the two instruments are inconsistent, he is bound personally by the deed. The parties are responsible, therefore, by that their agreement for the debts mentioned in the schedule: they must be paid according to the trusts created for the purpose; and as the appellant Roger thus made his estate liable for the payment of those debts, so he became entitled to the benefit of that instrument as against his father, who thereby, as it must be intended, undertook that the estate was sufficient to answer the charge. Upon any other supposition the transaction would be unfair and fraudulent: for Roger the father, taking the por-[257]-tion of the son's wife, gives an estate inadequate to the purpose intended and professed. In consequence of such inadequacy, the limitation to the issue, for which in fact the consideration was given, might have been wholly or partially defeated. The parties, therefore, who executed, had, under this instrument, mutual demands, which were personal so far as it was inconsistent with the posterior settlement: the son to make good to the father the payment of the debts; the father to establish for the son the income thereby provided for maintenance, and the limitations to the issue.

Under these circumstances, Gillespie, the trustee named in the first indenture, took possession of the estate, and paid to the son the annuity of £200 provided by that instrument, but did not keep down the interest upon the scheduled debts, either of the debt of the son, or of those owing by the father and son jointly, in which the son was a surety for the father. In settling the accounts, the father was to be charged with so much of the debt as he did not pay out of the rents of the estate. The father had also paid money in discharge of the debts of the son; and the debtor and creditor account between them remained unadjusted at the period of the father's death.

Upon the death of the father, the respondent Cahill became entitled under the will, and in right of the father, as his executor, to demand the debt owing to his estate from the son. A claim for these debts was made in the year following the father's death. In the account stated by the respondent Cahill, he charges the son with the debt to Gil-[258]-lespie, and the interest upon it, amounting to £990; the whole of which, except £45, had accrued during the life of the father. Another charge, to the amount of £276 19s. 5½d. is made in respect of disbursements appearing by Gillespie's account. There is also charged a debt owing to Sir Patrick Hamilton, which was the debt of the father alone, with interest upon that debt to September 1788. The account contained other charges of sums with interest, which were the debts of the son discharged by the father. The last item in the account was the amount of a legacy, with interest, which was charged on the Newgrove or Ballylesson estate, of which the son became tenant for life on the death of the father, and as such bound to keep down the interest of the legacy. The whole charge in this account amounted to £4529 18s. 3d. which the respondent Cahill, as the executor of the father, demanded against the son. It is clear that much of this was no debt of the son. The interest upon the debts, for example, which accrued in the lifetime of the father, ought to have been satisfied out of the rents; but after paying the annuity provided for maintenance of the son, they did not produce sufficient to pay the interest accruing upon Gillespie's debt.

The demand, therefore, made upon Roger the son by the respondent Cahill, as executor of the father, was excessive. It rested upon insupportable charges, and he took no notice of the claims of the son upon the father, in respect of monies received by him from the purchaser of the Tainish estate. Admitting that the father was entitled to sell that [259] estate, he was answerable for the value. The son had affirmed the sale by executing the deeds: but this was a matter not in the contemplation, or not taken into the consideration of the parties at the settlement of the accounts.

Upon such a state of transaction between the parties, the respondent Cahill contracts with the appellant Roger the son for the purchase of Sheeplands. It is admitted that the consideration was not actually paid; but upon the conveyance, a receipt was signed by the appellant Roger, for the consideration, as part of the debt alleged, and in the transaction supposed to be due, from the son to the father. Whether it was really a consideration must depend upon the state of the account. The bill impeaches the transaction of the sale itself, but not on sufficient ground, supposing the purchase-money to have been, as alleged, a debt from the son to the father. Assuming the account to be correct, or the consideration actually paid, the transaction of sale was proper and fair.

The claim made by the son against the father as to the Tainish estate, is very imperfectly stated in the pleadings. The son, it seems, had at least a right to demand the value of the estate against the father.

It appears, that in 1791 the son became embarrassed, and was discharged under the Irish act 31 Geo. III. as an insolvent debtor. Various creditors had by process of law obtained possession of different parts of his estate; and several persons having been from time to time appointed assignees, the respondent Cahill finally became assignee of his estate and effects. After this appointment, a transaction of agreement took place between the respon-[260]-dent Cahill, and the appellant Roger, in which upon the old statement of account as to the debt supposed to be owing from the son to the father, to the amount of £3000, and an arrangement by which £1300 was to be accepted in full of the demand, it was agreed that the respondent Cahill should have the Ballylesson estate, to pay out of the rents and profits an annuity of £227 10s. to the insolvent, £120 to his wife, and then to apply the residue in discharge of the £1300 owing to the assignee himself.

This is a transaction which a court of equity cannot countenance or suffer on the part of the assignee of an insolvent debtor. It is a contrivance to provide for the family of the insolvent, and the assignee as one of his creditors, at the expense of the other creditors. On grounds of public policy, it is necessary to declare that such an instrument is void. It is a deed contriving a fraud against creditors, to which a trustee for them is a party.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellant Roger, to investigate the transactions between him and the respondent, to which fraud is attributed; but I do not enter into the question in that point of view. The bill prayed that various accounts might be taken; that the agreement and conveyance mentioned in the pleadings might be set aside; and a reconveyance. It is a very confused and inaccurate bill.

At the original hearing, which took place in 1816, it was objected that Leslie, who had in the meantime been appointed assignee, was not a party, and leave was given to amend the bill.

When the cause came before the Court upon further hearing, the deeds of 1743, being the settlement of the Taynish estate, and the proceedings in [261] Scotland, were offered in evidence. It was objected that there was no allegation in the bill to warrant the production of such evidence, and the objection was held valid by the Court. A petition was then presented, praying leave to amend the bill, or to file a supplemental bill, for the purpose of supplying the defect. The prayer of that petition was properly refused, and afterwards the bill was dismissed with costs.

The subsequent proceedings in the cause it is not material to state or discuss.

The appeal raises the question, what ought to have been done in the cause under these circumstances. When the hearing took place in the Court below, the respondent Cahill offered to account on the foot of the deed of 1801; that was an offer in affirmation of the deed. The Court held, that because the plaintiff, (the appellant Roger,) had refused that offer, the Court would not direct the account; but whether he accepted or refused, if the Court were of opinion that the deed of 1801 was binding upon the appellant Roger, it was the duty of the Court, without regard to the sentiments of the parties, to direct the account. On the footing of that deed, the respondent Cahill was clearly responsible in account; it is therefore difficult to understand why the bill was dismissed.

This is an error which makes it necessary for the Court of Appeal to interfere.

The effect of the transaction in 1777, was to constitute the father and son mutually and personally creditors and debtors to a certain extent. The father was bound to make good to the son the annuity provided by the deed, and the interest of the [262] debts charged on the estates; otherwise the deed was a fraud on him and the persons to take, subject to the charges. The issue of the marriage might have had nothing. According to the true intent of the deed of the 15th October 1777, the parties executing became mutually and personally debtors, so far as the deed could not have the effect contemplated or professed, by means of the estates conveyed.

At the date of the father's death, it is clear that the account was pending and unsettled. When that account came to be settled between the son and the representative of the father, the actual state of debts and credits on each side ought to have been investigated; whereas, all the debts were charged upon the son, and the son was not made creditor upon the estate of the father, for interest accrued in the lifetime of the father, and upon his own debts, which were charged upon the estate.

Omitting all consideration of the question as to the Taynish estate, it is impossible to hold, that the account so taken was fairly taken between them. In the account there are sums charged as paid by the father for the son. Great part of this demand was constituted by agreement between the father and the son, and looking at the will of the father, it is difficult to hold, that he intended these sums should be charged against the son as debts: the terms of the will raise considerable doubt as to that point. If there was any demand arising out of the sale of the Taynish estate, that was not taken into account in the settlement. The whole amount of the bond to Gillespie is charged in the account against the son, although £392 9s. 7½d. of the amount was not paid by the father, but by the son after his death. [263] So, as to the interest accrued in the life of the father, it was improperly, and not according to the contract between the parties, charged in account against the son. The case is the same as to the debt to Sir Patrick Hamilton. It appears, therefore, that an erroneous account is the foundation of all the subsequent transactions between the parties.

Justice requires that the account should be investigated, to ascertain how far the son was indebted to the father; and, considering the question as to the produce of the Tavnish estate, whether the estate of the father was not indebted to the son.

The account, which is the foundation, being erroneous, the subsequent transactions, so far as they depend on the account, must be subject to investigation. It will require much consideration in framing the order. The House must declare what was the true right between the parties when the account was settled and acted upon. The transaction of 1801, cannot stand. The case must be reviewed by the court below. There must be an investigation as between debtor and creditor. The question, as to the lease being, I suppose, of no value, was abandoned at the bar. As to the Tavnish estate, if the appellant Roger, has a right against the estate of the father to call for an account of the value, I doubt whether it can be admitted in this suit. If not put in issue by the bill, it cannot be the subject of decision here.

As to that part of the case, the bill may be dismissed, without prejudice to any other suit which the appellant may be advised to institute.

24o Julii 1820.

ORDERED and adjudged, that the decree complained of be reversed: And it is declared, that the deed bearing date, the 11th October 1777, making the tenant to the præcipe, and declaring the uses of the recovery suffered in Trinity term 1778, and the deed dated the 15th August 1777, purporting to be a settlement previously to the marriage of the appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill and Catherine Chambers, the father and mother of the appellant Daniel M'Neill, ought to be deemed personally binding, both upon the appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, and Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, father of the said appellant, notwithstanding the said deed of the 15th October 1777, was not executed by the said Catherine Chambers and Daniel Chambers her father, and was not registered until after the deed of settlement of the 25th October 1777, in the pleadings mentioned, was registered; but so far only as the said deed of the 15th October 1777, may be deemed just and reasonable, as between the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, and the appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, his son, attending to all circumstances: And it is further declared, that according to the true intent and meaning of the said deed of the 15th October 1777, the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, was entitled to have the debts mentioned in the schedule thereto, to which he was liable, charged on the estates comprised in the said deed, so far as the appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, his son, had any interest in such estates, after the execution of the said deed of the 25th October 1777; and the appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill was entitled to have the debts due from him, as stated in the said schedule, also charged on the said estates; and he was also entitled to the several annuities provided for him, and particularly to the annuity of £200 a year, provided for his immediate maintenance; and inasmuch as it appears that the rents and profits of the lands comprised in the said deed of the 15th October 1777, were inadequate to the payment of the said annuity of £200 provided for his immediate maintenance, and the interest of the debts stated in the schedule to the said deed, and thereby intended to be charged on the said estates, the said deed ought to be taken to have been so far entered [265] into by the said appellant, Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, under a mistake or misrepresentation of the annual value of such estates; and therefore, and inasmuch as the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, received the portion of the said Catherine Chambers, according to the terms of the said deed of the 15th October 1777, the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, ought to be deemed to have been a debtor to the said appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, his son, for the amount of such portion, so far as to give said appellant the full benefit of such deed on his part, both with respect to the said annuities and the payment of his own debts mentioned in the schedule to such deed: and the said appellant ought to be deemed a debtor to the estate of his father, the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, in respect of so much of the principal of the debts of his said father, mentioned in the schedule of the said deed, as were paid by his father, but not for the interest thereof, nor for the interest of his own debts mentioned in the schedule to the said deed, during the life of his said father, if any interest was paid by his father, but on the contrary, the said appellant ought to be deemed a creditor on the estate of his said father, for so much of all such interest as was paid by the said appellant: and the said appellant ought to be deemed to be a creditor on the estate of his said father, for so much of the interest of his own debts mentioned in the said schedule, which accrued during the life of his said father, as was not paid by his father: and that therefore the demand made upon him by the respondent Michael Cahill, as representative of the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, the father of the said appellant, ought to have been made accordingly, subject nevertheless to the question, whether on any other account the said appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill had any demand against the estate of the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, his said father: And it is further declared, that the demand made by the respondent against the appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, by which he claimed the sum of £4529 18s. 9d. as due from the said appellant to the estate of the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill deceased, for principal and interest, calculated to the 10th September 1788, was therefore founded on mistake, and that it appears to have [266] been erroneous in other particulars, independent of any question whether the appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill was entitled to make any demand against the estate of his said father, in respect of the money for which the estate in Scotland, called the Taynish estate, was sold: And it is further declared, that such question was sufficiently put in issue by the said appellant's bill, and by the answer of the respondent Michael Cahill to such bill, to warrant an inquiry, whether any part of the principal or interest of any of the debts, mentioned in the schedule to the said deed of the 15th October 1777, which were paid in the lifetime of the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, or after his death, was so paid out of the money arising by sale of the said Taynish estate: and whether what was so paid ought to have been demanded by the said respondent, as executor of the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, against his son the appellant: and also, whether the said appellant had, in respect of such money arising by sale of the said Taynish estate, such demands against his said father's estate, as were equal to, or might in any manner reduce the claim which the said respondent, as executor of the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, might otherwise have had against the said appellant: to the end that it might be ascertained, whether upon a just and fair settlement of accounts between the said appellant and the estate of his said father, the said Michael Cahill as executor as aforesaid, had on the 10th September 1788, a just demand against the said appellant to the amount of £4529 18s. 9d. or any other, and what sums of money: And it is further declared, that it does not appear that there are sufficient grounds for impeaching the sale made by the said appellant to the respondent, of the lands of Loughmoney, Carrowearland and Sheeplands, conveyed to the said respondent by the deed of the 20th May 1789, in the pleadings mentioned: but it being admitted, that the purchase money for the said estate was not paid, except by setting against the same the demands made by the respondent, as executor of the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, against the said appellant, but for which no discharge was then given by the said respondent to the said appellant: the said appellant ought to be deemed to have a lien on the said estate for the purchase money: and the said respondent ought to be deemed a debtor to the said appellant, for [267] so much of the purchase money, if any, as would not at the time of the purchase have been satisfied by the just demands of the said respondent, as executor as aforesaid, against the said appellant, and all other demands of the said respondent, at that time against the said appellant: And it is further declared, that the deed of the 17th September 1801, having been entered into by the appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, under the influence of the prior transactions between him and the respondent, and the said respondent being then assignee of the estates and effects of the said appellant, under the authority of an act for the relief of insolvent debtors, and such deed containing a contract on the part of the said

respondent, for the benefit of the said appellant, which was a fraud on the other creditors of the said appellant, who might have sought relief against him under the said act: It is declared, that the said deed of the 17th September 1801, ought to be set aside as fraudulent, with respect to the said appellant, and void on principles of public policy: And it is further ordered, that it be referred to one of the Masters of the said Court of Chancery in Ireland, to take an account between the said appellant and the said respondent, as executors of the said Roger Hamilton McNeill, deceased, the said appellant's father, according to the declarations hereinbefore contained, and to state the same as it ought to have been stated, according to the declarations aforesaid, on the 10th September 1788, the time to which the interest was calculated, according to the account set forth by the said respondent, in his answer to the said appellant's bill; and that the said Master do ascertain what sum, if any, was actually due from the said appellant to the estate of his father, on the said 10th September 1788: in taking which account, the Master is to have regard to the several declarations hereinbefore contained, and also to enquire whether any, and which of the debts of the appellant, paid by his father, were paid by his father with intent to create, by such payment, a demand against his said son, or with any other, and what intent: and the said Master is also to have regard to the claims of the appellant against his said father, in respect of the money raised by sale of the Taynish estate: And for that purpose it is further ordered, that the said Master do enquire what were the rights and interests of the said Roger Hamilton McNeill, [268] deceased, the said appellant's father, in the said Taynish estate; and whether the said appellant had, according to the law of Scotland, any demand against the estate of his said father, in respect of the money raised by sale of the said estate, and what was the nature of such demand: And it is further ordered, that the said Master do state the amount of the just demands of the said respondent, as executor of the said Roger Hamilton McNeill, deceased, against the said appellant, for principal and interest on the said 10th September 1788, and also on the 20th May 1789, the date of the conveyance of the said lands of Loughmoney, Carrowearland and Sheepland, without including any demand of the said appellant, in respect of the money arising by the sale of the said Taynish estate: And that the said Master do also state distinctly the nature and extent of the demands of the said appellant, if any, against the estate of his said father, in respect of the money raised by sale of the said Taynish estate, and all dealings and transactions respecting the same; and that the said Master do also state the just amount of the demands of the said respondent, as executor of the said Roger Hamilton McNeill, deceased, against the said appellant, on the said 10th September 1788, and also on the said 20th May 1789, taking into such account all demands of the appellant against the estate of his father, in respect of the money raised by sale of the said Taynish estate, so far as the same may extend to balance the amount of the just demands of the said Michael Cahill, as executor as aforesaid, against the said appellant: And it is further ordered, that the said Master do take an account of all dealings and transactions between the respondent, in his own right, and the said appellant, and of all demands of the said Michael Cahill against the said appellant in respect thereof, considering the said deed of the 17th September 1801, as null and void, and not binding on either of the parties thereto; and state the amount of the balance, if any, due from the said appellant to the said respondent, independent of his demands as executor: in taking which account, the said Master is to give the said appellant credit for so much, if any, of the sum of £3500, the purchase money for the Loughmoney, Carrowearland and Sheepland estate, as was not exhausted by any debt due from the said appellant to the estate of his said father on the 20th May 1789, the date of the con-[269]veyance of such estate: And it is further ordered, that the said Master do state such account between the appellant and the said Michael Cahill, in his own right, according to the direction aforesaid, taking into consideration the demands of the said appellant in respect of the Taynish estate; and also without taking into consideration such demands: And, in case the said Master shall find, on taking such account in either way, that the whole or any part of the sum of £3500, the amount of the purchase money aforesaid, was not on the 20th May 1789, due from the said appellant to the estates of his said father, it is ordered, that the Master do compute interest on the whole, or on the balance, as the case may be, at the rate of interest demanded against the said appellant on the accounts before directed: And it is further ordered, that the said master in stating the accounts between the said respondent in his own right, and the appellant, do give the appellant credit for such principal money and interest: And it is further ordered, that all further directions be reserved until after the said Master shall have made his report: And it is further declared, that the said appellant hath not by his said bill, sufficiently put in issue his rights against the estate of his said father, if any he has, with respect to the money arising by sale of the said Taynish estate, beyond the right to have such demands as may arise therefrom set against demands made against him as debtor to his father's estate, as hereinbefore directed: And it is therefore ordered, that the said appellant's bill do stand dismissed, so far as it claims any surplus of the money raised by sale of the Taynish estate, beyond the demands of the said Michael Cahill, as executor of the said appellant's father against the said appellant, but without prejudice to any suit which the said appellant may be advised to institute concerning the same.

SCOTLAND.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION (FIRST DIVISION).

JOHN GEDDES.—Appellant; ARCHIBALD WALLACE, for Himself and Partners.—Respondents [24th July 1820].

[3 Scots R.R. 593. See now Partnership Act 1890, sect. 2 (b). Cited in England v. Curling, 1844, 8 Beav. 129, at p. 133. Cp. Wallace v. Geddes, 1821, 1 Shaw, App. 42.]

The manager of a partnership concern, having a salary, with a share of the profits, according to a proportion of capital and stock not advanced by him, but assigned by way of nominal interest, (for the purpose of creating an addition to his salary, depending upon the contingency of the success which might be consequent upon his skill and industry,) is not a partner subject to loss in account with the other partners.

In such a case the manager is not liable for loss, although it is expressed in the articles of partnership that the partners (not excepting the manager,) are to be "subject to profit and loss," and although the manager signed the partnership books, joined in securities given by the partnership, and in most other partnership acts, including the advertisement for a dissolution; because it appeared, from the general structure, and all the provisions of the contract taken and construed together, as well as from the transactions between the parties and the conduct of the other partners, that the provision as to profit and loss was not intended to apply to the manager.

If it were so intended originally, it could not be enforced at the date the suit commenced, because the other partners, upon the dissolution of the partnership, and for many years afterwards, made no mention of the subject, and particularly as in a former suit between them and their manager respecting the amount of his salary, they omitted to make any claim against him as partner for a share of loss; and more especially as the Court below, and the House of Lords on appeal in that suit, estimated the salary on the supposition that [271] the manager was entitled to a share of profit as an addition to his salary, without being subject to loss, no mention or claim having been made on that subject, either in the original suit in the Court below, or upon appeal.

A partner may be liable for loss as to the creditors of the partnership, and not so as to his copartners.

The most positive expressions as to liability to loss, in articles of copartnership, may be controlled and superseded by transactions between the parties, the conduct of the copartners, and the special circumstances of the case, including non-claim, and inconsistent representations during a protracted litigation, which furnished occasion to make the claim if the right existed.

The transactions between partners may amount to a waiver of a written agreement, or evidence of a new agreement, different from written articles, provided those transactions show a probability, amounting almost to demonstration, that the articles were otherwise intended.

In September 1785, the firm of "The Glasgow Bottleneck Company," having lately purchased the concern in which the appellant was manager, retained the appellant in his situation, and agreed to allow him a fixed salary of £100 per annum, with a thirteenth share of the free profits of the trade, not requiring him to advance any capital.

Soon after the establishment of the bottleneck company, a proposal was made to them by "Hamilton, Brown, Wallace, and Company," manufacturers of flint glass at Verreville, Glasgow, to unite into one company; and in June 1786 a partnership was formed, which assumed the denomination of "The Glasgow Glasswork Company." The nature of the connection between the appellant and this company forms the subject of the present appeal.

The superintendence of the manufacturing department, both of the bottleneck and of the flint [272] glasswork, and the general management of the concern, were intrusted to the appellant. The mercantile and pecuniary transactions of the new company were directed chiefly by a committee, consisting of four of the partners.

The new company did not immediately upon their formation execute a written contract of co-partnership. In the mean time the committee held meetings for the purpose of conducting the business, and inserted their resolutions and orders in a sederunt book. The appellant attended them to receive instructions as manager and subscribed some of the minutes in the book.

The contract of co-partnership,* which was subscribed by the appellant, declares that the stock of the Glasgow glasswork company was to be £12,000; of which £8000 was to be advanced, and £4000 was to be borrowed. Eight shares were to belong to the partners of the bottleneck company; eight shares were to belong to Hamilton, Brown, Wallace, and company; and the appellant was to have one seventeenth share, without advancing any capital.

The article, by which this arrangement is made, is expressed thus: "Third, In the said capital stock of £12,000 sterling, the partners shall be interested in the profit or loss in the following proportions: viz. the partners under the firm of Glasgow bottleneck company eight seventeenths; and the partners under the firm of Hamilton, Brown, Wallace, and company, eight seventeenth [273] shares; and the said John Geddes one seventeenth share."

The ninth article provided, that "the company's books shall be balanced upon the 31st day of December yearly, and docketed in three months thereafter, beginning the first balance upon the 31st day of December 1787, when the company's free stock shall be ascertained, which shall then, and yearly thereafter, be subscribed by a majority of the partners in point of interest; and which docketed balance shall be held good and probative for and against all parties concerned."

The fifteenth article declared, that "although, by this contract, the said John Geddes is admitted a partner, and holds one seventeenth share in this company, yet it is expressly declared and understood to be under the conditions and restrictions more particularly specified in an agreement of this date, made and entered into between him and the company, and to which all the parties hereto bind and oblige themselves to conform."

The contract, towards the close, contains the following declaration: "That although, by the eighteenth and eleventh articles of the foregoing contract, certain rules and regulations are laid down for the payment of the shares of deceasing or bankrupt partners, yet, notwithstanding thereof, it is specially covenanted and agreed to by the whole parties hereto, that the stock or interest in this co-partnership of deceasing or bankrupt partners shall not be paid to their executors or creditors by this company, but that the same shall fall and devolve upon the remanent partners, of whichever [274] of the said Glasgow bottleneck company, or Hamilton,

* To avoid repetition, some of the provisions of the articles of copartnership, which are stated by the Lord Chancellor in moving judgment, are omitted here.

Brown, Wallace and company, they may respectively be partners: which respective companies shall be entitled to hold and enjoy the said shares, and settle with the executors or creditors of such deceasing or bankrupt partners, according to the rules of their own co-partnery."

The agreement, stated in the fifteenth article of the contract, was drawn up, but not signed by the appellant or the other partners.

This agreement, among other things, provided, 1st, "That the said John Geddes shall take the management and direction of the business of the company, for which he shall be allowed the sum of £100 sterling yearly out of the company's stock during his management, besides his one seventeenth share of the profits or loss arising from the business, if any be, as likewise the house usually occupied by the company's manager, and coals and candles for his family: 2d, In consideration of which the said John Geddes shall devote his whole time and attention to the affairs and business of the company, and keep such regular books and accounts as necessarily belong to the business of his department, and which shall be open to the inspection of the partners at all times: that he shall likewise engage or cause to be made all the pots necessary for the business: and in short, he hereby engages to do whatever else may be required of him for the interest and advantage of the company: that he shall at all times subject himself to such orders and regulations as a majority of the partners in [275] point of interest may think fit to give him; and he hereby further promises and engages, that he will not be concerned in any other trade during the time of his acting as manager for this company. 3d, It is hereby specially provided and declared, that it shall and may be competent at all times, to and in favour of a majority of the partners of the said company in point of interest, in case of difference, at pleasure to supersede the said John Geddes as manager, and to appoint another in his stead, upon giving him six months previous notice; or in the company's option, instantly to supersede him upon paying him £200 sterling; and likewise that the said John Geddes shall at all times have it in his power to leave the said company's service, on giving them six months previous notice; and in either of these events, of his being so superseded or leaving the company's service, he shall from that time cease to be a partner in the said company, and shall be obliged to assign over his share to the other partners, upon being paid the value thereof in manner after mentioned. 4th, In case the said John Geddes shall, during the subsistence of the before mentioned co-partnery, be superseded in the management aforesaid, his share shall be withdrawn by him or his assigns, agreeable to the balance struck immediately preceding his dismissal, which shall be payable to him or them in two equal portions, at the distance of three and six months from the time of his leaving the work, and settling with the company the accounts of his intromissions, with the legal interest thereof from the date of such [276] balance till the same is paid; and in the event of his death or bankruptcy during the currency of this agreement, his share shall be paid to his executors or creditors, at the times and by the proportions, and bearing interest in the same manner, as is mentioned in the contract of co-partnery itself of this date, in the article with regard to the death of any partner."

Part of the appellant's duty originally as manager, was to keep the books personally; but in September 1787, the minutes of the committee of management state, that as the appellant had too much to do, it would be expedient to get a man "who would take charge of the mercantile part of the business, such as the writing of letters, making out invoices, taking care that orders were properly and expeditiously executed," etc. so as to leave the appellant full leisure to attend to the manufacturing part of the business. In pursuance of this resolution, a clerk was employed to keep the books and attend to the mercantile part of the business, as an assistant to the appellant.

In the balance book of the company, where the balance sheets of each year were entered and docketed, were docketts dated 15th April 1789, 12th March 1790, 17th March 1791, and 3d April 1792; the three last were signed by the appellant, and express that the partners then "examined the books of the Glasgow glasswork company, kept by John Geddes," etc.

The capital consisted of buildings, tools, and stocks of manufactured glass, belonging to the two former companies, which were purchased or taken by the united company, according to inventories and [277] upon a valuation. To carry on the trade, money was borrowed on their joint bonds.

When the stock of the company was fixed, and the inventories and valuations made, accounts were opened in the ledger for the shares of stock belonging to the different parties interested. The plan being that the bottlework company and the flint glass company should rank as creditors on the funds and profits or losses; eight seventeenths of the stock were entered in a stock account to the Glasgow bottlework company; eight seventeenths to the flint glass company, Hamilton, Brown, Wallace, and Co.; and the remaining one seventeenth to the appellant.

A stock account was opened for him at the first valuation, crediting him with one seventeenth share of the stock, which then was £625. This sum was not advanced by Mr. Geddes, though credited to him in the stock account; there was therefore a second account opened, viz. a common stock account current, in which the preceding share of stock was stated to his debit.

In December 1788, upon a balance of the books, there was an apparent profit of £1475 10s.; but the balance book states, that as no allowance had been made for bad debts, and as the buildings were stated rather high, the company ordered a deduction to be made from the valuations of the whole, to the amount of £2626. This made a loss on the balance of 1788, of £1151 5s. 10d.; and Mr. Geddes' one seventeenth of that loss, £67 14s. 5d. is charged to his debit, but he did not sign the docquet, although he acquiesced in the arrangement.

[278] On the 28th of September 1790, a minute was entered in the sederunt book, dividing the shares into eighty-five parts, and mentioning the number of shares opposite to the names of each of the partners. Mr. Geddes' share is entered thus: "To John Geddes 5-85ths." His name is entered on the list like those of the other partners, after which the minute proceeds as follows: "In which proportions we declare ourselves to be interested, and to draw profit or suffer loss accordingly; and in case of the death or bankruptcy of any of the partners, the share of such deceased or insolvent partner shall fall in and belong to the company in general, agreeable to the manner as specified in the contract of co-partnery, in every respect, except in belonging to the particular company to which said partner originally belonged, which is hereby in so far altered. In witness whereof, etc."

This minute was signed by the appellant.

In 1790 the books were balanced. They showed a supposed profit of £1055 4s. 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.; and the docquet at this balance, which was also signed by the appellant, is in the following terms: "At Glasgow, the 12th day of March 1790: We subscribers, all partners in trade, buildings, and other effects contained in this and the other books belonging to the concern carried on under the firm of The Glasgow Glasswork Company, as kept by our partner, Mr. John Geddes, and the clerks under him; having examined the said account books and inventories, as made up to the 1st day of January last, find the same to be fairly stated, and brought to a balance, and that the profit for last year amounts to £1055 [279] 4s. 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. sterling, and the stock of said company to £9173 11s. 2d. sterling. We hereby order, that the £1055 4s. 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. sterling, profit for last year, be added to the amount of the stock, which makes it now amount to £10,528 18s. 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. sterling; and declare for ourselves, our heirs, executors, and successors, that in case of the death or bankruptcy of any of us before next balance, we are to draw our proportion of the foresaid funds according to the above balance, at the terms and in the manner specified in the contract of co-partnery."

The docquet entered immediately before the dissolution of the company, which is also signed by Mr. Geddes, was to the following effect: "At Glasgow the 3d day of April 1792: We, James Dunlop, etc. and John Geddes, all merchants in Glasgow, and partners in the business carried on here under the firm of the Glasgow Glasswork Company having examined the books of the said company (kept by John Geddes) from the 1st day of January 1791, to the 1st of January last, find the same to be fairly entered and stated, and brought to a balance as above, and on the thirteen preceding pages: that the capital of the company amounts to £11,166 10s. 5d. sterling, which belongs to the partners according to their respective shares, narrated in sederunt dated the 28th day of September 1790. That the property and debts belonging to the company amount to £23,387 1s. 8d. sterling, the debts due by the company amount to £11,778 1s. 6d. and the neat profit for said year to £412 9s. 9d. sterling. We hereby order that £53 9s. 7d. of the sum gained be applied to the credit of [280] the different partners, according to their respective interests, and the remaining sum of £389 0s. 2d. towards the credit of a sinking fund, to answer for bad debts and discounts: And we also agree, that in case of the death of any of us before the end of the contract, or winding up of this concern, that our heirs, executors, or assignees shall be liable to sustain any loss and entitled to any profit that may be applicable to the share of such deceased partner during that time. In witness whereof, etc."

In the year 1792, the Dumbarton Glasswork Company having made an offer to purchase the whole buildings and property of the company, it was resolved to accept of the offer, and to dissolve the company as at December 1792.

The minute agreeing to dissolve the company, is signed by Mr. Geddes as well as the rest of the partners. The advertisement published in the Gazette and other newspapers, with the subscription of the partners, intimating the dissolution of the company, had the appellant's name subscribed to it as a partner, and the minute of sale by the Glasgow to the Dumbarton Company was signed by Messrs. Wallace, Warrock and Geddes.

Immediately after the dissolution of the company the books were balanced on their prior transactions, when it appeared that there were nearly £19,000 of debts owing to, and upwards of £11,000 owing by, the company. Supposing the debts good, the loss upon the balance for that year would have been £2766 7s. 3d. which the partners by their docquet ordered "to be applied to the debit of the different partners stock accounts, according to their respective inte-[281]-rests at the first of January last: But (they observe) as debts to a considerable amount are still outstanding, and as the sum set aside as a sinking fund to answer for bad debts and discounts may not be sufficient, we cannot at present ascertain the exact loss upon this concern, and therefore we hereby agree, as mentioned in last docquet, that in case of the death of any of the partners before the end of the contract or winding up of this concern, that our heirs, executors, or assignees shall be liable to sustain what ever loss may be applicable to the share of such deceased partner at that time."

This minute was not signed by the appellant. Some time elapsed after the dissolution of the partnership, while the partners were employed in winding up their affairs. After the debts due to and from the company had been settled, it ultimately turned out that there was such a defalcation of funds, from the failures of persons indebted to the company, and other causes, that the partners, when interest was calculated on their respective balances, were subject to a loss.

In 1798, Mr. Archibald Wallace, one of the respondents, transmitted to the appellant a statement of accounts between him and the company, in which the appellant's share of loss is placed to his debit.

The appellant on the 10th July 1798, returned an answer, in which he said, that the company were considerably in debt to him; and in a subsequent part of his letter he adds, "I have nothing to do with the losses of the late Glasgow glasswork company. If they think otherwise, they must take what measures they can for making their claim effectual."

[282] During the period of his connexion with the Glasgow glasswork company, the appellant had occasionally drawn from the company's funds small sums for his subsistence. After he had quitted the service of the company, some further payments were made to him in liquidation of his allowances; but no conclusive settlement was made. The company insisted, that he had overdrawn the sum to which he was entitled; and that upon making up the books, it appeared that he was debtor to the company to the amount of £650 11s. 2d. being for payments made to him, after he quitted their service.

The claim which the company thus made against the appellant, to refund the money so paid to him, rested upon an assertion, that the appellant was entitled to no higher salary than £100 per annum. The appellant offered to consent to an adjustment of the amount of his salary by reference to arbitrators, which was accepted by the respondents, and two persons with an umpire were named.

The bond of arbitration submits all pleas, claims, and debates, "and debateable matter whatever, presently subsisting between the said Glasgow glasswork company and the said John Geddes, for whatever cause or occasion, previous to the date hereof; and particularly, without prejudice to the said generality, a claim made by the said John Geddes upon the said parties or partners of the said Glasgow glasswork company, for a certain sum of money to be allowed him for his management of the company's affairs, and extra trouble while he superintended their works, to the decree arbitral of," etc.

[283] In the pleadings under the submission, the claims of the parties were confined to two points; first, a claim for adequate salary on the part of the appellant; and secondly, a counter claim for advances made in cash and goods by the company to the appellant, after he quitted their service. These advances, after extinguishing a salary of £100 per annum, left a surplus of £602 9s. 8d. In a letter to their law-agent at Edinburgh, the company say, "the difference between the company and Mr. Geddes is chiefly, if not solely, a claim of salary for additional trouble."

The submission having expired without a decree, the parties had recourse to a court of law. The company raised against the appellant an action in the Court of Session in Scotland, in the name of Mr. Hamilton, one of the partners, as attorney for the rest, concluding for payment of £650 11s. 2d. with interest from 31st December 1792, the date at which the books were balanced. The above sum was the alleged surplus received by the appellant over and above the salary for six years and a half. The appellant raised a counter action against the company, concluding for payment of £911 3s. This action was founded on the claim of the appellant to be entitled to salary at the rate of £275 per annum.

After the cause had been brought into court, the appellant, in a letter to one of the partners, proposed a new reference, which was at last agreed to, and the arbitrators named and appointed.

In this second submission, the claims of parties stood as before. Archibald Wallace, acting for the [284] company, addressed to the arbiters two letters: in one of which he says, "The sum of £650 18s. 2½d. is the amount which the Glasgow glasswork company claim as due to them by Mr. Geddes, agreeable to account rendered;" in the other letter dated the 15th October 1796, he thus expresses the sentiments of the respondents, as to their rights: "We would wish to remind the arbiters, that the Glasgow glasswork company's claim against Mr. Geddes, began with the sum of £175 10s. 7½d. balance due by him on 1st Jan. 1792, agreeable to a state of the company's affairs at that time, signed by him and the partners." No claim for loss of capital was brought before the arbitrators, but in this, as in the former reference, the sole question was the rate of salary payable to the appellant. This submission also having expired without a decree, the cause was resumed in court. In the course of the pleadings, the company produced the copy before stated, of a contract between the company and the appellant, written on stamped paper, but not signed by any party. They alleged, that this was the contract which was meant to have been executed, to regulate the rights of the appellant, and that it was alluded to in the 15th article of the principal contract, already recited. According to this unsigned contract, the appellant was to have a salary of £100 per annum. The appellant denied all knowledge of the contract, and contended that he was not privy to it, and that it was not binding upon him.

The company in their pleadings further insisted, that in their books they had given credit to the appellant at the rate of £100 per annum, and that the [285] books must be considered as under his care, because he was the manager of the company. The appellant alleged that he kept none of the books; that they were kept by Stewart Telfer; that the hand writing of the appellant, except as a subscriber to some documents would not be found in the books; and offered to prove, that the books were kept by a clerk not under the superintendence of the appellant, but under the committee of management; that the appellant had never consented to the entries in question, which had been inserted by the direction of the managing committee, with a view to the final balancing of the books. Finally, the company contended, that the sum of £100 per annum was, in itself, a reasonable allowance as a salary to the manager of such glassworks, considering that the appellant was to obtain a share of the profits of the business in addition to his fixed salary. On that question of fact concerning the reasonableness of the rate of salary, the appellant joined issue with the company, and called for a remit to persons of skill and experience in the business.

By an interlocutor, dated November 13th 1798, Lord Craig, (Ordinary) found the appellant entitled to salary, at the rate of £120.

Both parties lodged representations to the Lord Ordinary against that judgment.

The Lord Ordinary having adhered to his judgment, both parties presented petitions to the whole court, and the case was remitted to persons acquainted with this branch of business, to report their opinion upon the merits of the appellant's claim for salary. The following judgment was afterwards pronounced: [286] "The lords having resumed consideration of the said petition for Gilbert Hamilton and others, with the counter petition of John Geddes of the 1st March last, with the remit therein of the 4th of that month, and reports made in consequence thereof by Messrs. William Tennant, John Niven, and James Smith, now lodged in process—Finds the said John Geddes entitled to an allowance, including all his claims for salary, extraordinary trouble, or for the expenses of entertainments in his house, at the rate of £226 18s. 5½d. sterling per annum, during six years and a half that he acted as manager for the petitioners Gilbert Hamilton and others; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly, to hear parties on any claims of compensation, and all other points of the cause, and to do therein as he shall see just."

The appellant acquiesced in this judgment; but the company presented a reclaiming petition, which was refused; whereupon the company appealed to Parliament.

In the printed cases of the company presented to the House of Lords, as appellants, in that case, the second reason of appeal is in these words: "The manager, as a partner, has a share of the profits; and, when the two glasswork companies were united in 1786, there was conferred on him a greater proportion of those profits than upon the other partners." It was added, they, "made Mr. Geddes's emoluments to a certain extent to depend upon their trade being profitable or not; for they made him a partner entitled to a share of [287] the profits, and they increased his share in 1786, instead of conferring on him a large salary."

The fifth reason of appeal declares, that Mr. Geddes (then manager) had a share of profits as a partner without capital, "which he accordingly received as the salary due to him."

The judgment of the Court of Session was affirmed in the House of Lords, and the cause returned to Lord Craig, Ordinary, to adjust the accounting between the parties. The appellant put into process a state, showing, that in terms of the final interlocutors of the Court of Session, affirmed in the House of Lords, he was creditor of the company to the amount of £401 3s. of principal, and he claimed interest on the arrears of his salary.

A new litigation now commenced in the form of objections, answers, replies, and duplies. Disputes were raised about the mode of charging interest, etc. and the company now brought forward a claim which had formed no part of their former pleadings, that Mr. Geddes must be liable for a share of losses sustained by the company many years before, to an extent sufficient to extinguish his claim of salary, and to turn the balance against him.

On the 13th of May 1806, Lord Craig, Ordinary, pronounced the following interlocutor: "Having considered the foregoing objections for Gilbert Hamilton, and the other partners of the late Glasgow glasswork company, defenders, with the answers thereto for John Geddes, pursuer, replies, and duplies.—Finds, that an interest account must be stated between the parties, giving each of them interest on the sums they shall appear to [288] be in advance; and, with regard to the plea of compensation for alleged loss, finds it too late to insist on this claim in the present process; and, before answer as to the other points of the cause, remits to Mr. Claud Russell, accountant, to examine the books of the company, and vouchers, and to report his opinion thereanent quam primum."

The action about the salary, after much further litigation, terminated in favour of the appellant, by a judgment, in June 1815 for his salary, with expenses.

In the meantime, in consequence of Lord Craig's interlocutor, refusing to allow the new claim for loss to be intermingled with the original action about salary, the company, in November 1808, brought a new action, concluding against the appellant for payment of a share of alleged losses said to have been sustained by the company. The sum of £512 9s. was claimed as the appellant's share of loss to January 1798, with interest from that date, and a further claim was made for posterior losses.

The appellant, on his part, raised a counter action, concluding for an accounting and payment of the share of profits due to him by the company, upon the supposition that he was entitled to receive a share of profits during those years in which no loss occurred.

The action, at the instance of the company, was brought in the name of Mr. Hamilton, one of the partners of the company; upon whose death, Mr. Wallace, another partner, became the pursuer. This second action also depended before Lord Craig, by whom a remit was made to an accountant, to inquire [289] into the state of accounts as they stood in the books of the Glasgow glasswork company, from 31st December 1797, five years after the appellant quitted the company, to 15th May 1813. The books had been kept by the respondent, Mr. Wallace, since August 1792. It was reported by the accountant, that the charge made in these books against the appellant, amounts to £1021 16s. 6d.

The actions about profits and losses, which had been conjoined, being remitted, upon the death of Lord Craig, to Lord Gillies, as Ordinary, he pronounced the following interlocutor: "Having heard parties procurators—Finds, that Mr. Geddes is liable in his share of the loss as a partner of the Glasshouse company; but that no part of the expenses incurred in the process, at his instance, for salary, falls to be stated as a part of the loss, but that the same must fall entirely upon the other partners."

Against this interlocutor, the appellant presented a short representation, upon which the following interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lord Ordinary having considered this representation, which does not state the merits of the case—Refuses the desire thereof, and adheres to the interlocutor complained of."

Afterwards, this interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lord Ordinary having again considered the representation, with the answers thereto—Refuses the desire of the representation, and adheres to the interlocutor complained of."

The appellant submitted these interlocutors to review of the court (first division), by petition; on [290] advising which, with answers, the following interlocutor was pronounced by a majority of one judge: "The lords having resumed consideration of this petition, and advised the same, with the answers thereto—They refuse the prayer of the said petition, and adhere," etc.

A new petition, and additional petition, were presented by the appellant; on advising which, the following judgment was pronounced: "The lords having resumed consideration of this petition and additional petition, and advised the same, with the answers thereto, and excerpts from the books of the Glasgow glasswork company, for both parties—Refuse the desire of the said petition, and adhere to their former interlocutors."

Against these several interlocutors, the appeal was presented.

For the appellant.

For the respondents.

In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor observed, that, when the stock account was first opened, the appellant was debited and credited for the same amount, or supposed value of stock, viz. £625; and asked, whether he was charged in subsequent accounts on the same principle? and whether it was a substantial credit, or only for the purposes of calculation? At first (he remarked) it clearly was so merely; and he put the further question, When afterwards the partnership credited the appellant with five eighty-fifths of the stock, whether they debited him, per contra, in the same fraction?

The Lord Chancellor also asked, Whether it was contended that the appellant was to have no salary, [291] if the loss in any one year amounted to a sum which would exceed his salary? or what he would receive if there was no profit? It was answered, that in both cases he would receive his salary; upon which answer the Lord Chancellor remarked, that in such view the other partners would be losers. He then added the following observations:

The Court of Session, in the former case, computed the salary on the supposition that the appellant was to have a share of profit as a partner, which appears from the dicta of Lords Balmuto and Balgraith. The declaratory clause provided, that on the decease or bankruptcy of any of the partners, their shares should devolve to the partnership to which they originally belonged, and of which the deceased or bankrupt parties were partners, paying an equivalent to their representatives. Now Geddes was no partner in either of those partnerships. Suppose he had died within six months, what could his representatives have claimed? In the former case my opinion was, that he was entitled to £—— a-year only as salary, and to no further remuneration, upon the ground that he claimed and was entitled to a share in the profits: nothing having been suggested or contemplated as to losses.

The Lord Chancellor, after stating shortly the judgments against which the appeal was brought, proceeded as follows:—

The question in this cause is, whether the Lord Ordinary and the court were right or not in finding that Geddes was liable, under the circumstances of the case, for his share of the loss as a partner. I observe, that when the judgment of the court was given, it was pro-[292]-nounced by what we are accustomed to hear termed by the bar, the narrowest possible majority, that is, two of the judges were of opinion that he was not liable for loss as a partner, three of them were of opinion that he was liable: and the question is, under all the circumstances of the case, whether that judgment is or is not right. It appears, that by an instrument, executed in 1786, this partnership was formed. Geddes had formerly been a species of manager in another glasswork concern; but when these two concerns formed one partnership, they executed this bond of co-partnership. It is entered into by Peter Murdock and several other persons, stating themselves to be all partners in the company carried on under the firm of Murdock, Warroch, and Co.: likewise, James Dunlop and several other persons, all partners in the company, carried on under the firm of Dumbarton Glasswork Company: the whole of the above, being now partners in the company carried on under the firm of the Glasgow Bottlework Company, on the first part: and Patrick Colquhoun and several other persons, all partners in the company at present carried on under the firm of Hamilton, Brown, Wallace, and Co. at Verreville, on the second part: and John Geddes, at present manager of the Glasgow bottlework company, of the third part.

In a case, in which the question is, whether Geddes was a partner, and not only a partner with respect to the world, but in what relation he stood as a partner with reference to this co-partnership, it is not immaterial to observe, that though he is unquestionably a partner to some purposes, yet he is treated, in the very descrip-[293]-tion of the parties to this instrument, as an individual of the third part, separate from those of the first and second parts. Then this instrument proceeds to state, that "whereas the said two companies have judged it to be for their mutual advantage to form a junction, and enter into a co-partnership together, for the purpose of manufacturing glass, in such branches as they shall afterwards think best for their interest; they have agreed, and they hereby do agree, to the following articles, as the fundamental rules and regulations of the said co-partnership, and which are hereby declared to be the conditions under which the said junction is made and this co-partnership formed, and which the whole partners bind and oblige themselves, their heirs, executors and successors to conform to and implement to each other: First, the firm of the company shall be, the Glasgow Glasswork Company, which shall not be used but for their behoof, and such manager only as they shall appoint shall have power to sign the name. Second, the said co-partnership shall continue and endure for the period of nine years complete, from the 1st day of June next, when the junction shall take place: and it is likewise hereby declared, that the capital stock to be employed therein by the partners shall extend to £12,000 sterling, two-thirds of which shall be advanced by the partners, according to their respective shares after-mentioned, and one-third may be borrowed, on the joint securities of the company." Now these words appear to me to be material to be attended to: "two-thirds of which shall be advanced by the parties, according to their respective shares after-[294]-mentioned, and one-third may be borrowed, on the joint security of the company." With respect to what thus appears to be advanced by this agreement among the partners, according to their respective shares after-mentioned, I have mistaken the facts of this case altogether, if I am not at liberty to state, that Geddes unquestionably (though in a sense a partner) could not be considered as one of those partners who was to advance any part of the two-thirds, according to their respective shares after-mentioned. I take it to be a fact, that Geddes was to contribute nothing of the capital: and it becomes material therefore to observe, that the words "the partners in this bond of co-partnership," must be construed, in reference to the subject matter of the clause in which it is used. The partners who are to contribute according to their respective shares, must be those partners who were to contribute some share of the capital, and Geddes was not to contribute any share of the capital.

These articles further provide, that "in the said capital stock of £12,000 sterling, the partners shall be interested in the profit or loss in the following proportions: namely, the partners, under the firm of the Glasgow bottlework company, eight seventeenths; and the partners, under the firm of Hamilton, Brown, Wallace, and Co. eight seventeenth shares; and the said John Geddes one seventeenth share." Under this clause, which is the third article in the bond of co-partnery, it is insisted, that Geddes was to be liable to loss as well as profit; and this is the clause upon which, in addition to docquets and entries in the books of the company, etc. the Court [295] of Session held, that he was not merely entitled to profit but liable to loss. Now, that these words do, in the most express terms, render him liable to loss, there can be no doubt, but you are to take the whole of this instrument together, and you are not only to look at the whole of this instrument together, but you are to look at the transactions of the parties; for, whatever may be the language of a partnership deed, the dealings and transactions among the partners may be such as to amount to distinct evidence that some of the articles in that partnership deed were waived by all parties, and that some of the articles in that deed were not to be considered as rules which should regulate the rights and duties of the partners. It becomes necessary therefore in this case, to examine accurately, not only the whole instrument, but what have been the dealings among these parties. With this view, it is material to consider the eighth article, by which it is provided, "that on the 1st of June next, each of the parties shall advance and pay in to the company's manager, their respective proportions of stock as before mentioned: in payment of which stock shall be reckoned the foresaid ground, houses, utensils, goods, materials, etc. as before specified, (the stock of goods at Verreville being always excepted); and in case the amount of the property, belonging to either of the said two companies shall exceed their respective proportions of stock, the overplus shall be repaid to them by the united company, by granting them bills for the same, payable in six or nine months, with interest thereon from the 1st day of June next, the date of the junction." [296] Here is another clause purporting to relate to all the partners, which can have no relation, as it seems to me, to Geddes, because he was not to contribute any part of this capital.

The fifteenth clause is expressed in these words, "although, by this contract, John Geddes is admitted a partner, and holds one seventeenth share in this company, yet, it is expressly declared and understood, to be under the conditions and restrictions more particularly specified in an agreement of this date, made and entered into between him and the company, and to which all the parties hereto bind and oblige themselves to conform." It is quite clear, from this fifteenth article, that Geddes was to be, in some sense, a qualified partner; in what sense and with what qualifications is to be collected from an agreement of even date; and, it will be in your recollection, that there was an instrument which Geddes firmly denied to be an agreement of even date, which the other parties asserted to be an agreement of even date, and the substance of which I shall have occasion to state.

This bond of co-partnership being executed, and this unexecuted agreement, either being or not being the agreement, meant to be referred to by the fifteenth article, the parties go on dealing in partnership from 1786 to 1792. It is undoubtedly to be looked at as a circumstance of evidence, that in several instances Geddes's name is put into securities given by the company as a body. He, acting as one of the partners in the partnership, is unquestionably a partner with respect to all the rest of the world; and from the circumstance of his joining in the securities, [297] (a circumstance that happens every day where a man is not a partner for loss), it must be admitted, that he was clearly and undoubtedly a partner as to the world for loss; but the question here is, whether he was a partner as between himself and his partners, for loss as well as for profit. He contends, that he was entitled to so much a year for salary, that he was likewise to have the inducement of sharing a seventeenth of the profits, if there were any profits; but if there were no profits, and the thing was on the whole a losing concern, that he was not to be liable, as between himself and his partners, to pay part of that loss. It struck me very early in the argument, as a very singular thing, if he was to be so liable; because if, as manager he was to have a salary, (put it so, that he was to have £100 a year as a salary;) and there was a loss in the course of the year of £1700, and he was to bear his proportion of that loss as between the partners, that proportion being £100, he could not get one shilling of his salary.

Similar difficulties run through the whole deed.

Without entering into particulars, I observe, that there was an end of this partnership about the year 1792, and it is reasonable to suppose, that, in the year 1792, when the partners were about to dissolve all connection with each other, they should have contemplated the obligations they were under to each other, and the demands they would have on each other.

The law, as I apprehend, is, that the transactions of partners are always to be looked at, in order that you may determine between them, even [298] against the written articles, what clauses in those articles will not bind them, provided those transactions afford a higher probability, amounting almost to demonstration. Taking that to be the law, it appears to me, notwithstanding all the difficulties which belong to certain transactions, which are stated as having taken place while the partnership existed between 1786 and 1792, that the transactions after 1792 are such in their nature, that, consistently with the safety and the interests of mankind, it is impossible to permit these copartners after those transactions, in my judgment, to say that Geddes was a partner with them for loss. Observe what those transactions are: Geddes brings them into court in 1792, demanding from them his salary; what do they do upon this? they refer the matter to arbitration—that arbitration goes off; they refer it to arbitration again—that arbitration goes off. He then brings an action in the Court of Session, in order to have his salary calculated, estimated and paid; the parties proceed in the Court of Session, until a judgment is obtained in that Court, that the appellant is entitled to such a sum of money. There is then an appeal to this House. In the petitions of appeal he is represented as a partner without capital,—those are the very words which are used in some of the petitions; and your Lordships affirmed that judgment of the Court of Session.

The first demand in any tenable form, that he should be liable to loss, was made in a suit instituted in the Court of Session, in Scotland, in the year 1807, that is fifteen years after this partnership was dissolved, and in the mean time, he was suing them [299] for the amount of his salary, a claim upon which they would have been entitled to have said: If you establish your right to this salary, you are, on the other hand, liable to us for so much loss; therefore, calculate it as you will, you cannot be entitled to demand any thing, or, at all events, not so much.

The first intimation of a claim upon him was in the year 1798, six years after the partnership was dissolved, when one of the partners wrote a letter to him, insisting that he was liable to losses in partnership. He wrote in answer: I was not a partner in capital, I am not liable. With that exception, they did not make a demand upon him, in a form in which he could resist it, until the year 1807, fifteen years after the partnership was dissolved; it appearing that, in the mean time, there were statements made out of the different proportions of the various shares, (amounting, I think, in the whole to eighty,) in which persons were supposed to have an interest in the stock, and his name never occurred in any one of them.

Now it is true, that during the existence of the partnership there are to be found doequets, there are to be found statements, and there are to be found writings, from which you would infer that he was a partner, both for profit and for loss. But looking at the whole of these entries, as he had no interest whatever in the capital, it is as impossible that many of those entries can refer to him, though he was a partner, as it is that some of those clauses in this instrument of co-partnery could refer to him. He was a partner capable of being dismissed at any time; he was a partner having no right to draw out any part of the stock, for he had [300] no stock in it; and therefore the terms which are used lead forcibly, according to my notion, to the conclusion, that though he was a partner, he was, in some qualified sense, a partner different from the sense in which the other partners were interested; and if he had thought proper to quit the partnership, if he had died, or become a bankrupt, the provisions, with respect to death or bankruptcy, could not have applied to him as they would have applied to all the other partners in this co-partnery concern; but, on the contrary, he stands distinguished from first to last in the nature of his interest.

In the course of dealings among men, there are a great many things done, some with more, some with less, regularity; some with more, some with less, irregularity; and men, before they quarrel, are much too apt to suppose they shall be set right easily when they happen to quarrel; but I wish to ask this question: How happened it, that if this partnership was dissolved in 1792, no special demand should be made upon the appellant, I say special demand, till 1807? fifteen years afterwards. The reasons they attempt to give in this case appear to me the most futile and ridiculous possible: They say, so long as the amount of his salary could not be ascertained, they had no reason to talk about losses; then, I ask, why did they, in the letter of 1798, talk about losses; and what signifies it, whether it was ascertained, if they had a single demand, which would extinguish, or pro tanto extinguish, that salary. It appears to me utterly impossible that that could be the reason on which they acted; but besides, they impute to him the receiving, as he actually did receive, some sums of money after he left the part-[301]-nership—they paid him sums of money after he left the partnership: and you will recollect in the former cause we had notices of that fact. If he was liable to losses for the partnership, and they contemplated them as due from him, is it possible they could have paid this, and not have demanded the losses?

The case has difficulties and peculiarities upon the bond of co-partnery itself. It has many difficulties and peculiarities with respect to an agreement, which is referred to by the fifteenth article of the bond of co-partnery; one of the parties having contended that a certain paper, unexecuted and unsigned, is that agreement; which is denied by the other party, the appellant. It is undeniable on the face of this bond of co-partnery itself, that he was to be, in some qualified sense, a co-partner; but then it is said, as this deed was never executed, he must be taken to be a partner in the sense in which other persons were; I say, that is impossible from some other parts of that deed of co-partnery; and with respect to the docquets and entries to which I have been referring, they admit of this explanation: that they must be taken to apply to those partners, and those partners only, who had part of the stock belonging to them, and who were to be dealt with, in case of bankruptcy or death, according to principles which do not apply to this person.

I say further, that if you had found unequivocal proof in the transactions, during the partnership, that he was to be considered a partner, liable to his share of profit and loss; supposing the articles, [302] clearly and unequivocally to express that he was to be liable to loss, he would, upon the construction of the articles, and by inference from his conduct, have been liable to loss; but even if the case did amount to that unequivocal proof, (which it does not,) the subsequent transactions might have so weakened and destroyed that proof, that you could not act fifteen years afterwards upon the effect of any such transactions as those. For the conduct of these persons, from 1792 down to 1807, is a conduct from which you would be authorized to infer that they never did, prior to 1792, or in 1792, draw those inferences from those transactions which they wish you in 1820 to draw from those transactions.

It is, therefore, on the ground of the subsequent transactions that I entertain the opinion very confidently, (I must say, at the same time, very humbly differing from the majority of the Court,) that no jury in this country could have been brought to find this man a partner on this suit, instituted in 1807; and therefore I move the House,—To find that Mr. Geddes ought not to be considered, as between him and his partners, as a partner liable to any share of loss; and, with that finding, to remit the cause to the Court of Session, to do in it what is right and consistent with that finding.

21 July 1820.

The Lords find the Appellant ought not to be considered, as between him and his partners, as a partner liable to any share of loss; and with this finding, it is ordered that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session, to do as is just and consistent with this finding.

[303]

SCOTLAND.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION.

RICHARD HOTCHKIS and JAMES TYTLER, Clerks to the Signet, designing themselves Trustees, nominated and appointed by the deceased Colonel WILLIAM DICKSON of Kilbucko,—Appellants; JOHN DICKSON, Esq. Advocate, now of Kilbucko,—Respondent [19th July, 1820].

[Mews' Dig. iii. 2036; iv. 158: Cited (arg.) in Stewart v. Stewart 1839, 6 Cl. and F., 911, at p. 953; and see Harvey v. Cooke 1827, 4 Russ. 34 at p. 54; and Stapilton v. Stapilton 1739, 1 Atk. 2 and 1 Wh. and T.L. C., 7th Ed. 233.]

A pursuer, asserting in an action of declarator a right as unlimited fiar of lands, has power to execute, and is bound by a deed of entail restricting his estate to a life-rent.

A transaction between parties dealing upon a doubtful question as to their rights, if it be not tainted with fraud, will be upheld, although one of the parties, being an advocate and brother of the other party, acted generally in the transaction as the legal adviser of the other party.

I. being seised of lands in Scotland, executes a deed, vesting the lands in trustees for sale to pay debts, and afterwards to manage the residue of the lands until, by accumulation of rents, they could purchase an equivalent in lands in the place of those which should be sold; and he directed that an annuity of £100 for life should be paid to D. his brother and heir at law, and a like annuity to W. the son of D.; and when the purposes of the trust should be accomplished, the trustees were to divest themselves of the estate in favour of such person as at that time might be the eldest son of D. and his heir; I. had never completed his title to the lands, and D. not being satisfied with the provisions of the trust, served himself heir to his father, passing by his brother I. and brought an action to reduce the deed of trust.

[304] A judicial sequestration of the estate was the consequence of this action, and other matters in litigation respecting the estate.

In order to settle all disputes, the parties interested, including D. and W. executed a deed, submitting all differences to the award of chosen arbitrators. The deed, among other things, empowered the arbitrators to determine "in what manner, to what series of heirs, and under what conditions, etc. the lands should be settled.

The arbitrators, by their award, directed that D. and W. should execute, as to the lands not sold, a tailzie and strict settlement in favour of D. in life-rent, and W. and the heirs male of his body in fee, whom failing, etc. with the clauses prohibitory, etc. contained in a scroll, etc. and particularly that the life-rent of D. should be charged with the payment of an annuity of £250 to W. which should be a real burden on the lands.

D. and W. executed a deed of entail accordingly; but D. refusing to deliver it, another deed of similar import was drawn up and executed by W. only, to whom the trustees executed a deed of renunciation and disposed the lands; D. having previously, by order of the arbiters, conveyed to the trustees upon his claim of right as heir, and to perfect their title.

The entail contained the usual prohibition against selling the estate.

Upon failure of issue of W. the lands by this new entail were limited to J. D. next brother of W. The entail was executed in 1776.

In 1785, D. being dead, and W. being in possession of the lands, and claiming a right, notwithstanding the entail, to sell for payment of debts, conveyed the lands to a trustee for that purpose; and the trustee having accordingly contracted with a purchaser, an action of declarator was raised by W. and the purchaser against J. D. and the other heirs of entail, concluding to have it declared that the lands were liable to the trust for the payment of debts, and the decree of the Court was according to the conclusion of the summons.

In the year 1808, W. being embarrassed and in debt, advertised all the lands, except one farm and a few parks, with the mansion, for sale. Whereupon J. D. remonstrated, and having threatened to prosecute, on behalf of himself and the other heirs of entail, a [305] declaratur of irritancy, a compromise was effected on the terms that a sufficient part of the lands should be sold to discharge the debts of W., and that of the lands remaining unsold, a new entail should be made, restricting the estate of W. to a life-rent, and giving to J. D. and the heirs of the former entail, estates in tail general.

In this transaction W. had no legal adviser but his brother J. D., who was an advocate, and had usually acted in that capacity towards W.

The deed of entail was drawn up under the direction of, and settled by J. D. It contained a recital of the former entail; a statement of former sales of parts of the lands by W. that he had thereby become liable to a declaratur of contravention of irritancy at the suit of J. D., but that he had agreed, for the accommodation of W., not to object to the sales already made, nor prosecute his right of action, on condition that W. would execute the deed; and upon this recital, W. thereby limited the lands unsold to himself in life-rent, and to J. D. in fee, and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to the heirs female of his body, etc.

This deed was accordingly executed by W., but he becoming again embarrassed and involved in debt, at the instance of his creditors, brought an action to reduce this deed of entail, on the ground of fraud, want of power, etc. The Court below held that W. had power to execute the deed, that it was delivered and irrevocable, that there was no legal ground to set it aside; and that it did not appear, from the tenor of the deed or collateral evidence, that W. was improperly or fraudulently induced to execute it.—This judgment was affirmed on appeal.

The object of this suit was to reduce a deed of entail, and annul a transaction which took place under the following circumstances:

In the year 1767, John Dickson, being seised of the lands of Kilbucko, executed a trust-deed in favour of the Earl of Hyndford and others, wherein [306] after mentioning the destination of the estate, he added a clause referring to a future deed which he meant to execute, "containing such other destination, and under such burdens, conditions, provisions, restrictions and limitations, as it may hereafter appoint to be therein inserted, by any writing under my hand." This purpose was not executed; for Mr. Dickson died suddenly, in the beginning of December, in the same year.

By the deed of trust, the trustees were directed to sell such part of the estate as might be necessary to pay the debts affecting it, and thereafter they were to continue their management, till, by accumulating the rents of the remaining part of the estate, they could purchase lands yielding a rent equal to the rent of the lands which might be sold. In the mean time David Dickson, the brother and heir-at-law of John Dickson, was to be allowed an annuity of £100; and a similar allowance of £100 was to be given to William, who was the original pursuer of this action, and then the eldest son and heir of David; and when all the purposes of the trust were accomplished, the trustees were to denude (divest) themselves of the estate, in favour of whatever person might be the eldest son and heir of David Dickson at the time. John Dickson, the maker of this trust-deed, bequeathed various legacies and annuities, and died considerably in debt, which rendered it probable that the trust would be of some continuance.

These circumstances induced David Dickson to serve himself heir to his father William, and thereupon raised an action of reduction for setting aside the trust-deed of his brother John, who had never [307] completed his titles to the estate. In consequence of this action, and other subjects of litigation respecting the estate, which occasioned a judicial sequestration, a plan was devised for submitting to arbitration all the matters in dispute between the parties interested in the estate.

The deed of submission empowered the arbiters "to direct what steps should be taken by the parties for denuding (divesting) the trustees, named by the said deceased John Dickson, of the lands, estate, and other subjects which belonged to him.

and for removing the sequestration thereof." It also empowered them "to appoint such parts of said estate or other subjects to be sold, as they shall think necessary, for payment of the debts affecting the same," etc.: also "to determine what provisions shall be settled on the younger children of the said Mr. David Dickson, and in what manner the same shall be secured;" and further, "to determine in what manner, to what series of heirs, and under what burdens, limitations, conditions, prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses, the said lands and estate, or what part thereof may remain unsold, shall be settled: and in general to determine and appoint every thing to be done, of or concerning the lands, estate, and other subjects, heritable or moveable, that belonged to the said deceased John Dickson, which the said arbiters, or either of them, in case of the death or non-acceptance of the other, or which the said oversman may judge fit and necessary to be done for the interest of the said parties, and a final and amicable settlement of their whole family affairs."

[308] Mr. David Dickson, as the heir-at-law, and his eldest son William Dickson, as the first expectant heir under the trust-deed, were, in point of form, the only persons named as parties to this submission, and who executed it; but the trustees required the approbation and discharge of every creditor and legatee upon the estate, which was to be obtained in consideration of David Dickson and his eldest son, jointly, giving new heritable securities; and at the same time conveying to a trustee the separate estate of Culter, etc. for the purpose of paying off the debts. In the second place, the direct sanction of at least the immediate substitute heirs under the trust-deed was required; and, in the third place, that the residue of the estate should be freed from debt, and completely secured by a strict entail.

Dr. Michael Dickson, who was a younger brother of David Dickson, and a creditor to a considerable amount, having refused to accede to the arrangement, in order to remove this obstacle, the respondent, with his younger brother David, and another person at the respondent's request, concurred in granting a bond to the trustees for a sum of £3000.

The preliminaries having been arranged, a decree-arbitral was pronounced, and the trustees executed a conveyance in terms of the trust. These deeds are both dated 11th August 1775, and refer to each other. The decree-arbitral, instead of the annuity of £100 allowed by the trust-deed, awarded to Mr. David Dickson the life-rent of the whole estate, subject to the charge of an annuity in favour of his son; and instead of the annuity of £100 to his eldest son, the sum of £250 charged upon the father's life-estate, was given to him during his father's life, and [309] upon his father's decease, an estate to him and the heirs male of his body. It contained the following finding as to the execution of a deed of entail:

"We having now considered the particular situation and circumstances of the estate of Kilbucko, and of the said Mr. David and William Dickson, and the several particulars relative thereto, which have been laid before us, and being desirous, so far as possible, to preserve for the family such parts of the estate as the situation of affairs will permit, etc. decern and ordain the said Mr. David and William Dickson, for their respective rights and interests, on or before the 1st day of October next, to execute a tailzie and strict settlement of the lands and barony of Kilbucko, in favour of the said Mr. David Dickson in life-rent, and the said William Dickson and the heirs male of his body in fee, whom failing, to the other heirs mentioned in a scroll of the said tailzie signed by us of the date hereof, as relative to this decree-arbitral, and with and under the whole conditions, provisions, clauses, prohibitory, irritant and resolute, contained in the said scroll: and particularly with and under this condition, that the life-rent right of the said Mr. David Dickson shall be burdened with the payment of a free annuity to the said William Dickson of £250 sterling money yearly, at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment at the term of Martinmas next, for the half-year preceding, and so to continue during the life of the said Mr. David Dickson; and which annuity shall be a real burden upon the lands and estate contained in [310] the said entail: and the said William Dickson, in case the same is not regularly paid to him, shall have access to the rents of the said estate to the extent of what is unpaid, notwithstanding the life-rent disposed to the said Mr. David Dickson: but it shall be declared by the said entail, that although the said William Dickson shall have access to the rents of the estate for payment of the above annuity, yet that the by-gones of such annuity shall not be the ground of any adjudication of the property of the said entailed estate; and we decern and ordain the said parties to put the said entail upon record in the register of tailzies, and to complete the same by charter and infeftment, as soon as the same can be properly done."

The trustees executed their deed of renunciation and conveyance on the same date as the decree-arbitral, but it was not delivered till the entail was executed.

This deed of entail was executed by David Dickson and his son William; but David having previously executed an entail, which is still extant, refused to deliver up the new one.

In consequence of this refusal, some delay took place; and as the trustees would not give up their deed of renunciation till the entail was also delivered up, another copy of the deed of entail was prepared and executed by William alone, who, being formally the disponent of the trustees, was sufficiently in titulo to execute the entail alone. The deed was accordingly so executed. It proceeded expressly upon the decree-arbitral, and contained all the usual prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses, and was executed according to the statute 1685, ch. 22.

[311] John Dickson, who executed the trust-deed, not having completed his titles to the estate, the right of his trustees was incomplete, especially as David had served himself heir to his father, passing by his brother John. In order to remove this objection, David, by order of the arbiters, conveyed the lands to the trustees. The trustees then conveyed to William, and he, by order of the arbiters, executed the entail.

The entail contained the following provision: "It shall not be in the power of me, the said William Dickson, or any of the heirs of entail succeeding in the said lands and estate, to sell, alienate, or impignorate the same, or any part thereof, either irredeemably or under reversion, or to burden the same in whole or in part, with any debts, or any other burden, incumbrance, or servitude whatsoever."

The irritant clause, which is coupled with a provision, binding William Dickson and the heirs of entail to redeem adjudications or other legal diligence, is thus expressed: "In case of our failing to redeem accordingly, we shall forfeit and lose our right to the lands and estate above disposed, etc.; and with and under this irritancy, as it is hereby conditioned and provided, that in case I, the said William Dickson, or any of the heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before disposed, shall contravene the before written conditions, provisions, restrictions and limitations therein contained, or any of them, that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions, and each of them, or shall act contrary to the said other limitations or restrictions, or any [312] of them, then and in either of these cases, I the said William Dickson, or any other person or persons so contravening, shall, for ourselves only, amit, lose and forfeit all right, title and interest which we have to the lands and estate before disposed, and as such right shall become void and extinct, so the said lands shall devolve, accresce and belong to the next heir appointed to succeed, although descended of the contravener's own body, if capable to possess and enjoy the said lands and estate, in the same manner as if the contravener were naturally dead, and had died before contravention."

The concluding clause of the entail was in these words: "And lastly, I hereby authorize the said Mr. John Dickson, or any of the substitutes above named, to apply to the Court of Session to have this present tailzie judicially recorded, in terms of the act of parliament." The deed was accordingly, on the 13th of February 1776, recorded upon a petition by the respondent, Mr. John Dickson, the first substitute, and thereby completed, agreeably to all the forms which are required by the law of Scotland.

For several years after the trustees denuded, the respondent managed the estate as factor, both for his father, Mr. David Dickson, and for his brother William, who was the pursuer of the present action in the Court of Session. In March 1779, the pursuer went in the army to America, and the respondent then accepted from him a commission and factory, under which he managed all his affairs in Great Britain, both before the father's death, which [313] took place in 1780, and afterwards until the respondent's return at the peace.

In consequence of the embarrassment of his brother's affairs, and soon after his return, the respondent resigned the factory and commission. But previous thereto he raised an action before the Court of Session, under a power reserved in the deed of entail, for selling as much of the estate of Kilbucko as was necessary to relieve his brother from some debts which were a burden upon the entail. By the decree of the Court, in this action, it was found, "that the pursuer must lay out any surplus price of the said lands, when sold, at the sight of and to the satisfaction of the heirs of entail, in the precise terms of the said disposition and entail."

Upon the sale there was a surplus of £600 which was not applied in terms of the decree, but appropriated to his own use by William Dickson, who being involved in debt, soon afterwards conveyed the estate to John Loch, in trust, with power to sell the whole or part for payment of his creditors.

Under this power, a part of the estate was sold by Mr. Loch to a Mr. Cunningham. Whereupon an action of declarator was brought in the Court of Session by William Dickson, and Mr. Loch, as his trustee, to have it declared that they had power to make such sale; and at the same time, a bill of suspension was presented by Mr. Cunningham, the purchaser, to delay payment of the price until the judgment of the Court, as to the right of selling, was obtained.

[314] In that action the respondent was called with the other heirs of entail; but the suit, (as represented by the respondent), was entirely amicable, and the expense on both sides was paid by William Dickson. The information, in name of the heirs of entail, though it did not oppose the sale then contemplated, sought some security against further sales. The concluding paragraph was in these words: "Upon the whole, the defenders hope your lordships will be inclined to sustain the entail in question, even against the pursuer's creditors. But if, on the contrary, this fair, onerous, and necessary deed shall be found ineffectual against creditors, they trust that it will at least be effectual against the pursuer."

The information for William Dickson stated, that the question was not between him and the heirs of entail, but a question with his onerous creditors, viz.: "Whether this deed of entail may be considered a gratuitous or onerous deed in any question betwixt the pursuer and the heirs of tailzie alone, will not affect the present question, which is a case with the onerous creditors of the pursuer, who insist, by their trustee, that the onerous debts and deeds of William Dickson, the maker of the entail, must be effectual against his estate."

The summons concluded, "that it should be declared, that the trust-deed granted by William Dickson to John Loch affects the lands for payment of the debts therein mentioned, and other debts," etc.

[315] When the cause came into Court, in the year 1786, Lord Braxfield observed, "that the arbiters designed to bind William Dickson, but they did not take the right way. They should have restricted his right to a life-rent; for so long as he holds the fee of the property his debts must affect it." This opinion was adopted by the Court; and upon the acquiescence of the heirs of entail a decree was made, corresponding with the conclusion of the summons.

This decision was not satisfactory to the purchaser, who refused to pay the price unless a judgment of the House of Lords was obtained. Upon this objection, to avoid expense and delay, it was proposed, and upon conference agreed, that the respondent should concur with William Dickson in granting the disposition; and a conveyance also was granted to the purchaser of the whole of the remainder of the estate, in real warrandice.

In the year 1809, William Dickson, having incurred new debts, in order to relieve himself proposed to sell a further part of the estate: whereupon the respondent intimated to his brother his intention (on behalf of the heirs of entail) to prosecute a declarator of irritancy, which, though it might not prevent the sale then intended, so far as the interest of the creditors were concerned, yet would prevent any future sales, and in so far secure the interests of the heirs of entail.

At the same time the respondent made a proposal and offer to his brother, that if he would do what the [316] Court suggested in the year 1786, and which, agreeably to the opinion then given, ought to have been done at the original settlement of the family affairs in 1776, viz. restrict himself to a life-rent, the matter should be amicably settled without further trouble or expense. To this proposal William Dickson assented; and thereupon a transaction of agreement took place between the parties; the respondent, as next heir of entail, assenting to the sale of part of the estate for the sum of £6300 which was to be applied, so far as required, in payment of the debts of William Dickson, and the surplus was, by the agreement, to be invested upon the trusts of the entail. On the other hand, William Dickson agreed to execute a new entail, reducing his estate in the lands of Kilbucko to a life-rent.

The deed creating this new entail was drawn by John Dickson, writer to the signet, the nephew of the parties to the transaction, and under the direction of the respondent, who made in the scroll, as originally drawn, the marginal additions which appear printed in italics in the following clauses.

1. I bind and oblige me and my heirs and successors whomsoever, without the benefit of discussing them in order, to infeft myself in life-rent; for my life-rent use alienably; and the said John Dickson, and the other heirs of tailzie above-named, in fee, with and under the conditions, etc.

2. In the clause which provides against the lands being affected by debt, the words in italics were marginal additions in the hand-writing of the respondent. "Debts or deeds, legal or voluntary, contracted [317] or granted by me as life-renter, or by the said John Dickson as heir, or to be contracted," etc.

3. The last addition was in the irritant and resolute clause, which originally provided only for the case of heirs failing or neglecting to perform the conditions of the deed; the marginal addition was, "or shall act contrary to the said other limitations or restrictions, or any of them."

The draft was settled by the respondent, and transmitted to William Dickson; but the respondent had been his ordinary legal adviser, and he had no other adviser in this transaction.

This deed, which was shortly afterwards (1809), executed, proceeded upon the following narrative and statement of considerations, and contained limitations to the following effect:

"Know all men, by these presents, that I, Brigadier-general William Dickson of Kilbucko, considering, that by disposition and deed of entail, executed by me, dated the 27th day of January 1776, I gave and disposed, heritably and irredeemably, to David Dickson, my father, in life-rent, and to myself in fee, and the heirs male of my body; whom failzieing, to John Dickson, advocate, my first brother, and the heirs male of his body; whom failzieing, to the other heirs of tailzie and provision therein particularly mentioned, All and whole the lands and barony of Kilbucko, comprehending the lands and others therein and after mentioned, lying in the parish and regality of Kilbucko, and sheriffdom of Peebles, with and under the conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, exceptions, clauses prohibitory, irritant [318] and resolute, therein specified; that notwithstanding thereof, I had sold a considerable part of the said lands and estate, and have thereby become liable to a declarator of contravention of irritancy, at the instance of the said John Dickson, which he might now raise against me; but whereas he the said John Dickson has, for my accommodation, agreed not to object to the sales already made of part of the foresaid lands, for payment of certain debts contracted by me, nor to pursue any action of declarator or irritancy against me, upon condition of my granting the deed underwritten, for the purpose of preventing any further sales of what still remains of the estate: Therefore I have given, granted and disposed, as I do hereby, with and under the conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, clauses prohibitory, irritant and resolute, declarations and reservations after specified, give, grant and dispose, to and in favour of myself in life-rent, for my life-rent use alienably, and to the said John Dickson, my first brother, in fee, and the heirs male of his body; whom failing, to the heirs female of his body, the eldest always succeeding without division; whom failing, to the Reverend David Dickson, my next brother, and the heirs male of his body; whom failing, to the heirs female of his body; whom failing, to James Dickson, now James Randalson Dickson, my third brother, and the heirs male or female of his body; whom failing, to Elizabeth Dickson, my sister, and the heirs of her body; whom all failing, to the other heirs-substitute in the foresaid deed of entail, the eldest heir female always suc [319] ceeding without division; and excluding heirs portioners throughout the whole course of succession hereby established, heritably and irredeemably, all and whole," etc.

The deed contained an obligation to infeft procuratory of resignation, precept of sasine, and the usual prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses, against altering the order of succession, or burdening or alienating the estate. Upon this deed infeftment was taken by the agent of William Dickson, and recorded in the record of sasines.

In the year 1813, William Dickson again became embarrassed in his affairs; and being pressed by his creditors, and advised that the entail of 1809 was invalid, he raised an action to reduce that entail. At the same time, the appellant William Tytler obtained from William Dickson a minute of sale of the estate, raised an action of suspension against a threatened charge for payment of the purchase-money, on the alleged ground that the vendor could not give the purchaser a proper right to the estate, but in truth to try the validity of the entail; both which actions came before Lord Balgray, as Ordinary, and were conjoined.

On the 6th of July 1813, the following interlocutor was pronounced, "The Lord Ordinary, having considered the memorial for Colonel William Dickson of Kilbucko, charger and pursuer; memorial for James Tytler, writer to the signet, and suspender; defences for John Dickson, against the action of reduction at the instance of the said William Dickson: In respect that the pursuer and charger asserts and maintains, that he was unlimited fiar [320] of the estate of Kilbucko, and had the right of disposing thereof as he thought proper, Imo, finds that so far as he is concerned he had power to execute the deed of entail, dated 28th April 1809: 2do, finds, that the said entail is a delivered deed, and irrevocable; and that the pursuer has conveyed away the right of fee, and has restricted his right to that of life-rent alienarly: 3tio, finds, that no legal, just, or reasonable ground is assigned by the pursuer or by the suspender for setting aside the said deed: therefore, in the process of reduction, assoilzies the defender: and in the suspension, suspends the letters simpliciter, and decerns."

Upon a representation by the appellants, the Lord Ordinary again minutely considering the whole argument on both sides, pronounced a second interlocutor.

"The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this representation (the pursuers), with the answers thereto, and having also resumed consideration of the former papers in the cause, with the deed of entail 1809, and scroll thereof: In respect, Imo, that it does appear that the execution of the deed of entail 1809, was, under all circumstances, a measure highly proper, prudent, and expedient on the part of the pursuer: 2do, that it is admitted by the pursuer, that he voluntarily executed the said entail, and had power to do so; and that there does not appear, from the tenor of the deed itself, or any other collateral circumstance, any foundation for the allegation that the pursuer was improperly or fraudulently induced to execute said deed; and that the pre-[321]-sent proceedings seem to arise rather from a change of mind on the part of the pursuer, than the discovery of any facts attending the execution of the entail 1809: therefore, refuses the desire of the representation, and adheres to the interlocutor reclaimed against."

Upon a second representation by the appellants, the Lord Ordinary, on January 21, 1814, appointed informations to be ready in a fortnight; but in the mean time the minute of sale was renounced by a discharge, dated February 7, 1814. Whereupon William Dickson became nominally the sole party. By a deed, dated the 31st of January 1814, William Dickson conveyed to the appellants, as trustees, all his estate and interest in the matter in dispute, with power to carry on the action, or raise a new action in their own name, or in the name of William Dickson, or of his creditors.

By an interlocutor of the Inner House, dated June 2, 1814, "The Lords having advised the mutual informations for the parties and whole process: the suspension at the instance of Mr. Tytler being withdrawn, assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions of the actions of reduction, and find and decern in the terms of Lord Balgray's interlocutors of the 6th July and 16th November last, etc." By a second interlocutor (June 28, 1814,) a reclaiming petition was refused, without answers, and by a third interlocutor costs were given against William Dickson.

Soon after these judgments had been pronounced William Dickson, the pursuer, died in extreme pecuniary distress, having before his death given to [322] his creditors the power of prosecuting the suit then in process, by the trust-deed before mentioned, which was recorded in the books of council and session in Scotland, 9th February 1816, conveying his lands to the appellants, for behoof of his creditors.

The deed commences as follows: "Be it known to all men by these presents, that I, Colonel William Dickson, of Kilbucko, taking into my consideration, that upon the 24th April 1809, I was induced to execute a disposition and deed of entail of my lands and estate after mentioned, in favour of myself, in life-rent, and John Dickson, esquire, of Culter, advocate, my brother, in fee; whom failing, certain other heirs of tailzie therein mentioned, to my enormous lesion, as well as to the great injury of my just and lawful creditors; and that I have brought an action before the Lords of Council and Session against the said John Dickson, and the heirs substituted to him in the said deed, for setting aside the same on various grounds; and which action is now in dependence before Lord Alloway, as Ordinary thereto: And I being desirous to do every thing in my power for the benefit of my said creditors, and to enable them the better to set aside the said deed executed by me to their prejudice, and to obtain justice for themselves in the said matter, I therefore hereby give, grant and dispoise, to and in favour of Richard Hotchkis and James Tytler, writers to the signet, and the survivor of them; whom failing by death, non-acceptance, or otherwise, to any other person or persons who shall be nominated and appointed by the majority of my creditors in value, assembled at [323] a general meeting, as trustees, for and to the use and behoof of all my present just and lawful creditors, all and whole," etc. (the lands of Kilbucko).

After the powers usually conferred by such deed, it proceeds thus: "And for rendering the above-written disposition more effectual, with special power to my said trustees and trustee acting for the time, to insist in and follow forth, at the expense of me and my heirs and successors, the aforesaid action of reduction, or to raise such new actions as they shall be advised to prosecute against the said John Dickson, my brother, and all others concerned, and that either in my name, or in the names of themselves, as trustees aforesaid, or in the names or name of all or any number, or any one of my said just and lawful creditors, as they shall think most conducive for obtaining a avoidance and reduction of the said deed, and to employ agents and counsel, and to take all other necessary and lawful steps, at the expense of me or my aforesaid, for conducting to a termination the said questions at law."

The appeal was brought by the appellants as assignees in trust for the creditors of William Dickson.

On the part of the appellants the case was supported by the following arguments:

I. The deed is void, and of no legal effect, being vitiated in substantialibus. It purports to have been executed on the twenty-fourth of April 1809; but the word fourth is clearly written upon an erasure. Such a vitiation is laid down by authorities, and recognised in practice, as fatal to the authenticity of any deed in which it occurs. According to Balfour (page 371), "an instrument, charter, contract, obligation, or other writing, being rasit in any substantial part, as in name or surname, subscription of notar or party, is not authentic, neither could make any faith, albeit the parties offer him to prove by the witnesses instrumentar, or per comparationem litterarum et instrumentorum, ejusdem notarii, the said rasure to be restorit, and the said places to be filled by the notar himself."

To the same effect is the authority of Stair, in his Institutes, b. 4, tit. 12, sect. 19; who in the same passage states, that the date as to time, as well as place, is de substantialibus.

Erskine, in his Institutes, b. 3, tit. 2, sect. 26, speaking of the case of erasure and interlineation of deeds, says, "the presumption is, that they have been made after the grantor and witnesses had signed the deed, since no person is presumed to sign a blotted or vitiated writing."

In support of the same doctrine were quoted the following cases; Edmiston v. Sym and Skeen, July 1, 1796, Fac. Coll. No. 228, Mor. Diet. 1458; Bryce v. Dickson, Nov. 16, 1810, Fac. Coll. No. 6; Merry v. Howie, Feb. 6, 1800, Fac. Coll. App. No. 13, Mor. Diet. App. voce Writ, No. 3.

II. The deed in question is reducible on the ground of fraud, which appears from the mode in which the execution of the deed was procured, from the relative duty of the person by whom it was procured, and from its effect upon the interest of the parties.

[325] The deed in question was drawn out by Mr. John Dickson, junior, nephew of both parties, exclusively by the direction of the respondent. Its effect and import never were explained to the appellant by the writer; it was neither explained, nor any part of it read over at the time of signing it; and William Dickson was utterly ignorant of its effect, as even after its execution he considered himself proprietor of the estate.

The communication of the draft of the deed to Colonel Dickson was useless. The execution was required and advised by his brother, a lawyer, who had always acted as his confidential and legal adviser. This fact is admitted in various parts of the pleadings of the respondent, who seems to take credit for his exertions in that capacity. In fact, the respondent was the very person to whom he would have applied for advice, whether he should sign any such deed or not. Such was the character in which the respondent had, even by his own account, uniformly acted; and he cannot point out a single circumstance tending to show that he had renounced that character in this transaction. He cannot pretend that he ever suggested to William Dickson the propriety of resorting to any other professional person for advice as to the expediency of the deed. He took upon himself to advise his brother and client to execute a deed, by which, divesting himself of the fee of his own estate, he was made to convey the fee of that estate to his adviser, and to sacrifice to that adviser every right which the character of fiar could confer upon him. This is one of the cases where fraud is necessarily [326] implied. It is not enough for the respondent to say, as in the case of parties bargaining with each other, that the deed was executed without compulsion, and that the grantor must be held to have satisfied himself of its prudence and necessity. His responsibility extends farther. In his character of adviser, he is bound to substantiate the soundness of the advice by which it was procured, on pain of incurring the penalties of fraud or breach of trust. It is upon this admitted principle, that various acts, which, between unconnected parties, would be considered perfectly indifferent, are held necessarily to imply fraud on the part of agents, and other confidential persons, who may have derived benefit from those acts at the expense of the person by whom they are trusted. In this case, the brother and professional adviser of the disponent has converted the influence which those united characters conferred upon him, into the means of obtaining the execution of a deed in his own favour, and injurious to the grantor.

It is argued, that the deed under reduction, so far from affording any presumption of fraud, was in itself perfectly rational and proper; that William Dickson had, by the various partial sales, incurred an irritancy under the entail 1776, and consequently exposed himself to a declaratur of contravention at the instance of the respondent, the next heir under that entail. Accordingly, the deed under reduction states in its narrative, as the consideration of granting it, that William Dickson had exposed himself to such declaratur of contravention; and that the respondent had agreed neither to object to the sales [327] already made, nor to pursue any such action of declaratur. But the sales made by William Dickson were beyond the reach of any challenge at the instance of the respondent, and William Dickson was exposed to no risk of forfeiture at his instance. The validity of the sales, notwithstanding the entail 1776, was the subject of the action of declaratur in 1786, by William Dickson against the heirs of entail. It was decided in that case, that the debts contracted by William Dickson were good against the estate, and that the suspension offered by the purchaser, on the ground of the sale being challengeable, was unfounded. By that decision, the freedom of William Dickson from the penalties of contravention was established by necessary implication, otherwise his title to prosecute such an action could never have been sustained.

In the case of Stewart against Agnew (Mar. 3, 1781. Fac. Coll. No. 150, p. 235), decided in March 1781, upon the authority of which the respondent himself admits that the decision of 1786 rested, the inefficacy of an entail to warrant the infliction of the penalties of contravention against the entailer, though nominally subjected to the fetters, was unequivocally recognised. In that case the question at issue was, whether or not an entail imposing upon the grantor, as well as the heirs, restrictions against alienating and affecting with debt, fortified with the usual irritant and resolute clauses, was good against the creditors of the entailer? The Court found that it was not; and the ratio decidendi, as appears from the report, was the necessity, in order to exclude creditors, that the [328] right of the contravener should be resolvable, "in which case the statute directs the next heir of tailzie to serve himself heir to him who died last infeft in the fee, and did not contravene."

"A provision totally inconsistent with the predicament of an entailor imposing restraints upon himself." In short, the debts of the entailor were found in that case good against the estate, upon the very ground that there could be no effectual resolute clause against the entailor; or, in other words, no possibility of declaring a contravention against him, and voiding his right. Accordingly, this very reasoning was adopted in the pleadings for William Dickson, in the action of 1786. In the information presented to the Court in that action, it is maintained, on the part of William Dickson, that the statute 1685, in so far as it afforded a security against creditors, could not apply to the case of an entailor: it is argued (information for pursuer in action of 1786), that by that statute, "in case of contravention, the next heir of tailzie is directed to serve himself heir to him who died last infeft in the fee, which shows clearly that the right of the maker of the entail could not thereby be resolved, and yet no entail can be effectual against creditors, without a clause resolving the right of the person contravening."

Supposing that William Dickson had incurred an irritancy, and exposed himself to an action of contravention, the deed under reduction was itself in fact a gross act of contravention, as it effects a complete alteration of that order of succession which was secured in the former entail, by prohibitory, [329] irritant and resolute clauses, as binding as those directed against the alienations of the estate. By the former entail, the destination of the lands is taken to various substitutes, and their heirs male; while, by the new deed, the destinations are taken to the respondent and various substitutes, and their heirs general; so that the respondent's daughters are now called to that succession which was formerly limited to his sons; and secondly, there is an alteration of the substitution, by introducing the daughter of Mr. David Dickson into the order of succession before Mr. Michael Dickson and the heirs male of his body, who stood before her in the former entail. The new deed, therefore, completely perverts the order of that succession in which it is its proposed object to secure the descent of the remaining estate; and thus the deed, so far from securing William Dickson against actions of contravention, necessarily exposed him to such an action at the instance of any heir of the first entail who chose to insist in it. It affords no answer to this, that the new deed under reduction does not stipulate for the whole heirs of entail, and only bears, that John Dickson, the respondent, had renounced his right of action against the grantor; for it is perfectly obvious that the pursuer would not have abandoned his right of property in the estate to purchase the forbearance of one heir, if he had been informed that the very deed containing that abandonment placed him at the mercy of many other persons having an equal title to vacate his right, and of persons who had not only a title, but a strong interest to take that step, as the [330] interposition of the respondent's numerous daughters produced as effectual an exclusion of the succeeding substitutes from the benefit of the entail, as if the estate had been alienated altogether by William Dickson.

No professional person, unbiassed by interest, could have advised William Dickson to execute such a deed. Holding an estate in fee under an entail executed by himself, he had obtained, in a former proceeding, a decree against the heirs, finding the estate affectable by his debts; which decree appeared from the pleadings to have been pronounced on the very ground that there was no way of resolving his right. Could a professional person bona fide advise such proprietor to admit, without discussion, that he had incurred an irritancy by the sales taking place under that decree? Could he advise such a proprietor, by way of purchasing the forbearance of the first substitute, to execute a new entail, which instantly denuded him of the fee of the estate in favour of the first substitute, and at the same time infringed the order of succession of the former entail in favour of the daughters of that first substitute? When the first substitute, himself a professional person, and the legal adviser of the proprietor, is found to recommend and procure the execution of such a deed, the circumstances of the case afford, in legal contemplation, a presumption of fraud, fully sufficient to invalidate the transaction.

The bona fides of the respondent, founded upon his alleged conviction of William Dickson's liability to a declaratur of contravention, his repeated assertions that that liability was unquestionable, are con-[331]-tradicted by the tenor of the deed under reduction, and the proceedings which have followed upon it. If the respondent held it to be clear, that William Dickson was just as liable to the fetters of the entail executed by himself, as any of the other heirs,—how came the respondent to accept or act upon the deed under reduction? One of the clauses of that first entail provides, “that it shall not be lawful, nor in the power of the said William Dickson, or any of the heirs aforesaid, to alter the said tailzie and the order of succession thereby established,” and this prohibition is fortified by resolute clauses equally extensive. If the respondent, therefore, conceived it to be absurd to entertain a doubt of the efficacy of the prohibitions of that entail against the acts of William Dickson, the grantor, how did he accept as a valid and effectual deed, the deed now under reduction, which, by altering the order of succession, was just as gross an act of contravention as the former sales by William Dickson? But the respondent not only accepted the deed under reduction, but took infetment upon it, and actually holds the entailed estate of Kilbucko, as fiar under this new title. One of the clauses of the former entail, which the respondent affects now to consider as binding, is in the following terms: “Also that the said William Dickson, and the whole heirs of tailzie aforesaid, shall be obliged to possess and enjoy the lands and estate thereby disposed, in virtue of the tailzie before mentioned, and of these presents and infetments to follow thereon, and by no other right or title whatsoever.” So that at once the respondent must admit, that [332] he himself has incurred an irritancy, and forfeited all right to the estate, unless he assumes that very fact which he elsewhere declares to be absurd, that William Dickson was not bound by the limitations of his own entail, and had power to execute the deed: in which case he must a fortiori have had power to sell for payment of debt, without incurring a forfeiture.

The single ground upon which the respondent can maintain the validity of the deed under reduction is at variance with the truth of the narrative on which it proceeds. If he holds that the deed is good for any thing, he virtually admits that the former entail had no effect against William Dickson the grantor, that he had a right to alter the order of succession, and a fortiori the right to sell for the discharge of his debts; or in other words, the respondent declares, by his conduct, that he knew the narrative of the deed to be unfounded. The respondent, in answer to this alleges (Information for Defender, p. 37), that “when the deed in question was agreed upon, the parties had a full and deliberate conversation upon this point, and concurred in disapproving of every entail upon heirs-male, which is always absurd, and generally, at one time or other, attended with the worst of consequences. Though, therefore, the entail in 1776 was on heirs male, yet, as the great objects of that entail were now defeated, it appeared unnecessary, and even foolish, to adopt one of the most unreasonable things which it contained. Accordingly, with the pursuer’s fullest approbation, and by his own direction, the [333] entail was drawn in its present form, which, it is believed, is followed in all modern entails, which are not fettered by the restrictions of the old investitures.”

William Dickson denied that any such conversation had taken place; but if true and correctly stated, that conversation supports the argument of the appellants. The respondent’s defence of the prudence and propriety of the line of descent adopted in the new entail, is an evasion of that argument. The appellants refer to that alteration, not merely as an alteration in the respondent’s favour, but as showing that the respondent knew to be unfounded that assertion which he assigned in the narrative as the ground for William Dickson’s executing any deed at all. They refer to it, as showing that the respondent did not believe William Dickson to be bound by the fetters of the first entail, otherwise he would not have admitted an alteration of the order of succession, which invalidated the second entail, and endangered the right of the respondent himself and all the persons who were to take under it. The appellants do not complain of the respondent’s speculative opinions upon the absurdity of limitations to “heirs male;” but they maintain, as proof of fraud, that when the respondent was canvassing (as he admits, in the above passage, that he did,) the expediency of a new line of descent, he concealed from William Dickson that important fact, which he must have known and believed at the time, that upon the very same grounds which authorised such alteration, William Dickson was not liable to a declaratur of contravention, and therefore was not [334] bound, either in necessity or propriety, to grant any new deed, divesting himself of the fee of the estate.

This conversation, as described by the respondent, proves that William Dickson was misled as to the necessity of the new deed; that he was kept in ignorance of its real effect upon his situation; as upon the very grounds that he was authorized to alter the substitution, he must have been enabled to retain the fee without challenge, or dread of declaratur of contravention. If the great object of the entail of 1776 were so much defeated as to warrant a departure from its line of descent, why was William Dickson called upon to execute the new deed at all? And how can the respondent now, justifying that alteration by the authority of "modern entails, not fettered by the restrictions of the old investitures," plead bona fides, when he assigns in the narrative, as the reason for demanding from William Dickson the fee of his estate, that the restrictions of the investiture were in full force! From these circumstances it is clear that the respondent knew to be unfounded those pretended claims, which he assigns in the narrative as considerations for the execution of the deed. The transaction comes within the description given in our law books of those reducible on the head of circumvention. Stair, b. i. tit. 9. s. 9; Bankton, vol. i. p. 258. s. 62; Erskine, b. iii. tit. i. s. 16.

It was a deed injurious to the grantor, and procured from him by the grantee, his brother and legal adviser, either by the concealment of its real object, or upon pretences which, it appears from the [335] circumstances of the case, the respondent, the grantee, must be presumed to have known, and did actually know to be unfounded.

On the part of the Respondents.

The first argument pleaded in the name of William Dickson before Lord Balgray was, that the tailzie 1776 was still an obligatory deed, which prevented him from executing any new entail; but this was evidently inconsistent with the very basis of the pursuer's plea: and, accordingly, in Lord Balgray's first interlocutor, his Lordship, in "respect that the pursuer asserted and maintained that he was unlimited fiar of the estate of Killbucko, and had the right of disposing thereof as he thought proper, finds, that so far as he is concerned, he had power to execute the deed of entail, dated 21th April 1809." But, further, the right of the substitutes under the former deed, is now most effectually put an end to, in so far as founded upon the first entail; for it is evident, that if the last entail were set aside, then the whole estate was instantly alienated from the pursuer himself, and from every other branch of the family. It follows of necessary consequence, that none of the heirs of entail can have any right, because they have no interest, to challenge the present entail, independent of which there will remain no subject of any entail whatever, nor of any succession.

The question about William Dickson's powers being thus over-ruled, the appellants then had recourse to an allegation of fraud, which is also specifically repelled in Lord Balgray's second interlocutor. [336] It is said that the deed itself contained intrinsic evidence of fraud, particularly in two respects: first, because it reduced the right of William Dickson to that "of a mere liferent;" and, in the next place, because "it rendered the respondent himself the unlimited fiar of the estate, by omitting to impose the prohibition against altering the order of succession on him as the institute."

The latter objection is answered by reference to the entail, in which there is the following clause: "And with and under this restriction and limitation also, that the said John Dickson, and the other heirs succeeding to the said land and estate before disposed, are and shall be limited and restrained from doing or committing any acts, civil or criminal, and granting any deed, directly or indirectly, in any sort, whereby the lands and estate foresaid may be affected, adjudged, forfeited, or be any manner of way evicted from the heirs of tailzie, or the said order of succession be prejudiced or changed."

This clause, with all the other prohibitions and restrictions, is afterwards fortified by an irritant and resolute clause, in the following terms: "And with and under this irritancy, as it is hereby conditioned and provided, that in case the said John Dickson, or any of the heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before disposed, shall contravene the other before written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them; that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other limitations or restrictions, or any of them, then, and in either of these cases, [337] the said John Dickson, or other person or persons so contravening, shall, for themselves, amit, lose, and forfeit all right, title, and interest, which they have to the lands and estate before disposed, and such right shall become void and extinct."

The other prohibitory clause is in these words: " And that it shall not be lawful to, nor in the power of me, or any of the heirs aforesaid, to alter the present tailzie, and the order of succession thereby established, or to grant or do any act or deed which may import or infer any innovation or change thereof, directly or indirectly, in any sort."

It might no doubt be said, that the respondent is not an heir, but an institute, and that, therefore, this clause could not affect him; but the whole of this critical argument is obviated, by attending to the qualification added to the word " heirs." The heirs here mentioned are the heirs aforesaid; and, upon looking back to the preceding clauses, it appears, that the respondent John Dickson is expressly stated and considered as an heir. Thus, immediately after the dispositive clause, the prohibitory clauses are introduced as follows:

" But with and under the conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, clauses prohibitory, irritant and resolute declarations and reservations after written, but with and under these conditions always, that the said John Dickson, and the other heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate, shall be obliged to use and bear, and constantly retain, in all time hereafter, the surname of Dickson, title and designation of Dickson of Kilbucho: and with and under this condition, that I, during my life-[338]-time, and thereafter the other heirs of tailzie aforesaid, shall be obliged to pay annually the feu-duties, cess, stipend, and other public burdens and taxations to which the said lands and estate are liable."

When these clauses, in which it is unquestionable that John Dickson is described as one of the heirs, are connected with the words in the subsequent clause, " the heirs aforesaid," it is perfectly clear that the words " heirs aforesaid " include John Dickson as well as the other heirs in the previous clause. In every view, therefore, the argument, on which so much stress has been laid, proceeds upon a mistake in point of fact.

As to the argument for the appellants, concerning the restriction of W. Dickson's right to a life-rent:

In the memorial, which was the first paper for William Dickson, the following passage occurs:—" Although he admits the deed of entail, executed by him in the year 1809, to have been executed by him voluntarily, without any kind of compulsion, but merely at the request of, and to give satisfaction to his brothers and other near relations, yet he had not the most distant conception that the deed so executed by him was of the import and tendency, and was followed with the legal consequences which now, upon its being examined by persons of legal knowledge, turns out to be the case. He did not intend to deprive himself of those powers over his own property which belonged to him by law."

This passage consists of two different points, viz.: first, an admission as to the execution and pur-[339]-poses of the deed; and, secondly, an alleged misunderstanding of its import.

The first of these admits that the deed was voluntarily executed by the pursuer, in order to satisfy his brothers, and other near relations. But it may be asked, what satisfaction could it possibly give, if it did not restrain William Dickson from contracting debts, and selling the estate? And how could this be done, except by restricting him to a right of life-rent? By the entail of 1776, every restriction which was at that time thought necessary, or even possible, was imposed upon William Dickson, to prevent him from affecting or alienating the estate. And, according to the ideas which were then entertained of the law by the learned arbiters, and by every person concerned, that deed was completely effectual for the purpose. But after the decision in the case of Sheuchan ([2 Bl.] pp. 340, 341), which came to be applied to the present case, it was understood that the only way of securing the estate against William Dickson's debts was by restricting him to a life-rent. This, therefore, was necessarily the object of the deed 1809; and it was impossible that any thing less could give the smallest satisfaction to the relations of the family.

With respect to the second part of the paragraph, that W. Dickson did not know the import or the tendency of the deed which he executed, and that he did not mean at all to deprive himself of his powers over his property, no statement can be more inadmissible or absurd. It is said that he did not know the meaning or consequences of the deed, till it was examined by persons of legal knowledge; but, [340] he could not be ignorant of its meaning; for the very first sentence of the deed is, that it was granted "for the purpose of preventing any further sales of what still remains of the estate." Surely these words are too plain to require the examination by persons of legal knowledge to make the meaning understood.

It was further said, that the narrative of the deed itself was false, and that the respondent knew it to be so; because, being bred to the law, he could not suppose that W. Dickson, on account of any contravention of the entail 1776, could be challenged by a declaratur of irritancy. But this argument refutes itself. If the respondent had thought the narrative of the deed false, or if he had not, on the contrary, been fully convinced of the truth and justice of that narrative, he could not have agreed to let it remain as it is, because he must, in that case, have foreseen that it might afterwards give a ground of challenge.

The entail, though ineffectual against creditors, was perfectly valid and complete as to the obligation upon William Dickson, so that his contravening the prohibitions which were fenced by regular, irritant, and resolute clauses, necessarily laid him open to the challenge of any heir of entail who chose to bring an action of declaratur for that purpose.

Mr. Cunningham, the purchaser in 1786, was not satisfied with the decree of the Court, even to the extent of finding the estate affectable by the debts; and therefore refused to pay the price till the respondent concurred in granting the conveyance.

The decision in the case of Vans Agnew of Sheuchan in 1781, upon which alone, as a precedent, the deci-[341]-sion in the case of Kilbucko in 1786 proceeded, has been under appeal, and is remitted to the Court of Session, where it is again the subject of discussion; so that it is far from being improbable, that the decision will be reversed (it has been since reversed). At all events, the present case is independent of whatever may be the ultimate decision in that or any other, where the question is upon the rigid statutory effect of entails, in a question with creditors, and not upon the plain and equitable interpretation of the meaning of the deed, as to the parties themselves. If there could now be a doubt as to the personal obligations of the deed 1776, it would not follow that a transaction which took place where different ideas were entertained, is to be considered as unreasonable and illegal.

The arrangement upon which the present entail proceeded was not only a fair and rational, but even a favourable, transaction to William Dickson. If the case had been stated to any man of business, or of common prudence, in the year 1809, and the question put, whether it would be advisable for the General to run the risk of an action of declaratur of irritancy, by which he might instantly forfeit his right to the estate, as the irritancy was not of that nature which could possibly be purged? Or if he should execute a deed for securing the remaining fragment of the estate from being alienated, reserving to himself an entire life-rent, no person would hesitate to say that the last alternative should be adopted.

Supposing, for the sake of argument, that the [342] matter was still a point upon which there might be a doubt, yet even this hypothetical view, which is the strongest that can be put for the appellants argument, would by no means serve their purpose. A res dubia between any parties, and especially between parties so nearly connected, is the proper subject of a transaction which is well known to be one of the most favoured contracts in the law of Scotland. Lord Stair (b. 1. t. 17. sect. 2.) says, "Transactions may be interposed in the matter of all contracts; and it is itself a most important contract, whereby all pleas and controversies may be prevented or terminated; for thereby the parties transacting quit some part of what they claim, to redeem the vexation and uncertain event of pleas. It is, therefore, the common interest, that transactions should be firmly and inviolably observed, which, both by the Roman law and our customs, have been held as sacred and necessary for mens quiet and peace."

The respondent certainly never refused his advice to his brother when it was asked; and he may, without assuming any merit to himself, say, that his brother never had occasion to repent his following that advice. But, at the same time, the respondent did in no case pretend to dictate or direct his brother; and, in the present case, he was so far from stating what he did as a matter of advice, that he plainly and directly stated it as a matter of right, in which he was acting not as an adviser, but as a party.

It is argued, that the deed of entail 1809, instead of saving from a declaratur of irritancy, was itself a contravention which created an additional danger. But, in the first place, if the objection had any weight, it [343] would be entirely obviated by what William Dickson had done. By the debts he had contracted, and the sale he had made for payment of them, the subject would be completely swept away, in case the present entail were reduced, so that there would remain nothing to be lost by an irritancy upon the one side, or to be gained by a declaratur upon the other. It was therefore incompetent for any heir of entail to pursue such an action. A party having no interest can have no title.

In the second place, it is evident that after the contravention already incurred, by selling so large a part of the estate, the irritancy became altogether un purgeable, and of course no new irritancy, supposing such existed, could in this respect make the matter either better or worse with regard to William Dickson.

In the third place, it was observed, that the case was misstated by the appellants, when they supposed that the respondent undertook, for the heirs of entail in general, that they would not pursue an irritancy. The preamble of the deed expressly shows the contrary. It refers only to the declaratur of contravention and irritancy, "at the instance of the said John Dickson, and that the said John Dickson has, for my accommodation, agreed not to object," etc. The compromise was between William Dickson and the respondent alone; and though any challenge by remoter heirs was improbable, the respondent could not make, and therefore did not make, any engagement upon their part.

The deed of entail, made in 1776 in implement of the decree arbitral, was the only title on [344] which William Dickson possessed the estate of Kilbucho; and every condition which it contained was binding upon him. If the action of reduction, at the instance of David Dickson, for setting aside the previous trust-deed of 1767, had been successful, then he would have become unlimited fiar of the estate, and William would have had no right, excepting what David might please to give him, under the fetters of a strict entail. If, on the other hand, the action of reduction had been unsuccessful, then both David and William would have become mere annuitants for £100 each per annum. It was in consequence, therefore, of the arrangement under the direction of the arbiters, and by it alone, that David got the life-rent of the estate, burdened with £250 per annum to William, and that William got possession of the whole estate after his father's death. At the same time, the most essential part of that arrangement was the preservation of the estate by the entail then executed; and it was only upon the faith of that entail being completely effectual, that the trustees and the heirs substitute under the trust-deed consented to the arrangement taking place. The entail is accordingly ingrossed in the strongest terms that are known in the law or practice of Scotland; and although, in the amicable suit in 1786, it was found that creditors were not bound by any entail, in such circumstances, yet it was always held, that the maker of the deed himself was bound, by every legal as well as moral obligation, to observe it; so that the prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses, which are all expressly directed against him, must, upon every contravention, by contracting debts, selling [345] part of the lands, or otherwise, be the ground of declaring an irritancy, or forfeiture of his right, at the instance of the immediate, or even the more remote substitute under the entail.

Considering the situation in which matters stood at the date of the transaction now in question, there are the strongest grounds for the finding in Lord Balgray's interlocutor, adopted by the unanimous judgment of the Court, that "the execution of the deed of entail 1809, was, under all circumstances, a measure highly proper, prudent, and expedient, on the part of the pursuer." The repeated sales by which the estate had been dilapidated, were contraventions of the prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses of the entail 1776; which are declared to be binding upon William Dickson, as much as upon all the heirs of entail. If this were not the case, the whole proceedings under the plan, suggested and carried into effect by the arbiters, would have been a mere delusion for misleading and disappointing the trustees of John Dickson, and all the members of the family who were interested in the succession. It follows, therefore, of necessary consequence, that when a further sale was proposed in the year 1809, the heirs of entail, and particularly the respondent, as the first of them, might not only have objected to that sale, but, by a declaratur of irritancy, have turned William Dickson out of possession. It was therefore not only a wise and prudent, but a most favourable, transaction for William Dickson; because by it, not only the sale to Mr. Forbes was allowed to be completed, and the price thereof applied in extinction of his debts, but [346] the right of challenging or disturbing his possession given up during his lifetime. Supposing the matter to have been doubtful, it was a proper subject for a transaction between the parties; and transactions as being the most useful, have always been considered as constituting the most sacred and inviolable obligations known in the law. Stair's Institutes, book i. tit. 17. sect. 2.

The interlocutors appealed from, find that it is admitted by the pursuer, that he voluntarily executed the entail in question; and this is supported by what appears upon the record. For in the first memorial given in to the Lord Ordinary in name of the pursuer, his words are: "He admits the deed of entail executed by him in 1809, to have been executed by him voluntarily, without any kind of compulsion, but merely at the request of and to give satisfaction to his brothers and other near relations;" which admission, when joined to the foundation of the pursuer's plea, that he had full power to execute the deed, corroborates the validity of the transaction.

The mode in which the transaction between the parties was concluded was that which was suggested by the Court, in their opinion upon the action of declaratur in 1786. Though the Court then found, that the first entail in 1776 could not be effectual against creditors, yet they were clear that the intention of the arbiters, and of all parties concerned, was to prevent the estate being affected in any way whatever; and that in order to accomplish the object in view, the right of William Dickson, as well as that of his father, ought to have been [347] restricted to a life-rent. This they held to be the only effectual mode of restraint, while the party was allowed to continue in the right of the estate, and therefore there was but one of two alternatives; either immediately declaring an irritancy, or now restricting the pursuer's right in the manner which it ought to have been from the beginning, to a life-rent. This restriction, as being the most favourable as well as the most amicable mode of adjusting matters, was adopted, and the necessity as well as propriety of the plan was verified by what happened within a few years, and which gave occasion to the attempt then made for disposing of the last fragment of the property.

The allegation of fraud is unfounded: William Dickson possessed an acute natural understanding, had received a liberal education, and been originally educated to the profession of the law as a writer. It is therefore absurd to suppose that he did not understand the meaning of the deed, till it was examined by persons of legal knowledge. The inductive clause in the preamble of the deed, bears, that it was "for the purpose of preventing any further sales of what still remains of the estate:" Could William Dickson, reading such a preamble, be ignorant that this deed deprived him of the absolute power of disposing of the estate?

For the appellants:—The Solicitor General, (Sir Robert Gifford), and Mr. J. A. Murray.

For the respondents:—Mr. Wetherell, and Mr. Charles Warren.

[348] In the course of the argument, the Lord Chancellor, upon the citation of authorities from the civil law, recognised as the law of Scotland by Stair in his Institutes, (ante, p. 312.) De Transactione et Mota litis, observed, that according to all law, and upon principle, where there is fairly a doubt as to the rights of parties, and an agreement without fraud, it is binding; that in case of doubt as to legitimacy, as in Cann v. Cann (1 P. W. 723.), an agreement between claimants to divide the property would be valid. It might indeed, in the case under appeal, be a question, whether the parties dealt with equal knowledge of the subject.

The case of *Gordon v. Gordon (he said) stood on a different ground, because

* The bill prayed that articles of agreement executed by the plaintiff in favour there was a suppression of a material fact by one of the parties; viz. the private marriage of the father, which the defendant knew, and called a mere ceremony. But the force of the argument in that case was, that the fact, whatever its character might have been, should have been communicated at the time of the agreement. Such communication was held to be essen-[349]-tial to the fairness and validity of the transaction between brothers, on a question of rights depending upon legitimacy.*

This case was argued in the year 1819; and, having stood over from time to time for consideration, was affirmed in the year 1820, with no other remark beyond those made upon the hearing of the appeal, than that the Lord Chancellor had considered the case frequently, and with anxious attention, and upon the whole could not advise the House to reverse the judgment in the court below.

Judgment affirmed.

SCOTLAND.

SHERIFF'S COURT; AND COURT OF SESSION (SECOND DIVISION).

HUGH DUNBAR,†—Appellant; JOHN and THOMAS HARVIE,—Respondents
[21st July, 1820].

[Mews' Dig. vi. 598, 615, 642, 797. As to proof (i.) of entries in excise-books, see 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 53, s. 19; (ii.) of regulations, minutes, etc., see Inland Revenue Regulation Act 1890, s. 21.]

A court of justice cannot delegate its jurisdiction, and ought not to be guided by any foreign opinion upon a question of law, e.g. the admissibility of evidence.

The certificate of the secretary of the Board of Excise, as to the accuracy and effect of accounts in the books of the Excise, ought not to be received in evidence.

Whether accounts of stock kept in the Excise books are evidence between third parties, as to the delivery of goods? Quære.

Copies of such accounts may be given in evidence. Semb. on the ground that the originals are public books;—but in such case, the copies produced must be proved by a witness, who has examined them with the originals, and can swear to their accuracy.

Whether proof prout de jure of delivery of goods can be allowed, where, subsequent to the alleged delivery, written statements of account containing partial settlements have been delivered, containing no notice of disputed articles? Quære. Semb. that in such a case, where the dealing was between a publican and a distiller who kept the accounts, it requires strong evidence of delivery of the goods, to rebut the presumption arising from the accounts delivered.

of his younger brother, the defendant, J. G. who disputed the legitimacy of the plaintiff, might be cancelled on the ground of fraud. The original hearing was at the Rolls on the 17th December 1816, when an issue was directed upon the question of legitimacy. The re-hearing was at the Rolls on the 9th December 1817. This case will probably be further noticed in the Appendix to the present volume. There is a report (1 Swanston, 166.) of a collateral point decided in the case, but it is not otherwise reported.

† The form of pleading, and the conduct of causes in Scotland being a subject now under discussion, this case is reported more at length than is necessary for the purposes of the report, with a view to exhibit a familiar example of the ordinary course of litigation in Scotland, upon a question of fact, decided in the Court of Session before the passing of the Jury Court Act.

Whether the account books of the distiller in such a case afford a semi-plena probatio, and lay a ground for the oath in supplement! Quære.

The Court of Session having given judgment on the ground of evidence which ought to have been rejected, but some of which evidence was capable of being pro-[352]duced in an unobjectionable shape, and there being other evidence which might sustain the claim: on appeal against the judgment, the case was not remitted; but the judgment was reversed, on account of the small value of the matter in dispute, and the expense which a remit would cause.

The appellant, who was an innkeeper at Westmuir, was in the habit, during four or five years, of purchasing whisky from the respondents, who were distillers and spirit dealers "at Yoker."

When the goods were furnished, an invoice or account, specifying the quantity and price, was sent with them. The appellant's wife, who was unable to write or to read writing, was intrusted with the principal management of his business.

The respondents, when they received payments, marked them in the invoices, which was the only voucher or discharge for the appellant.

The transactions between the parties, which became the subject of discussion in the cause, extended from May 1808 to November 1810.

The first invoice or account proved in the cause, (and material to be stated) as delivered by the respondent to the appellant, is in the following terms:

" Mr. Dunbar,		To John Harvie,
1808,
May 3.	To balance per account rendered		£59	9 6
Aug. 24.	By cash		53	9 6
			£6 0 0

This balance of £6 was not noticed in the next invoice or account, which was in these terms:

" Mr. Hugh Dunbar,		Yoker, Aug. 27, 1808.
		Bought of John Harvie,
62	gallons malt aqua, at 13s. 6d.		£11	17 0
1808, Nov. 30.	By cash		11	17 0
		(signed) Tho. Harvie."

[353] The third invoice is in these terms:

" Mr. Hugh Dunbar,		Yoker, Dec. 5, 1808.
		Bought of John Harvie,
67	gallons malt aquavita, at 16s.		£53	12 0
1809, Mar. 15.	By cash		53	12 0
		(signed) Tho. Harvie."

The fourth invoice or account is in the following terms:

" Mr. Hugh Dunbar,		Yoker, April 1, 1809.
		Bought of John Harvie,
66½	gallons male aquavita, at 15s 5d.		£51	10 9
To balance of old account			20	12 0
			<hr/>
			£72 2 9
			<hr/>
			£15 2 9

At the foot of this account, in the hand-writing of one of the respondents, is the following jotting:

£51 10 9

The cash credited in this last invoice or account was paid to the respondents by the appellant's wife, and the appellant acquiesced in the charge, as made in the account.

Some months after the delivery of the account last stated, the respondents called upon the appellant to pay the sum of £55 12s. as the price of a hogshead of whisky, alleged to have been delivered at his house on the 2d of June 1809, which, through inadvert-[354]-ence, had been omitted in the statement of accounts. The appellant, denying that he had received the hogshead in question, and relying upon the accounts delivered by the respondents, as before stated, refused to pay the sum demanded; whereupon the respondents raised an action against the appellant before the sheriff of Lanarkshire, concluding for payment of £481 16s. 6d. contained in an account then produced, deducting therefrom the sum of £438 1s. 9d. paid in part, and credited in the said account, with interest and expenses. On this account a balance was claimed of £43 14s. 9d. which, with the addition of £11 17s. 3d. being a balance admitted to have been paid by the appellant, made up the sum of £55 12s. the price of the disputed hogshead of whisky alleged to have been furnished upon the 2d of June 1809.

The appellant, in his defences, having denied the receipt of the hogshead of whisky, both parties joined issue in the inferior Court, on the fact that the delivery of the hogshead of whisky alleged to have been furnished on the 2d of June 1809, was the only point in dispute between them, and created in the balance of accounts the difference already stated.

In this action the respondents craved that the appellant and his wife might be ordained to undergo a judicial examination; and also, that they should be ordained to produce the invoice of the seventh or disputed article of the account.

The appellant and his wife were accordingly ordained to undergo a judicial examination, but the appellant did not appear; and on the 22d May 1811, he [355] was held as confessed, and a decree pronounced against him. Against this interlocutor he was afterwards repone; and subsequently, his wife, Janet Dunbar, gave a judicial declaration, in which she declares, "That the declarant and her husband received the whole articles of aquaritar stated in the account, libelled No. 2 of process, at the prices therein stated, excepting article 7, of date the 2d June 1809, which she denies having received; and she always received invoices from the pursuers with the spirits furnished: That the declarant made no other payments to the pursuers than what is credited in the said account which has been read over to her: that any payments which the declarant made to the pursuers were always marked in the accounts by one of the pursuers, and declares she cannot write; and further declares, that any payments she made were done at Glasgow: That the declarant has produced all the accounts in her possession relative to the spirits in question, and she never received any account of the spirits mentioned in the disputed article."

The declaration of the defender, Hugh Dunbar, was eventually not required, on a statement made by him that his wife was the person who took the chief management of his public-house, and was better qualified than he was to give an account of the different articles received.

Upon considering the declaration of the appellant's wife, the sheriff pronounced the following interlocutor: "Having considered the declaration of the defender's wife, allows the pursuers a proof prout de jure of the disputed article of [356] the accounts, the defender of his defences, and to both a conjunct probation; and grants diligence and commission to the clerk of court to take the proof."

Against this interlocutor the appellant presented a petition, upon the ground that the memorandums which had been made at the foot of the different invoices, which he was in possession of, must exclude the admission of the proof which the respondents proposed to adduce, being parol evidence to contradict an account delivered in writing.

Upon advising the appellant's petition, the sheriff adhered to the interlocutor complained of, and in order that the appellant's case might receive full and complete discussion, he allowed the sheriff-depute's opinion to be had, after which, the following interlocutor was pronounced: "Having reconsidered the petition for the defender, and former procedure, and advised with the sheriff-depute, adheres to the sentence complained of."

After this interlocutor had been pronounced, the appellant advocated the cause to the Court of Session; it thereafter came before Lord Meadowbank as Ordinary, who, on hearing parties, appointed a condescendence to be given in by the respondents.

This condescendence was followed with answers. Upon advising which, Lord Meadowbank ordained informations to be printed, and laid before the Court. His Lordship at the same time issued the following note:

"Merchants accounts are put in, to a proverb, under 'errors excepted,' but after so many successive settlements as here occur, it seems to be a [357] novelty to allow an error to be established, as if every thing were open by entry in the pursuers books, and a proof, prout de jure, of the delivery of an article of great importance; this, however, is done by the Sheriff. It strikes the Ordinary, that, under the analogy of the statute (Scots Stat. of Limitations, 1597, c. 83), a proof of such error, posterior to settlements made according to the custom of the parties, ought only to be admitted by oath, or writ of the defender, if not detected on the face of settlements with the defender; for if this is required after the mere lapse of three years, à fortiori, should it be required where subsequent accounts have been rendered and settled, even though within the three years? The Ordinary thinks, however, that such a rule of practice, in a matter of such general importance, if not already adopted by decisions, ought to receive the consideration of the Inner House, rather than of a single Ordinary, before being entitled to his authority."

By the information printed in pursuance of the directions of the Lord Ordinary, the appellant insisted that such evidence as that proposed by the respondents was not admissible; and referred to the case, reported by Lord Kames in his Dictionary (ii. 135), of "Sir Walter Seton and Sir James Cockburn."

The respondents, in their information, argued, that the single point for the consideration of the Court was, whether the hogshead of whisky in dispute had been delivered to the appellant or not? And they pleaded, in point of law, that they were [358] entitled to establish this fact by parol evidence of their servants and clerks.

The respondents further contended that there was a difference between the case quoted and that in dispute, in the one the last account was signed by both parties, whereas, in the other, it was signed by only one of them; and that there were special circumstances in this case, which took it out of the general rule. They referred to entries* in their own books, and in the excise books, and other evidence which was contained in their information.† They further averred, and offered to prove, the actual delivery of the whisky in question into the appellant's premises, the Court below being of opinion, that this was necessary to make out their case.

On the 10th December 1813, the Court pronounced this interlocutor: "Upon report of Lord Meadowbank, and having advised the mutual informations for the parties, the Lords before answer ordain the pursuers to put in a condescendence, in terms of the act of sederunt, of the facts and circumstances which they aver and offer to prove in respect to the delivery of the whisky in question, and that quam primum."

The respondents accordingly gave in a condescendence, by which they undertook to prove,

Primo, That the cask intended for the whisky to be sent to Hugh Dunbar, and which he disputes, was cleaned, prepared, and filled by one of their workmen.

Secundo, That their clerk, who made the entries in the books, (already before the Court,) saw the [359] whisky measured, and saw it placed upon the cart.

Tertio, That the hogshead of whisky was actually conveyed to the house of Hugh Dunbar, and there delivered, along with the invoice and necessary permit, by the carters; who at the same time delivered a cask to Andrew Tennent, who lives a short distance farther, on the same road.

Quarto, That this permit was given up by Dunbar, in the usual manner, to the excise officer of the district, and was regularly transmitted to the permit examiner in the excise-office. It is proved by a certificate (see Appendix, p. 387), under the hand of Alexander Mitchell, permit examiner, that on the 2d of June 1809, a permit was granted for the removal of one cask, containing seventy-two gallons, aquarital, and was credited in Mr. Dunbar's stock in the excise books.

* See the Appendix. † See the Appendix to this case.

Quinto, That the excise officer of the district examined the stock in hand in Dunbar's cellar, compared it with the permit received, and made the necessary and usual return to the officer of the district, in whose books the disputed hogshead of whisky is accordingly entered. This is proved by certificate (see Appendix, p. 388), where the entry appears, "Hugh Dunbar, Westmuir, 2d June, seventy-two gallons."

Sexto, The excise officer on the 12th, and the supervisor of the district on the 28th of June 1809, examined and surveyed Hugh Dunbar's stock in hand; the latter comparing and checking off as correct the officer's survey. This is proved by a certificate (see Appendix, p. 389), subscribed by the supervisor, Alex-[360]-ander Williamson; and that there was in Dunbar's possession, "by permit, 2d June, seventy-two gallons aquarivae." And it is farther proved, that the excerpts contained in this certificate are faithfully taken from the excise books by W. Wintour, diary clerk, who farther certifies, that "the stock books from which these excerpts have been taken, appear to have been from time to time regularly examined and checked by the supervisor for the time, Alexander Williamson, then officiating in Glasgow, third district."

Lastly, this hogshead of whisky was regularly entered, as at "Dunbar's debit," throughout the complete and regular series of the excise books. This is proved by a certificate (see Appendix, p. 390), under the hand of Mr. Wintour, diary clerk.

The appellant, by his answers to the condescendence, pleaded, in limine, the incompetency of the proposed proof; and made the following objections to the admission of proof of the articles of the condescendence.

This article is wholly irrelevant. If there had been a particular cask, which could have been sent to the respondent only, and to no other person, the cleaning and filling such a cask with spirits might create a presumption, that it was at least intended to be sent to the respondent; but when the pursuers aver that the cask was prepared and filled by their workmen, they aver nothing specific, but what must occur with regard to every cask in their possession.

This article shows how far the pursuers can venture to go, in order to be allowed a proof. They [361] had no clerk at the time when it is alleged the whisky was sent, one of the pursuers having then performed all the duties of a clerk. That your Lordships may be enabled to judge with what view this article is stated, it is submitted, that the pursuers ought to name the clerk by whom it is asserted they will prove that the whisky was measured, and placed on a cart.

This article exhibits the same fallacy. For to induce your Lordships to believe, that several witnesses can be adduced to prove the delivery, the pursuers speak of the carters, though only one could have been necessary to take care of a single cart; and it is submitted, that they ought to say who the alleged "carters" are.

In point of fact, the defender states that no cask of whisky from the pursuers was delivered, either to himself or to Andrew Tennent, who is named in this article, on or about the 2d of June 1809; and your Lordships will observe, that if a fraud was committed by one of the pursuers carters, (which it will be shown he could easily commit), the proof proposed by the oath of the carter or carters is just a proof by the evidence of the perpetrator of the fraud.

No permit was given up by the defender to the excise officer of the district. The defender has explained in his condescendence, and repeats, that permits for the district in which he resides were, at the time in question, left in a house in Camlachie, without in general being seen by the persons to whom spirits were permitted, and were there received by the excise officer. The certificate by Alexander Mitchell, therefore, proves nothing; for though it [362] bears that a permit was granted, and credited in the respondent's stock on 2d June 1809, twenty such permits might have been given, and the quantities stated to account of the respondent, although not a drop of spirits had been added to his stock; for if the officer finds that the stock on hand of a dealer does not exceed the quantity stated, as permitted in the books, he has no occasion to inquire farther. It is only when there is an excess of stock above the quantity entered in the books as received by a dealer, that there can be any room for presuming illicit trade, and in that case the officer makes a seizure.

In point of fact, the proper officer of the district in which the defender lives, at the date of the alleged permit, was not James Cunningham, but — M'Vey. It will be observed, too, that though the pursuers firm is "John and Thomas Harvie," the entry in the certificate here mentioned is, "Thomas Harvie and Company."

This article, and the certificate, referred to in it, requires peculiar attention. First, when permits are granted, the quantity in them is always a little less than the quantity actually sent; and in proof of this the defender produces a discharged invoice from George Pinkerton, a respectable dealer in Glasgow, who furnished to the defender, on 25th of May 1809, sixty-six gallons of whisky; but the entry in the certificate, shows that the permit was only for sixty-five gallons. In the same manner, as the disputed article is stated at sixty-nine and one half gallons, the permit should have been a little less; but it bears to be for seventy-two [363] gallons. Secondly, by the certificate it appears, that on the 3d of April the defender had on hand twenty gallons; and on the day following sixty-five gallons were added to his stock, making in all eighty-five gallons. But on the 17th April, he had eighty gallons of stock on hand; or, in other words, he had only sold five gallons during the fortnight, between the 3d and 17th April. In the same manner, on the 1st May, he had seventy-five gallons on hand; and on the 15th May seventy gallons; thus showing regular sales of five gallons in each fortnight. On the 28th of May, the stock on hand was one hundred and twenty gallons; and if the defender had received the disputed cask, there would have been added to this stock sixty-nine and one half gallons, making in whole one hundred and eighty-nine and one half gallons. Now taking the usual rate of sales in a fortnight, being five gallons, the defender's stock on 12th June in that case would have been one hundred and eighty-four and one half gallons; whereas on that date, by the certificate, it amounts only to one hundred and twenty-eight gallons. In other words, on the supposition that he had received the cask in dispute, his sales for the fortnight preceding the 12th of June must have been fifty-seven and one half gallons; that is, more than eleven times the sales for each of the three preceding fortnights. Thus the certificate furnishes conclusive real evidence, that the disputed cask was not received by the respondent, and entered in his last stock.

Any quantity may be entered in the excise books as added to the stock of a dealer, without the risk of detection, although there has been no actual addition to his stock, all that is requisite being, that the [364] stock truly on hand shall not exceed the quantity which the excise books purport to have received into it.

On the 10th of March 1811, the Court pronounced this interlocutor: "Upon report of the Lord Justice Clerk, in absence of Lord Meadowbank, and having advised the mutual informations for the parties, with the condescendence for the pursuers, put in by order of Court, and answers thereto, advocate the cause, and before answer grant warrant for letters of incident diligence at the instance of both parties against witnesses, and havers, for proving the several facts and circumstances set forth by them in the said condescendence and answers, and allow to both parties a conjunct probation; grant commission to," etc.

Under the commission issued by virtue of this interlocutor, the following proofs were taken:—

Andrew Tennent depones, That though he was supplied with whisky by the respondents in the year 1809, "he cannot say whether he got spirits from them in the month of June in that year."

Daniel McFarlane depones, "That he has been about fifteen years in the service of John Harvie, and of John and Thomas Harvie, the pursuers. That for several years preceding the year 1809, and till Martinmas in that year, at which time the pursuers got a place of business in Glasgow, the deponent, and another man of the name of John Russell, carted all the whisky from the pursuers distillery to their customers. That he has on several occasions delivered whisky to the defender, and in particular about the middle of June 1809, as [365] the deponent thinks, he cleaned a cask at the distillery, and filled it with whisky for the defender; and he thinks the cask which he so cleaned would hold from sixty-six to sixty-eight gallons; that afterwards the deponent delivered the said cask of whisky at the defender's house in Westmuir, and his wife was present when the deponent so delivered it; that John Russell was not present when he so delivered it, but on the day of the delivery, Russell accompanied the deponent from Yoker to Glasgow; that the deponent had charge of one cart of whisky, and Russell had the charge of another cart; that after coming to Glasgow, the deponent and Russell delivered two small casks of whisky to James Taylor, in Blackford's Wynd; that after this, Russell and the deponent separated, and the deponent by himself delivered a cask to Robert McOmish, at the town-head of Glasgow; and after this, the deponent delivered the cask of whisky at Westmuir to the defender, as before deponed to; and while at Westmuir, he delivered another cask of whisky to Andrew Tennent, smith there; and when he so delivered the cask of whisky at the defender's house, he gave the invoice thereof, and permit, to the defender's wife; that, at this time, Alexander Nisbet, at Knightswood coal-work, acted as clerk to the pursuers, and kept the book in which the whisky delivered to the customers was inserted." He further depones, "That in general it fell under the deponent's department to clean the casks which were to be filled with whisky for customers; that the cask above deponed to was among the last which he cleaned for the defender: Depones, that there [366] was some person in the house besides the defender's wife, who assisted him to carry the cask through the house to a back cellar: but who that person was the deponent cannot say: Depones, that one of the grounds of his recollection of having delivered the said cask to the defender in the month of June, in the year aforesaid, is, that on the same day he delivered two casks to James Taylor, as before deponed to; and Taylor, on that occasion, said to the deponent and Russell, who accompanied him, that the day being very warm, he supposed that a bottle of porter would be more agreeable to them than a dram, and they took the porter accordingly: Depones, that on no other occasion does he recollect of having delivered on the same day whisky to Taylor, M'Omish, Tennent, and the defender.* That he can assign no particular reason for recollecting having cleaned this cask for the defender, but at the time when the said cask was sent to the defender, it was the deponent's duty to clean all the casks;" and being specially interrogated, "what is the reason for his specifying the cleaning of this cask in particular in the month of June: depones, that in consequence of the dispute about it, his attention had at different times been specially called to the period at which he delivered it." He then mentions a conversation which he had on the subject [367] with the respondent Thomas Harvie; and being specially interrogated, whether or not the conversation he had with Mr. Harvie is one of the reasons for his naming the said month of June, depones affirmatively; but says, "that Mr. Harvie did not mention to him the time at which the disputed cask of whisky was delivered." It appears also by the depositions, that Mr. Harvie, in the course of this conversation, having mentioned that the deponent on the same day delivered whisky to Taylor, Tennent, and M'Omish, he depones, "that although he had not been informed by the pursuer Thomas Harvie, or any other person, he should have recollected that on the same day he delivered, as before deponed to, whisky to all these persons."

John Russell depones, "That, at Whitsunday 1810, the pursuers (respondents) got a place of business in Glasgow; that, in the summer before they so came to Glasgow, he recollects, that he and M'Farlane came to Glasgow with two casks of whisky; that M'Farlane had on his cart two casks to James Taylor in Blackford's Wynd, a cask to Robert M'Omish in the town-head, a cask to Andrew Tennent in Westmuir, and a hogshead to the defender, while the deponent had on his cart a small puncheon of whisky to Glen and Company in Rutherglen, and an ordinary puncheon to Thomas Gibson in Calton: that M'Farlane and the deponent went together to Taylor's, who offered them a dram, but the day being warm, they preferred a bottle of porter; that M'Farlane wished the deponent to take from his (M'Farlane's) cart the cask for M'Omish, and to go with it to [368] M'Omish's, but this the deponent refused to do, as it was out of his way, and he had a heavier load than M'Farlane; that the deponent thinks that the said quantities of whisky were delivered in the month of June, in the year aforesaid, as he recollects that at that time he was employed on the farm in hoeing potatoes."

Alexander Nisbet depones, "That in the year 1809, and for several preceding years, he assisted the pursuers in keeping their books;" and an extract or excerpt being taken from the waste-book, and being compared by the commissioner, and found to be correct, the witness depones, "That the whole entries in the original waste-book contained in the said excerpt are in his handwriting." (Appendix, p. 384.)

* Taylor and M'Omish were not examined; and their names do not appear in the excerpt of the Excise stock-book printed in the Appendix, p. 388. But it does appear in the excerpt from the day-book of the Respondent's Appendix, p. 380, that they are charged with goods on the same day (June 2) as the appellants.

Tennent depones, " That he recollects having been supplied by them (the respondents) with whisky in the year 1809; but he cannot say whether he got spirits from them in the month of June in that year, as some of the invoices which he got from them about that time have not been preserved by him." Tennent's wife depones " conform to the immediate preceding witness, her husband."

John McVey, excise officer, depones, " That when the deponent was first on the said division, it was the practice of retailers to send the permits of spirits, entering their stocks, to the brewery of Mr. Robert Aitken, in Camlachie, from whence the deponent regularly received them, as he had occasion to be there generally three or four times a day."

[369] James Cunningham, excise officer, depones " conform to the preceding witness."

Andrew Tennent, depones, " That about the year 1809 the deponent, to the best of his recollection, was in the practice of sending the permits, which he received with the spirits, sometimes to the brewery of Robert Aitken, in Camlachie, and sometimes to the shop of William Brown, grocer, in Parkhead."

Elizabeth Thomson, his wife, depones " conform to the preceding witness."

John McVey depones, " That when visiting the stock of the different spirit-dealers of the division, it is his uniform practice to gauge it; and if he find it less than the stock for which they have credit, their credit in the stock-book is reduced immediately to the quantity actually in their possession."

James Cunningham depones " conform to the preceding witness."

The extracts of accounts from the account-books * of the respondents, and the stock-books of the excise, which are subjoined in the Appendix to this case, were also proved under the commission.

The Court, on the 15th November 1814, pronounced the following interlocutor: " On report of Lord Meadowbank, and having resumed consideration of and advised the mutual informations for the parties, condescendence, answers, proof adduced, and whole process, the Lords repel the defences, and decern against the defender for pay-[370]-ment of the sum of £55 12s. sterling, with interest thereof, from the date of citation in this action, and till payment; find the defender liable in expenses, allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit to the auditor to tax the same, and to report."

An error of £11 in this interlocutor was rectified by consent.

The appellant then presented a petition against the above interlocutor, which being followed with answers, the Court, upon advising the same, being of opinion that the case depended materially on the credit due to the excise books, made a remit to James Bruce, secretary to the Board of Excise for Scotland, to examine those books, and report what credit appeared to him to be due to the entries contained in them. On the 12th of June 1815, Mr. Bruce made the following report:—" I have considered this petition, and the answers, and I am of opinion, that the surveys mentioned in the excerpts (see the Appendix), engrossed in the answers, have every appearance of being taken from actual gauges of Dunbar's stock; and that the entries made in those books are held as sufficient evidence of the delivery and receipt of the exciseable articles therein mentioned, and particularly of the hogshead of whisky in question."

The agent for the appellant, when this report was put into process, waited upon Mr. Bruce, to inquire how he could, consistently with the known facts of the case, make such a report to the Court. The result of this interview is stated in the following " note," which was presented to the Court below: [371] " In this case your Lordships, before answer, remitted to Mr. Bruce, secretary to the excise, to peruse the petition and answers, and, if necessary, to call for the attendance of parties, and to inquire into the facts alleged by either party with regard to the excise books and permits mentioned in the pleadings, and to report the result of such inquiry to the Court, and particularly to state how far the entries in these books can be deemed conclusive evidence of the delivery of the hogshead of whisky in question into the stock of the petitioner (appellant)."

* And it appears that the respondents tendered the oath in supplement, which was refused by the appellants.

"The petition and answers, with the remit by the Court, were, by the agent for the pursuers (respondents), laid before Mr. Bruce, who on the 12th instant perused the same, and wrote out the report in process. The agent for the defender was rather surprised that Mr. Bruce should have made out a report, without so much as seeing the disputed entries contained in the stock-book, kept for the division where the defender resides, and which was then lying in his (the agent's) possession. Accordingly he took the liberty of waiting upon, and mentioning this circumstance to Mr. Bruce, who stated to him that the cause ought to have been remitted to the sheriff of the county, to inquire into the facts alleged by the parties, as tending to support or detract from the credit due to the excise books; that he had examined the persons in the excise-office, who made out the excerpts from the books mentioned in the pleadings, by which he was satisfied that these were fairly taken; and therefore he had no occasion to [372] see any books on the subject, because, in his official capacity, he could never admit that there was any error in the excise books. Mr. Bruce further stated, that the practice of stamping entries has been known to the honourable Board; and when the officer was detected in doing so, he was dismissed from the service.

"Correct, in so far as relates to the conversation with,

(signed) "James Bruce."

"15th June 1815."

The Court [on 7th July 1815] pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lords having advised this petition, with the answers thereto, and report of Mr. Bruce, as directed by the Court, adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and refuse the desire of the petition, with this variation, that the sum decerned for shall, as consented to by the respondents, be restricted to £43 14s. 9d. sterling, with interest thereof from the date of citation, and with expenses as formerly found due."

Against these interlocutors the appeal was presented.

For the Appellants, the Attorney-General, and Mr. Wetherell:

By the Scotch law, a settled account cannot be opened so as to admit proof of error. A party there is not permitted, as in the courts of equity in England, to surcharge and falsify. Even in those Courts there must be a demonstration of error in the accounts: suspicion and probability of error is not sufficient. Clark v. Thirkill *, Seton v. Cockburn. (Dict. of Decis. vol. 2, No. 135.)

[373] As to the excise books, they cannot be evidence as between third persons; if so, any person might be charged to any extent by a collusive entry in the excise books (see authorities pp. 378, 379).

Independently of the excise books, the case of the respondents rests upon the evidence of M'Farlane and Russell. The question related to three deliveries in 1809. They prove only one delivery. To have sustained their case, they should have proved the deliveries in April and August. M'Farlane, having carted all the whisky, could have proved all the deliveries; he only thinks that he delivered a cask about the middle of June. It appears in proof, that various other deliveries of whisky took place on the same day. They might have called the persons to whom it is alleged that such deliveries were made, to corroborate the evidence of M'Farlane, which they have omitted to do. Russell speaks only to belief, and proves nothing as to any delivery but one. The excise books prove no delivery to Taylor, M'Omish, etc. on the 2nd of June, as represented by the respondents witnesses.

To the admissibility of the excise books as evidence, there were certainly objections made in the Court below. The excise officer was not examined, but a person to prove the excerpt from the books, in which there is a material error: it omits an intermediate entry, which shows the danger of admitting such evidence. The permit is delivered to the excise by the person who removes the stock; not by the retailer, who receives it. In point of admissibility, there is no difference between original and con-[374]-firmatory evidence. If the party be dead, as in Pitman v. Mador (2 Salkeld, 690), the evidence is admissible, according to the authority of a class of cases. The admission of the semiplena probatio, according to the Scotch law, depends on the circumstances of the case. In the authorities referred to by Erskine (B. 4. tit. 2, s. 14) on that subject, the circumstances were very peculiar:

* Before the Vice-Chancellor, 1820. Not reported. It was a common bill to open a settled account.

the defender being dead, his oath of verity could not be taken, and on this account the oath of the pursuer was admitted. Where there are adverse witnesses, semiplena probatio is not admissible; here they have taken the oath of the defender's wife. According to Erskine, "the semiplena probatio, or oath in supplement," is to supply an imperfect or defective evidence by the "parties own oaths: e.g. in the case of furnishings made by shopkeepers, etc. where the quantities furnished, or the prices of them, are not proved by two concurring testimonies, etc. But where the imperfect evidence laid before the judge does not, in his apprehension, amount even to semiplena probatio, the parties oaths in supplement ought not to be put." In this case, the accounts of the respondent were very inaccurate: there were omissions on both sides of the account.

For the Respondents, Mr. C. Warren, and Mr. Stephen:

The defence made by the appellant is not that he has paid for the goods, but that they were not delivered. The evidence to prove that the cask in question was delivered at the house of the appellant is, 1. the entry in the books of the respondents and of the excise; 2. the depositions of the servants of the [375] respondents; 3. the evidence of Mr. Bruce. No objection to that evidence was raised in the Court below, either by the advocates or by the judges. Whatever may be thought of such evidence in England, it is admissible by law in the Courts of Scotland; and this House, sitting as a Court of Appeal from Scotch jurisdiction, must decide by the rules of the Scotch law.

It is admitted, that, according to the authority quoted from Erskine, merchants books are not full evidence; but the law of Scotland in such case admits the oath in supplement. If it be law, however inexpedient, it must be the rule of decision between the parties. The books afford a semiplena probatio, which, if supported by one witness, becomes plena, provided the books are correctly kept, and the merchant make oath, in supplement, that the transaction is there justly stated (Ersk. Inst. b. 4, tit. 2, s. 4): that proof the respondents have offered, and it has been rejected by the appellant. The invoice delivered to the appellant's wife has not been produced, though required. The word "balance," on which so much argument is built, occurs only in one of the jottings. As to the fact and time of the delivery, McFarlane could not have confounded June with August. His evidence is confirmed by Russell; and as to the conversation between witness and the party respecting the transaction, it ought not to affect the credit due to the evidence. It is in the necessary and ordinary course of conducting actions. A plaintiff would not act very wisely in bringing an action, and proceeding to trial, without knowing what his witnesses could prove.

The Lord Chancellor:— It is manifest from observations of the judges of the Court of Session, appearing in the notes, that if it had not been for the certificate of Mr. Bruce, as to the excise books, they would have decided against the respondents: whether they ought to have done so, is another question. It is difficult to ascertain on what principle the Court referred this point to Mr. Bruce. If, according to law, the Court could have dispensed with the production of the books themselves, on the ground that they were public documents, and could not without public inconvenience have been removed; then they should have required, as to such parts as were material to be given in evidence, copies properly attested and examined. That a court of justice should refer to any man, to know whether a document is or is not evidence, is to me a novelty. If the reference had been proper in itself, the report, considering how it was framed, is by no means satisfactory: Mr. Bruce admits that he did not examine, he did not even see, the books, but only conversed with the excise-officers, and upon their allegations and his own confidence is satisfied, and returns a certificate accordingly. Is it in Scotland, presumptio juris et de jure, that an exciseman cannot be mistaken?

For the Respondents:— It is said that because a subsequent account was settled, the omission to charge the item in question ought to be clearly shown. That demonstrative evidence is necessary to open an account, is an objection not now maintainable. As to Seton v. Cockburn, the question was between partners for an account. Balances of former accounts had been brought into subsequent accounts which were settled; under such circumstances the question was, whether the final account included [377] the settlement of previous accounts, vouchers having been delivered up! In the present case, no vouchers passed; no formal account was delivered; the papers given in the hurry of business were mere memoranda of an account current, signed only by one party. By the English law, error may be shown even after an account has been settled.

If the demonstrative evidence said to be required in this case means direct evidence, as contradistinguished from presumptive, there is such evidence. The issue is upon a fact, whether a hogshead of whisky was delivered, and it is confined to a question of time. On this point there is the evidence of the man who delivered it to the wife, with an invoice or permit. His evidence is corroborated by another witness. A third witness proves the entry of the delivery in the books. In England, the practice is to prove the delivery by shop-books, and the servant who made the delivery. Upon an action of trover for a gold watch, where the plaintiffs contended that the defendants being watchmakers, with whom he had left the watch for repair, had delivered it to a stranger. The defendants, on the other hand, contending that it was delivered to the person appointed by the plaintiff to receive it. By the production of the shop books, an entry appeared, not in the hand-writing of the shopman, nor made in his presence; but seen by him soon after it was made: that evidence, given by the shopman, was received.*

[378] The Lord Chancellor:—What was the verdict in that case?

For the Respondents:—It does not appear. In another case (Pitman v. Mador, 2 Salk. 690), the shopman being dead, the shop-books were of themselves held to be evidence of delivery. To the evidence from the excise-books, it is objected that nothing but a certificate is produced: but this objection was not raised before the Court of Session: from which a presumption arises, that by the law of Scotland the certificate is good evidence without production of the books. If the objection had been taken, the respondent might have amended his case by producing the books; in England a new trial would not be granted, on the ground of the admission of improper evidence, if the objection was not taken at the trial. The excise-books were not produced to prove the delivery of the goods, but to show that the permit was delivered by the retailer, Mr. Dunbar, to the officer. McVey depones, that the permits are usually left by the retailer.

The Lord Chancellor:—Did you ever hear of a certificate being admitted, such as in this case? The excise books, if they be evidence at all, ought to be proved by the oath of a party who has made or seen a copy, and having compared it with the original, proves it to be accurate.†

[379] For the Respondents:—The appellant is estopped from making that objection, for he has used the books in evidence. It is not to be presumed, from the practice of the English law, or any general principles, that such a certificate is not good evidence by the law of Scotland.

The Lord Chancellor:—We have nothing but this certificate; the books are not before the Court. The judges below think all the other evidence trash, and rely upon this certificate.

For the Respondents:—In England questions are tried by the certificate of the bishop: So of the marshal of the King's host. The evidence of Mr. Bruce was taken by the Court for the behoof of the appellant. If his evidence were struck out, enough would remain to support the case of the respondent.

The Lord Chancellor:—Can you support the second interlocutor of the Court of Session, by which it appears, that on the report of Mr. Bruce they found their judgment, and adhere to their first interlocutor on the foundation of that report? Can these interlocutors be supported in these terms, unless the report of Mr. Bruce is supported?

For the Respondents:—The invoices and receipts are not evidence for want of stamps, according to the statute 48 Geo. III. c. 149. That point has been decided (Wright v. Shawcross, 2 B. and A. 504). The fraudulent intent of the appellant is apparent from his winking at the small overcharge against him in the former account, for fear that, in stirring the question, the greater error against [380] the respondents, and in his favour, might be discovered in the course of investigation.

The Lord Chancellor:—The cause is highly important, as involving difficult questions on the subject of evidence. Now, under the Jury Court Act, an issue would be directed in such a case. If the House of Lords affirm the judgment, it would be considered as a direction, and established as a rule, to admit such evidence (including the certificate) before a jury. The subject, however, is so trivial, that if it were not for the important principle which is brought into question, it would be right to decide the case instantly.

If all the interlocutors could be affirmed, that might be satisfactory. But as three of the Judges, who sustain the demand, express an opinion that they could not do so but upon the evidence of Mr. Bruce's certificate, it would be dangerous to affirm a judgment standing upon such ground.

It is contended, that by the law of Scotland all these matters—the parol testimony, the books, the certificates, the excerpts, and even the opinion of Mr. Bruce, are admissible evidence. I ought to be well assured on this point, before I establish such rules of evidence. It is marvellous if such things as the certificate of Mr. Bruce and the excerpts, (produced as they were), can be considered by the law of that country as admissible evidence.

What is truly the rule of law on these points in Scotland, it is highly important to know. Questions of fact, such as we now have to decide, will hereafter come before juries in Scotland, who must be guided by their own law of evidence. It is important, therefore, [381]—fore, to ascertain by the present decision, so much of that law as the question involves. If we should affirm the judgment of the Court below, without stating the grounds, the judgment on this appeal would be quoted before juries to sanction the admission of such evidence, including all the particulars which were admitted in this case. If, therefore, in the Court of Session, evidence was admitted which ought to have been rejected, together with evidence properly admissible, we ought to inform the Courts of Scotland what evidence we think admissible, and what ought to have been rejected. If I were to speak as an English lawyer, I should immediately express my opinion without doubt. But as a Scotch lawyer, I am required to consider what part of this evidence ought to be admitted, and what part to be rejected.

Lord Chancellor:—There is a case which stands for judgment, which I am extremely sorry ever to have seen here—it relates to the price of a cask of whisky; and the question is, whether the judgment of the Court of Session, which has fixed the keeper of a public-house with the price of that cask of whisky, is a judgment which is or is not supported by the evidence given in the cause. What was the real case it is a little difficult to state. What would have been the judgment of the Court of Session upon so much of the testimony which has been looked to in this case, as has about it (if I may so speak) the character of evidence, I do not know; because it appears to me, that there has been a great deal made use of in this case, as testimony, which has no pretence to [382] be considered as evidence that ought to be admitted. Endeavouring to separate so much of the testimony as has not the character of evidence, from so much of the testimony as has the character of evidence, I think, upon what I deem to have the character of evidence, that this case ought to be decided, not in favour of the respondents, but in favour of the appellant; and I am the rather inclined to advise you so to decide, because I am quite certain that if we were to take another course, and which is the only other course that we really could take, namely, to remit back to the Court of Session, to reconsider the case of this cask of whisky, we should put both parties to a very great expense. In the next place, if we did not remit it back to the Court of Session, the consequence of that would be, that the Court would take it for granted that in all similar cases similar testimony was to be received in evidence: taking, therefore, the case, and considering it now upon so much of the testimony as is evidence, I think the respondents here, the pursuers below, have failed in making out, by proof as competent as ought to be offered in such a case, the delivery of this cask of whisky; and that that proof on their part ought to be much more clear than it is in this case; because, as to what is supplied to public-houses, the distillers are in truth the persons who keep the accounts between themselves and these public-houses; and where they have delivered accounts, the import of which is directly against the claims they now make, it would be a very unwholesome thing to apply to the general transactions of such persons, a principle which would call upon your lordships to decide, with respect to written [383] documents delivered by themselves, that those written documents did not contain the truth with respect to the delivery. It may have been in this case (I cannot undertake to say positively) that this cask of whisky got to the public-house, but I say there is not evidence in this case to sustain the claim, if you throw out of the case the testimony which ought not to be received. Under the circumstances I can only move your lordships, that this interlocutor be reversed; but that each party should pay his own costs.

Ordered and adjudged, that the interlocutors complained of be reversed, and the defender assolizied.

[390] I HEREBY certify, That I have searched those of the excise books, for the year 1809, in which Hugh Dunbar change-keeper at Westmuir's stock of spirits were then kept account of, and find recorded therein a permit dated 2d June 1809, for a cask containing 72 gallons of aquavitaæ, purporting to have been sent from the stock of Thomas Harvie and Company, to Hugh Dunbar at Westmuir; that those seventy-two gallons of aquavitaæ appear from the above-mentioned book to have been placed in the usual manner at that time to Dunbar's debit, by the then officer, and shown in his stock, on the officer's next succeeding survey, viz. 12th June, year foresaid.

ENGLAND.

WRIT OF ERROR FROM THE KING'S BENCH.

JOSHUA ROWE,—Plaintiff in Error: ISAAC YOUNG,—Defendant in Error
[17th July, 1820.]

[An ordinary acceptance to pay at a particular place is now a general acceptance, unless it expressly states that the bill is to be paid there only. See Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s. 19 (2) (c), re-enacting 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 78, which was passed to override Rowe v. Young. As to duty of drawer or indorser to notify to holder dissent from qualified acceptance, see Act of 1882, s. 44 (3); as to presentment, see ib. s. 52; as to liability of acceptor, see ib. s. 54.]

If a bill of exchange be "accepted, payable at the house of P. and Co." it is a qualified acceptance restricting the place of payment, and the holder is bound to present the bill at that house for payment in order to charge the acceptor of the bill. If he brings an action upon the bill against the acceptor, he must in his declaration aver, and on the trial prove, that he made such presentment: and for want of such averment the declaration was held bad on demurrer.

The defendant in error was indorsee and holder of a bill of exchange, which the plaintiff in error, residing at Torpoint, had accepted, "payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s bankers, London." The bill, when it became due, was not presented at that banking-house for payment. But Mr. Young, having failed to make such presentment, nevertheless brought an action against Mr. Rowe in the Court of King's Bench.

In the first count,* upon which the whole question, both technically and materially, turns, the [392] declaration set forth the words of the acceptance as above stated, with an innuendo or explanation, thus: "payable at, etc. that is to say, at the house of certain persons using in trade, etc. the names, style, and firm of Sir J. P. and Co. bankers, London."

In a subsequent part of the same count it was averred, that Rowe, "by reason of the premises, and according to the custom of merchants, became liable to pay the money specified in the bill according to the tenor and effect of the bill, and of his acceptance." No allegation of a presentment at Sir John Perring and Co.'s for payment was contained in the first count. To this declaration, upon the ground of this omission in the first count, a demurrer was filed on behalf of Rowe, the defendant in the action.†

* Which was the only count in the declaration upon the bill of exchange; all the others were counts for money for goods sold and delivered, and upon an account stated.

† For thirty years before the argument of this case, the Court of King's Bench had been in the habit of holding an acceptance payable at a banker's to be a general acceptance.

The Court of King's Bench overruled the demurrer upon argument, or rather upon the statement of it, and gave judgment for the plaintiff Young.

Against this judgment a writ of error was brought in the House of Lords, assigning for error the want of averment in the first count, that the bill was presented for payment at the house of Sir J. Perring. The case was twice argued * before the House at [393] very great length, and with much ability: first, in the ordinary course, and afterwards before the Judges, for the purpose of proposing to them questions of law, for the information of the House. After the second argument, the four following questions were propounded to the Judges:

1. Whether, in this case, the bill of exchange [394] mentioned in the first count of the declaration, being therein alleged to have been accepted according to the usage and custom of merchants, payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s bankers, London, (that is to say) at the house of certain persons using in trade and commerce the names, style, and firm of Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London, the holder was bound to present it to that house for payment, and to aver in the declaration that the same was presented to that house for payment?

2. Whether, the said bill having been so accepted as aforesaid, such acceptance is in law to be considered as a qualified acceptance to pay the same at the said house of Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London: or, as a general acceptance, to pay the same with an additional engagement or direction for payment thereof at that house?

3. Whether, if A. draw a bill upon B. in favour of C. for £100, and C. without the previous authority or subsequent assent of A. take an acceptance of the bill for the whole of the £100, but an acceptance qualified as to the time or place of payment, C. could, notwithstanding his taking such acceptance, maintain an action upon the bill against A.?

4. Whether, if A. were debtor to C. in £100 previous to his so drawing upon B. in favour of C. to the amount of £100, C. could, upon A.'s refusing his assent to an acceptance qualified as mentioned in the above question, maintain an action upon the original debt against A. without delivering to A. the bill so accepted, in case, at the time the bill was drawn, B. was also indebted to A. in a like sum of £100?

[395] There was a difference of opinion among the Judges, and they delivered successively the opinions which are printed in the Appendix to this Report. After

* By the Attorney-General and Mr. Wylde for the plaintiff; and by Mr. Holt, for the defendant in error. The arguments are omitted on account of their length; and if it could have been done with propriety, in a work professing to be a record of important decisions in the House of Lords, the whole case would have been omitted, on account of the increased expense which double reports of the same case inflict upon that part of the profession who are, or who conceive that they are, obliged to take both sets of reports. In ancient times, when business was less extensive, it was the practice of advocates to attend all the courts indiscriminately; and, having taken notes of what they heard in the course of their practice, to publish indiscriminately what they so collected. But of late years division of labour has been the consequence of increased business, and reporters, as well as advocates, usually confine themselves to a particular court. Formerly, reporters of cases in Chancery and the King's Bench made no scruple of reporting cases in the Common Pleas or Exchequer; but since the time when periodical reports of cases in the Common Pleas and Exchequer have been begun, and gentlemen have devoted themselves to attendance in those Courts for the purpose of reporting, no reporter in other courts interferes with the department which they have selected. The case now reported arose in the King's Bench, was removed by writ of error into Parliament, and appears in the ordinary reports of the Common Pleas. If this circumstance had furnished a sufficient reason to exclude a case so important in the principle of decision, so full of acute reasoning and deep research, comprising in the elaborate opinions, delivered by the Judges, so many valuable discussions on doctrines of law, and refined criticisms on points of pleading, not applicable merely to the case under consideration, but of universal application, from the pages of a work where the first inquiry would be made for such a case, it would have been, to the Editor most especially, a great relief to have been spared the unpalatable task of consideration whether such a case, under such circumstances, ought or ought not to be reported.

the Judges had delivered their opinions, the Lord Chancellor and Lord Redesdale spoke to the following effect :

Lord Chancellor: The writ in this case was brought on a judgment in the Court of King's Bench, in an action of assumpsit. That action was commenced by special original in Easter Term, 1816. The declaration consisted of a count on a bill of exchange, two counts for goods sold and delivered, three money counts, and an account stated. The breach contains an averment of a special request of payment in the usual form. The error is limited to the first count of the declaration, and that count is thus expressed: " For that whereas one James Meagher, on the 20th December 1815, at Gosport, to wit at London, in the parish of St. Mary-le-bow, in the Ward of Cheap, according to the usage and custom of merchants, from time immemorial used and approved of within this kingdom, made and drew a certain bill of exchange in writing, bearing date the same day and year aforesaid, and then and there directed that bill of exchange to the said Joshua, by the name and addition of Joshua Rowe, Esquire, Torpoint, and thereby required the said Joshua, two months after the date thereof, to pay to his the said James's order £300 for value in account, and then delivered the said bill of exchange to the said Joshua, which bill of exchange he the said [396] Joshua afterwards, to wit, on the same day and year aforesaid, at Gosport, that is to say, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, upon sight thereof, accepted according to the said usage and custom of merchants, payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s bankers, London. (that is to say,) at the house of certain persons using in trade and commerce the names, style, and firm of Sir J. Perring and Co. bankers, London; and the said James, to whose order the said sum of money in the said bill of exchange specified was to be paid, afterwards, to wit, on the same day and year aforesaid, at London aforesaid, in the same parish and ward aforesaid, by his certain indorsement in writing, made and indorsed on the said bill of exchange, according to the usage and custom of merchants, ordered and appointed the said sum of money in the said bill of exchange mentioned, to be paid to the said Isaac, and then and there delivered the said bill of exchange so indorsed to him the said Isaac, of which indorsement the said Joshua afterwards, to wit, on the same day and year aforesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, had notice, by reason of which said premises, and according to the said custom of merchants, he the said Joshua then and there became liable to pay the said Isaac the said sum of money specified in the said bill, according to the tenor and effect of the said bill of exchange, and of his said acceptance thereof, and of the said indorsement so made thereon as aforesaid; and being so liable, he the said Joshua, in consideration thereof, afterwards, to wit, on the same day [397] and year aforesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, undertook, and then and there faithfully promised the said Isaac, to pay him the said sum of money mentioned in the said bill of exchange, according to the tenor and effect of the said bill of exchange, and of his said acceptance thereof, and of the said indorsement so made thereon as aforesaid."

To this count there was the following demurrer: " And the said Joshua, by John Wells Bozon, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury when, etc. and says, that the said first count of the said declaration, and the matters therein contained, in manner and form as the same are above stated and set forth, are not sufficient in law for the said Isaac to have or maintain his aforesaid action thereof against him the said Joshua, and that he the said Joshua is not bound by the law of the land to answer the same, and this he is ready to verify: wherefore, for want of a sufficient first count of this said declaration in this behalf, the said Joshua prays judgment, and that the said Isaac may be barred for having or maintaining his aforesaid action thereof against him, etc.: and the said Joshua, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, states and shows to the Court here, the following causes of demurrer to the said first count of the said declaration, that, although it is stated and alleged in and by the said first count of the said declaration, that the said bill was accepted by the said Joshua, and made payable at Sir J. Perring and Co.'s bankers, London, yet it is not alleged or stated in, nor can [398] it be collected from, the first count of the declaration, that the said bill was ever presented or shown for payment thereof.

either when it became due and payable, or before or since, at the said Sir J. Perring and Co.'s bankers, London, aforesaid." Then there is a rejoinder and replication.

The demurrer afterwards came on for argument in the Court of King's Bench, when the Court gave judgment in favour of the defendant in error, that is, by their judgment they asserted that it was unnecessary to state and allege, (that is the substance of it,) in and by the first count of the declaration, that the bill was accepted by Joshua; in fact, that it was not necessary it should be stated, or capable of being collected from the first count of the declaration, that the bill was ever presented or shown for payment thereof, either when it became due and payable, or before or since, at Sir J. Perring and Co.'s bankers, London.

The writ of error, therefore, raises this question: whether it was or not necessary in this first count of the declaration to allege, or state expressly, or to allege or state in substance and effect, so that it might be collected from the first count of the declaration, that the bill had been presented, and shown to the plaintiff in error, either when it became due and payable, or before that time, or since, at Sir J. Perring and Co.'s bankers, London? The question, stated in another way, may be thus: whether the acceptance, as set forth in this first count of the declaration, is to be considered a general acceptance, making the party accepting liable to pay every where, together with what in some cases is called an [399] expansion of the undertaking; and in other cases, an engagement or direction, in addition to the general unqualified acceptance to pay, (as the direction in this case to pay at Sir J. Perring and Co.'s) thrown in for the convenience of both parties, but which the holder of the bill is not bound to attend to, unless he chooses; or, on the other hand, whether this, from looking at the terms of the declaration, is what is in law called a qualified acceptance? Undoubtedly it is very fit this question should be brought to a final decision, because the state of the law, as actually administered in the Courts, is such, that it would be infinitely better to settle it in any way than to permit that sort of controversial state to exist any longer.

It has been correctly stated at the bar, that the Court of King's Bench has been of late years in the habit of holding this to be a general acceptance, with what they call an expansion, or a direction, or an engagement, which introduces not a qualified promise, but a sort of courtesy; a kind of accommodation between the parties, in addition to the effect of the general acceptance; which accommodation or courtesy, however, they decide that the holder of the bill is not at all bound to attend to. On the other hand, the Court of Common Pleas are in the habit of holding that this is a qualified acceptance; that the contract of the party is to pay at the place specified; and, as in matter of pleading, they deem it a qualified acceptance, the proof must accord with the declaration. They require the plaintiff to aver and prove the presentment at the place stipulated.

The principles of law, as applied to promissory [400] notes and bills of exchange, are simple and uniform in common cases. But the Court of King's Bench has held, that if a man promise to pay at a particular place, by a promissory note, the Wellington Bank for instance, the demand must be made there; which presentment is itself in point of law a demand; and the reason alleged is, because the place standing in the body of the note is part of the written contract, and you must declare upon it as it is, and prove it as you declare; yet the same Court decides otherwise in the cases of bills accepted, payable at specified places; and the reason assigned for this is, because the place specified is not in the body of the bill. Some how or other it seems to have been assumed, that not being in the body of the bill it is not to be considered as being in the body of the acceptance: a conclusion which it is extremely difficult, I think, to adopt. If you can infuse qualifications of various kinds, which unquestionably you may, into the acceptance, notwithstanding the generality of the bill as drawn, it seems rather difficult to make out, that if in the acceptance there is a qualification clearly and sufficiently expressed as to place, that such a qualification cannot be introduced into the acceptance as well as any other qualification; qualification as to time, as to mode of payment, as to contingencies upon which you will pay, and various qualifications which will be found in the cases.

The decisions of the Court of King's Bench as to bills accepted, payable at a given place, cannot easily be reconciled with their decisions as to promissory notes, with similar qualifications; and it [401] must, I think, be admitted that these decisions of the Court of King's Bench are not all consistent with each other. It may be represented as the opinion of that Court in judgment, that this species of acceptance is a general acceptance, with that kind of expansion, direction, or engagement, to which I have been alluding. The Court of Common Pleas hold a different doctrine. Upon a question where so many Judges of high professional character and great learning have differed, it is impossible to give an opinion without much diffidence; but it is my duty to state my opinion whatever it may be.

The first question is, whether this is a qualified acceptance? Upon that the twelve Judges have given their opinion, and a great majority of them are of opinion that it is a qualified acceptance. Some of the Judges have given an opinion that it is a general acceptance, with an expansion, direction, or engagement, for the convenience of one or other of the parties: that the acceptance in this case meant, that if the party chose to go to Sir John Perring and Co.'s he would probably there get payment of the bill.

The next question is this: supposing it to be a qualified acceptance, was it necessary to aver the presentment, and to support that averment by proof? Now, upon that question, a great majority of the learned Judges, including those who thought it was a qualified acceptance, say that it is not necessary to notice it as such in the declaration, or to prove presentment: but that it must be considered as matter of defence, and that the defendant must state that he was ready to pay at the place, and must bring the money into Court, and bar the action by proving [402] the truth of that defence. A great majority of the Judges are of that opinion. Some of the Judges, (including one who has been most eminent in special pleading,) hold a different doctrine. They are of opinion that the plaintiff must declare upon the contract as it is, and make out his right to sue according to that contract. If that contract engages for payment at Sir John Perring and Co.'s he must make a demand at Sir John Perring and Co.'s, and he must state in his declaration that he has made such demand. The sum of their opinion is this, that the contract being upon a condition precedent, the plaintiff has no cause of action unless he has performed the condition; and further, unless he pleads and proves the performance.

I think I may venture to state, having with great pains read every case upon the subject, that a person may draw a bill of exchange as we are in the habit of drawing a promissory note, payable at a particular place. By the acceptance of such a bill, the acceptor promises to pay at that particular place, and the drawer binds himself to the same qualified contract, in default of payment by the acceptor. But it seems there is a great objection to the doctrine, that if a bill is drawn in general terms the acceptor may alter the contract by giving a special acceptance. The only material question appears to me to be, whether the acceptor has in fact accepted specially. I cannot imagine, that because the contract of A. the drawer is general, it is from thence to be reasoned, that B. the acceptor, having an option to undertake, or altogether refuse, the engagement, cannot qualify my acceptance. May I not say to [403] the holder of the bill, it is very true the drawer has drawn upon me, and expects me to make myself liable generally, but that is a liability which I do not choose to incur. If you will not take an acceptance at a specified time and place, which my convenience requires, I will not give you any acceptance. That an acceptor may qualify his acceptance is clearly established by cases including almost every species of qualification. If the qualification, as to place, cannot be introduced by the acceptor, it must be on account of some circumstance which belongs to place, and does not belong to time or mode of payment, or any other species of qualification whatever.

I am ready to express my full assent to the doctrine, that where a bill is drawn generally, considering that it is an address to the person who is to accept it generally, because it is drawn generally, it is the duty of the acceptor who intends to give a special acceptance, to accept in such terms that the nature of his contract may be seen in the terms he has used; that the acceptance may clearly appear to be qualified or special, which he insists is not general.

Then the first question in this case will arise upon the words, whether this is or is not a qualified acceptance. I really do not know how it is possible to say that this is not a qualified acceptance, I mean independently of the cases which have been decided. If a bill is drawn upon a person resident in London, and he accepts it according to the usage and custom of merchants, payable at his bankers in London, putting for the moment the usage of merchants, and the effect of decided authorities, out of the question, [404] can any man read an acceptance in these terms, and say it is not only a contract to pay at Child's, where the funds would be deposited to pay it, but that it was a contract by virtue of which the holder of that bill might arrest the acceptor, and hold him to bail in any part of the world?

I cannot, after the maturest consideration, think that the words used do not clearly show that it was the intention of the party who gave this acceptance to come under an engagement which may be represented as a contract, to pay the bill at Sir J. Perring and Co.'s, London, and not to be liable elsewhere.

Then it is said, that the word "accepted" forms the general engagement: and that the words "payable at Sir J. Perring and Co.'s" cannot qualify and cut down the general engagement: and cases are cited which maintain a distinction between words of qualification in the body of a note, and words of qualification in the margin, or at the foot of the note. There are such cases of distinction between words in the body of the instrument, which have been held to form part of the contract, and words at the foot, or in the margin, which have been considered and held to constitute only a memorandum. I do not mean to disturb those cases; but I do not understand how it is, that from those cases it is to be inferred, that when the acceptor, uno flatu, writes the words, "accepted payable at such a house," the word "accepted" is to be taken to express the whole of the acceptor's contract; and although the sentence is not complete till the whole is written, the latter words are not to be taken as part of it, but are [405] to be construed distinctly as a direction, expansion, or engagement.

It appears to me that this is a qualified contract for payment at the place specified.

The argumentum ab inconvenienti has been strongly urged. The mode of reasoning was not quite analogous to the usual modes of reasoning in the courts below. Nor does the argument itself as presented rest on clear probabilities. The case is put in this way: Suppose a bill were drawn on each of the twelve Judges of England, just before they left town to proceed on their circuits, and they had accepted the bills payable at their respective bankers. If it be law that such an acceptance renders them liable to pay any where, the holders of those bills might, undoubtedly, if they pleased, arrest the Judges at their respective circuit towns, a little to the inconvenience of the administration of justice. It is said no man would think of arresting the Judges. I hope nobody would think of arresting the Judges; but I can feel for mercantile men as well as for Judges. It is a hardship that men should be exposed to the inconvenience of unexpected demands, which are not regulated by their contracts, but by a construction given to their contracts which they never intended, and have not expressed.

In this very case, (a circumstance which has been little considered) the acceptor lives at Torpoint. Is it a matter of no consequence to the acceptor living at Torpoint, and having his money in London, where the payment is demanded? At Torpoint, perhaps, he cannot pay, probably not without inconvenience. In London he has left a fund in the [406] hands of his bankers, for the purpose of payment. Is it no matter of inconvenience that the holder may from caprice (we have heard of such things as men, through caprice, refusing a tender of Bank of England notes,) is it no evil to the acceptor that he should be obliged to bring his money from London, if he foresees that the holder of his acceptance will not demand his money in London, but personally from him the acceptor; or if he cannot foresee whether he will demand his money in London or not, is he to keep money in London, and to have money at Torpoint also, and even about his person, to answer the exigency of the demand, as it may happen to be made at the one place or the other, or where ever he may happen to be when the demand is made?

There is another consideration which does not appear to me to have been sufficiently weighed. If the acceptor promises to pay at his bankers in London, and the holder calls upon him in Northumberland, the payment is not the same. He presumes that the demand is to be made at the bankers in London, and the funds are deposited there. But if the acceptor is unexpectedly to meet the demand in a distant place, the cost of the exchange and remittance backwards and forwards must be added. Take the case of a gentleman leaving Calcutta and coming to reside in London. Upon his departure he gives a bill of exchange in Calcutta, to be paid there six months after he departs. He arrives in London, not bringing funds to pay that bill; he finds the bill sent home by another ship, and he is arrested the moment he lands. The sum which he pays here, [407] (if compelled,) is not the same which he had made preparation for paying, and would have paid in India. It appears, to me, therefore, that even with respect to the value of what is to be paid, there is a most essential difference in the contract.

Then, it is said, the admission of such special acceptances will be extremely inconvenient; and it was with a view to see what the balance of convenience and inconvenience would be, that the third and fourth questions were proposed to the Judges by order of the House. The objection urged is, that it may vary the right of the holder against the drawer and previous indorsers, unless he, the holder, gives notices, and does all the acts requisite to preserve their liability. The answer to that objection, as it seems to me, is plain: If once it be admitted that a man may by law accept specially, it is in consequence of the law that these difficulties arise. By deciding that no man shall accept specially a bill which is drawn generally, the difficulty is avoided. But if the law be, that although a bill is drawn generally, it may be accepted specially, it is the effect of the law to impose a duty upon the holder of giving notice to the drawer and previous indorsers, if he intends to keep alive their liability. That inconvenience certainly is not quite so large as if the acceptor refused to accept at all.

Again, it is objected that the rule in question will create great difficulty as it regards the indorsee: that some indorsees become so before and some after acceptance: if he becomes an indorsee before, he may find a special acceptance when he expected to have a general acceptance. But when the bill is indorsed [408] to him unaccepted, he does not know whether it will ever be accepted; and if he does not know that it will be ever accepted, he cannot tell whether it will be accepted generally or whether it will be accepted specially. He knows, therefore, at the time when he takes that bill by indorsement, that he is to look out for such an acceptor as he can find: perhaps no acceptor, but either a general acceptor or a special acceptor. What there is, in such a rule, inconsistent with law or convenience, I cannot discover.

This being a case in which the law is unsettled, we must resort to principle. If on principle a qualified acceptance may be given, the question is, whether the acceptance in this case is qualified? If it be an acceptance in which the contract of the party is to pay at Sir John Perring and Co.'s, then I state it to be, in pleading, a settled rule, that the plaintiff must declare according to the contract; he must aver all that the nature of that contract makes necessary. If so, how can it be said it is not to be shown by the demand in the declaration, but must be left to be brought forward by the defence? It appears to me that such a doctrine cannot be maintained.

With respect to the cases which have been cited of bonds, they differ altogether from a contract of this nature. Upon a bond the action is brought for the penalty. It must be, therefore, matter of defence to show that the sum due would have been paid at a particular place provided, for that will appear in the condition of the bond, when the defendant prays over of it. The defence consists in alleging performance of that part of the condition, [409] and that is an excuse for non-payment, so as to throw the costs on the plaintiff. These cases therefore have no application to cases of contract.

There is another set of cases in which it is said that if there is an antecedent debt the acceptance must be taken to be general. Between the acceptor and the holder there is no antecedent debt. There may be an antecedent debt between the drawer and the acceptor of the bill. I wish it could be asserted in all cases. Accommodation bills have ruined great numbers of men. With respect to the acceptor, it is not true that he must be antecedently the debtor. All the cases of qualified acceptance show the contrary. A man may accept to pay half the bill in money and half in goods. He may accept to pay out of the produce of a cargo consigned to him when that cargo shall arrive in England. In the case of a consignee his acceptance is almost universally qualified. Upon the expectation of cargoes coming from the West Indies, or other places, bills are accepted by consignees, payable in London.*

* The Lord Chancellor, in the course of his speech, stated, that he did not pro-

In every view of this case, I must state it as my [410] opinion, (though with much diffidence, recollecting that I am obliged to differ in opinion from those whose judgments no man can respect more than I do) that this is a contract to pay at Sir John Perring and Co.'s even as the contract is stated in the first count of the declaration, and inasmuch as that count wants this indispensable averment of a presentment for payment, according to the contract; the consequence is, that this judgment must be reversed. I do not think the decision will much affect the commercial world, for it will be easy to adopt forms of words which leave no doubt what is meant. I am perfectly sure, that if there is any inconvenience arising from this proposed decision, those who do not wish to suffer the apprehended inconvenience have nothing to do but to use two or three words, which will guard them from it.

The question is, what is the law settled, or to be settled, upon the contract as set forth in the first count of this declaration? I have already stated in a few words what my opinion is, and I sincerely believe it to be founded in clear principles of law. At the same time, I cannot but recollect that I am differing from those whose opinions I greatly respect. I do it with reluctance: But my duty is to express my own opinion.

Lord Redesdale:—I most fully concur in the opinion expressed by my noble and learned friend (the Lord Chancellor). It appears to me, that some of the learned Judges have totally forgotten acceptances for honour, which are not uncommon acceptances. If a person accepts, for the honour of the drawer, payable at a banker's [411] in London, all the reasoning, founded on the supposition that the acceptor was debtor to the drawer, vanishes; and I do not observe, that the learned Judges distinguished between the case of an acceptance for honour, and the common case of a bill drawn on the person to accept. It is impossible to say, that if these words were applied to an acceptance for honour, that any of the arguments founded on the supposed prior debt of the acceptor could be maintained.

Another part of the question which has been adverted to by the noble and learned Lord appears to me of infinite importance; I mean, the acceptance of a bill payable at a different place from the residence of the acceptor. This bill is accepted by a man resident at Torpoint, payable in London, at a certain banking-house. What is it that is asserted to be the effect of this acceptance? that he engages to have money both at Sir John Perring and Co.'s and at his own residence at Torpoint. If he accepted simply, he would engage only to have the money at Torpoint*; but, it is said, that because he accepts with this addition he engages to have the money at both places; this is making him engage for two things instead of one, and it seems to me that it [412] must have been his intention to engage for only one, that is, a payment in London: because otherwise he would have engaged for a different thing than that which he engages for by a general acceptance. It is perfectly clear, that money paid at Torpoint and in London are two different things; and if he is liable to be called upon at both places, his liability is rendered more inconvenient.

If it be the true doctrine of law that presentment at a place specified in the acceptance is not necessary, such a doctrine might furnish the means of unfair and fraudulent advantage in dealings between mercantile people residing at different places.

I do not mean to go through the whole case, or to notice all the arguments. The analogies, of rent payable on the premises, of awards directing money to be paid and received at a place, of bills and notes payable on demand, where no demand is held necessary, are omitted here. On the two first classes, see the arguments for the analogy, in the opinion of Bayley, J. and against it, in the opinion of Wood, B. post, in the Appendix. As to the latter case, where demand is part of the contract, yet proof of demand held unnecessary, see Birks v. Trippett, 1 Saund. 33, a.; and the opinion of Bayley, J. quâ supra.

* Quare, Whether, under a general acceptance, he would not be generally liable: that is, in all places wherever he may happen to be resident when the bill becomes due, and is presented for payment. See Rumball v. Ball, 10 Mod. 38; and Bayley on Bills, 3d edition, 187. I was apprehensive that my note of this passage was incorrect; but, upon collation with other notes, it is confirmed. The expression intended, perhaps, was, that he would have accepted payable at Torpoint.

Take the case stated by the noble and learned Lord, of a bill accepted, payable in India. Suppose a person accepts a bill payable in India, and leaves funds for the purpose of answering that bill, which is made payable in six months. He comes to London, and there the bill is demanded of him; because his acceptance, according to the proposed doctrine, is general, and the words, "payable at Calcutta," do not qualify that acceptance; the consequence of that would be, that the holder of the bill would gain the whole expense of the remittance from India to England, and we know perfectly well that makes a very considerable difference. In a recent appeal (Graham v. Kibble, 1 Bl. 126), argued before this House, it is a question whether, in an account of that description, the expense of remittance from India to England is or is not to be allowed; and it is part of the subject of appeal from the decision of the Court of Session in Scotland that [413] the appellant has not been allowed the expense of that remittance*.

It appears to me, therefore, perfectly clear, that if it be law, that the acceptance of a bill payable at a specified place is not a conditional acceptance, it may be used for the purpose of gross fraud, to make the acceptor pay that which he did not mean to pay, a sum which the other parties to the contract never expected him to pay. Many cases might be put as to the West Indies, and other places which were alluded to by some of the learned Judges, and into which it is not necessary to enter.

If the words which have been added to this acceptance are to be taken as nothing in favour of the acceptor, how is it that they have any operation in favour of other parties? If they are not a condition annexed to the acceptance, how is it, that with respect to the drawer of the bill, for the purpose of making a demand against him, and with respect to the indorser, for the purpose of making a demand against him, the holder of the bill must show the application to Perring and Co. in order to entitle him to bring his action?

It is said that this should be shown by plea. The majority of the Judges have been of opinion that it is a qualification of the acceptance, but that the defendant is to take advantage of it in pleading. To do that he is obliged to bring the money into Court; that is to say, he is to do the very thing which in the case of an acceptance in India, for instance, he [414] ought not to be obliged to do—he must bring the money from India to be enabled to do it; and therefore, the permitting him to take advantage of it, by way of pleading, bringing the money into Court, is not giving him the advantage for which he stipulated.†

Upon these grounds it appears to me that it is infinitely better to hold that these words amount [415] to a qualification of the acceptance, imposing a precedent condition, which must be shown upon the record: for the purpose of setting forth

* By the judgment since given, the cost of remittance has been in part allowed.

† Quære 1. Whether the defendant might not plead readiness, etc. and bring into Court the sum expressed in the bill, according to the rate of exchange, either at the time when the bill became due, or at the time of paying the money into Court. Suppose, for instance, a bill drawn upon a party resident in Ireland, for £1300, which he accepts, payable at Dublin; and afterwards, the acceptor, being in England, is sued for the amount. If, according to law, and the practice of the Court, he might plead that he was ready to pay at Dublin, etc. and pay into Court £1200, that being the supposed rate of exchange; the objection, so far, is obviated.

Quære 2. Whether, for the purpose of this argument, there is any difference between remittance and exchange, since the mode of remittance is by exchange. Or if there be any further incidental expenses, as a fair commission to the banker or merchant furnishing the bill, might, or might not, that also become the subject or part of a special plea; and the real value of the sum expressed in the bill, according to the rate of exchange, minus those incidental expenses, be paid into Court? If issue were taken upon such a plea, might not the proceeding be in a course similar to that which takes place in an action upon a bill returned protested from a foreign country? As in the cases of Auriol v. Thomas, 2 T. R. 52, upon a bill; and Pollard v. Hevries, 3 B. and P. 335, upon a note, viz. by assessment of a jury. See Kearney v. King, 1 B. and A. 301, as to the necessity of setting forth in the declaration, in what country, and currency, a bill is drawn, though it is not necessary to state the value of the currency. Simmonds v. Parmenter, 1 Wils. 185, 1 B. P. C. 43.

truly the acceptance and the performance of that condition must also be averred. Those matters being set forth then, it appears to me that the party is bound to prove that which he has averred in the pleading, which goes to show that the party taking such acceptance has complied with the condition entered into between him and the other party. On these grounds I perfectly concur with the noble and learned Lord that this judgment should be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

APPENDIX.

ROWE v. YOUNG.

BEST, J. The words "payable at Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London," qualify the general term "accepted," and render a presentment of the bill at the house of Sir J. P. and Co. necessary; (provided the acceptor had funds at that house on the day on which the bill became due, and Sir J. P. and Co. would have paid the bill;) but I do not think that it was necessary to aver in the declaration, that the bill was presented at that house for payment. If the acceptor would avail himself of the want of presentment of the bill at Sir John Perring's, he must plead to the action brought on it, that he had funds in the hands of Sir J. P. and Co. sufficient to take it up on the day when it became due, and that Sir J. P. and Co. would have paid it, had it been presented at their house; and he must pay the amount of the bill into Court.

The first point to be settled is, whether the terms used amount to such a qualified acceptance, as makes the bill payable only at the bankers? or whether they are to be considered merely as giving notice to the holder, that if he will call at the bankers, he may obtain payment without having the effect of compelling him to present the bill at the bankers? or imposing any other duty on him than what is required from the holder of a bill, by a general acceptance.

The holder of a general acceptance must present his bill at the residence or place of trade of the acceptor: the qualified acceptance produces no other effect than that of changing the place of presentment from the counting-house of the acceptor, to the house of the acceptor's banker.

The drawee of a bill may accept it specially; and such acceptance may narrow his responsibility below what it would have been if he had accepted the bill according to its tenor. Special acceptances are recognised by a long series of decisions; from which it appears, that the drawee of a bill may limit his responsibility by any conditions which his own circumstances, or the situation of the drawer's funds may render expedient. [417] In Smith v. Abbott (Str. 1152), it was helden that a drawee may accept payable, when certain goods consigned to him are sold; and in Julian v. Shobrooke (2 Wils. 9), when in cash from the cargo of the ship Thetis. In Walker v. Atwood (11 Mod. 190), a bill payable at sight was accepted, payable three months after acceptance, and this was held to be a good conditional acceptance. If the time of payment may be postponed, the place of payment may be changed. It is another question, whether the holder is bound to take such an acceptance, and whether, if he take it without giving notice to the drawer and indorsers, and obtaining their assent, he does not discharge them from all liability; but, if he does receive such an acceptance, he is bound by the terms of it, as between himself and the acceptor.

Are the words "accepted payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s bankers, London," sufficient to express a special acceptance, making the bill payable at that house? They all form one short sentence; the words "payable at" following immediately after the word "accepted," without any break; and as the word "accepted" raises an obligation in the writer to pay the bill when due, the words which follow "accepted" must be considered as confining the obligation to pay at the house of Sir J. P. and Co. What rule of construction allows us to say, that the first of several connected words is to be considered as forming the contract, and that the remaining words, although they seem to express a qualification of such contract, are to have no effect? With what justice can we hold a man to the obligatory part of the instrument which he has executed, and refuse him the advantage of the qualification which he has immediately annexed to it.

It has been said at the bar, that the acceptor is to be presumed to be the debtor of the drawer : that the debtor is liable to his creditor every where ; that this liability cannot be narrowed, except by clear and express terms ; and that the terms used by this acceptor are not sufficiently clear to narrow his responsibility. I deny that, under the circumstances in which the trade of the world is now conducted, a drawee is to be taken as the debtor of the drawer ; but, if he is to be so taken, the drawing a bill for his debt, if it be accepted, restrains the [418] drawer from claiming his debt at any other time or place (in the first instance) than when and where the bill is payable. Further, I insist, that the terms used in this acceptance are sufficiently clear to fix the place of payment of this bill at the house of the bankers.

It is well known to be the practice of the consignors of goods, to draw on the consignees for the expected proceeds of such goods as soon as the goods are sent. The bills so drawn are often presented before the goods get to the hands of the consignees, and generally before they are sold. The special acceptances, in some of the cases to which I have referred, were evidently made under these circumstances. In those cases, the drawee is no debtor of the drawer ; nor can what is said as to the narrowing of a general liability down to a particular liability have any reference to them.

But, suppose the drawee to owe the drawer money, for which the former is liable to be proceeded against at any time and place, and without notice. When the one has drawn, and the other accepted, a bill, the general right to sue which the drawer before had, is, in consideration of the acknowledgment of the debt, and the security given for it by the acceptance, restrained ; and the drawer can have no action until the bill is arrived at maturity, and the drawee (if able to pay) has been requested to pay it. I know, as against an acceptor, it is not necessary to aver a prior presentment of the bill ; but, although such averment and proof be not required, I cannot persuade myself, that you may arrest an acceptor who has been always ready to pay his bill, without any notice of the person, in whose hands it is. The opinion, that an acceptor may be sued at any time and place, and without any other demand than the writ, has arisen from inattention to the forms of pleading. I shall, presently, endeavour to explain this matter. I am aware, that there is great authority for this doctrine ; but no authority, save that of your Lordships, will ever convince me, that it is part of the mercantile law of England. If this be the law, no merchant in the city of London can secure himself against arrests and the costs of vexatious actions. Having money constantly in his house equal to all that he has to pay, and even carrying a like sum with him wherever he goes, will not protect him. According to this doctrine, the debt may be [419] sworn to by the holder, previous to any application for payment, and the first demand be made by a sheriff's officer. The acceptor of a bill, seldom knows in whose hands it is, when it becomes due ; the holder is, frequently, at a considerable distance from the place of payment, and sends his bill to an agent unknown to the acceptor. The acceptor cannot do what other debtors may do, namely, seek out his creditor, and tender him his debt. The law will not require impossibilities ; and all that it is possible for an acceptor to do, is to be ready with his money at the time and place of payment.

As to the objection of want of precision in the terms used : let it be recollected that this is a mercantile contract, and that the loosest of all mercantile contracts is the acceptance of a bill of exchange. By the use of the single vague term " accepted," the drawee engages to pay the bill when it arrives at maturity : there is nothing like precision, nothing like a clear and unequivocal expression of obligation in this term, yet the acceptor is bound by it. Will you require more clearness and precision in the qualification, than the contract to which it is annexed ? But the words, however inartificial, are only capable of one meaning ; nor would any man reading the bill, and not puzzled by the decisions of Westminster-Hall, think of putting any other construction upon them, than, that the payment which the acceptor binds himself to make, is to be made at the house of his bankers, and no where else. Suppose, instead of using the word " accepted," the drawee had written " when this bill becomes due, I undertake that it shall be paid at the house of Sir J. P. and Co., bankers ;" could any man contend that, according to these words, he would have to be ready to pay it at any other place, than the house of Sir J. P. and Co. ? The word " accepted " imports, that, when the bill becomes due, the acceptor undertakes that it shall be paid ; surely, the words, " at Sir J. P. and Co.'s " must have the same meaning, when added to the word "accepted," as, when added to other words, meaning nothing more or less than is expressed by the word "accepted." It has been asked at the bar, how long the acceptor is to leave the amount of the bill in the hands of his banker? I answer, that he is never to remove it. By his special acceptance, he has charged that money with the payment of the bill at his bankers: he has, therefore, no power [420] over the amount left at his banker's to pay it; it belongs to the holder of the bill, who may take it when he pleases. Should he not call for it within the time allowed to the holder of a banker's check to present the check at the banker's, and should the banker fail, the holder of the bill must lose his money: he would lose his money, if he took a check for his bill, and did not present such check in due time. It is decided in the case of Saunderson v. Judge (2 H. Bl. 509), that a memorandum that a note would be paid at the house of Saunderson and Co. was an undertaking, that there should be cash there to pay the note; and an order on Saunderson and Co. to pay it. Such an acceptance as is stated in the question is treated by all bankers as a draft on them, or order to pay the bill so accepted. A person who neglects to present such an acceptance on the day when it is due, must, therefore, subject himself to the same consequences, as one who keeps any other draft or a banker's check, beyond the day after that on which it was delivered to him, when the banker fails.

With respect to the cases of Smith v. De la Fontaine (Bayley on Bills of Exchange, 3d ed. p. 129, note b.), Fenton v. Goundry (13 East, 159), and the nisi prius decisions which followed those cases; I am far from saying, that the judgments of the Courts upon those cases were wrong; on the contrary, for the reasons which I shall presently offer, I should have concurred in those judgments, although not on the grounds stated by the judges who decided them. As to the nisi prius cases, I think it would have been much better for the law, if the crude opinions of judges at nisi prius had never been allowed to be quoted to those who are sitting in bank. Of Smith v. De la Fontaine, we have only a very short and very imperfect report; it does not appear that Lord Mansfield, or the Court of K. B. looked at the acceptance as a written contract, and considered what was the true legal construction of it. They proceeded upon some supposed understanding of the mercantile world, and did not give themselves the trouble of coming to any understanding on the subject. Lord Ellenborough and the rest of the judges seem to have taken the same course in Fenton v. Goundry. Where a construction is to be put on a mer-[421]-cantile contract, the Court do right to consider what has been the practice of merchants with reference to such a contract. But care must be taken to ascertain what the practice is; and I cannot think any court warranted by the opinion of one jury in pronouncing, that words which are incorporated in a contract form no part of it. It does not appear that any inquiry was ever made to learn the understanding of merchants on this subject, except by Lord Mansfield in Smith v. De la Fontaine.

As to the second branch of the first question: I am aware, that both the King's Bench and Common Pleas seem to agree, that, if the terms of an acceptance are obligatory on the holder to present the bill at the banker's, such presentment must be averred in the declaration. With the greatest respect for those who were Judges of the King's Bench, at the time when those cases were decided, I must say, much confusion seems to have prevailed amongst them on this subject. Lord Ellenborough, in his judgment in the action on the promissory note made payable at a particular place (Saunderson v. Bowes, 14 East, 500), answers his own argument in Fenton v. Goundry; nor can I subscribe to the propriety of the distinction taken between the effect of the same words in a note and a bill. In an acceptance, the words form a part of the original contract of the acceptor, as much as they form part of the original contract of the maker in a note. In the Common Pleas, the question of pleading does not seem to have been much considered. It was scarcely put to that Court by the argument at the bar, that the question of want of presentment ought to have been made matter of defence. If presentment at the banker's be not a condition, the performance of which must precede the payment of the bill, there is no necessity for averring such presentment in the declaration. By a general acceptance, the acceptor undertakes to pay the bill in London; but it has never yet been thought, that before you can recover against the acceptor, you must show a presentment on the day the bill became due. I cannot distinguish between the time of payment and place of payment, or discover any other difference between a general acceptance and a special acceptance payable at a banker's, than that, in the former case, the acceptor undertakes to have the money to take up the bill at his house of busi-[422]-ness, in the latter, at his banker's. If presentment on the day of payment, or at the place of payment, were conditions precedent, the holder, although prevented by causes which he could not controul, must lose his debt, if the bill were not presented on the day of payment, for the condition could not be performed on any subsequent day; and he must be subjected to the same loss, if the banker fails, for not presenting it at the house of such banker, although the acceptor had made no provision for its payment. Such a rule must work injustice, and, therefore, cannot be law. The acceptor, if he would avail himself of the non-presentment of the bill, must show by his plea, that he was ready at the time and place of payment to take it up, but that the holder did not attend; and must bring the amount of the bill into Court. On shewing that a tender of the amount of the bill was prevented by the default of the party to whom it should have been made, the want of tender will be excused. In all cases, a party is excused from doing what he otherwise ought to have done, by shewing that the other party prevented him from doing it. Arbitrators sometimes direct money to be paid on a particular day at Lincoln's-Inn hall; and rents, annuities, and other payments, are agreed to be paid at certain specified times and places. In actions for the non-payment of the money in such cases, it is not usual to aver in the declaration, that the plaintiff attended at the appointed time and place, in order to receive his money; and the early books of entries contain pleas, that the party to pay was at the place with his money, and that he who was to receive did not attend.

Upon the second question, I submit, that such an acceptance is to be considered in law as a qualified acceptance, to pay the same at the house of Sir John Perring and Co. and not a general acceptance to pay the bill, with an additional engagement or direction for the payment of the same at that house. I have stated the grounds on which I have formed this opinion, in my answer to the first question.

The third question, whether the taking it without the previous authority or subsequent assent of A. would prevent C. from maintaining an action against A? seems to me to depend on the nature of the qualification in the acceptance. A qualification which may prejudice the drawer, would discharge [423] him, if taken without his assent—such as an acceptance postponing the payment of the bill. An acceptance at a different town from that in which the bill was drawn, might have the effect of postponing payment, and also of preventing so early a notice of non-payment as might have been received from the town in which the bill was drawn. No line can be drawn limiting the distance from the place to which the bill is addressed, at which it might be made payable by the acceptance, beyond the town in which it is drawn. A qualified acceptance, making the bill payable at another town, taken by the holder without the assent of the drawer, would discharge the drawer. But I can perceive no prejudice which can arise to the drawer from the holder taking an acceptance which changes the place of payment from the acceptor's counting-house to the house of his banker's, in the same town. I believe that bills so accepted are more easily discounted than those which are accepted generally; and the greatest part of the bills of men in trade are now accepted payable at a banker's. Whoever draws a bill now, knows that, most probably, it will be so accepted. To allow a drawer or holder to make any objection on account of such an acceptance, would be to indulge their caprice, or give them a pretence for calling for their debts before such debts are fairly due. I have considered an acceptance payable at a banker's as merely changing the place of payment from the acceptor's counting-house to the banker's; and not as narrowing a right to demand the money any where, or to sue the acceptor without demand or notice; because I cannot conceive that any such right exists. Bills of exchange are often addressed to a man at a particular house, from which I infer that they are to be presented for payment at such house; and that there he is to prepare himself to pay them. If addressed to him in London, the meaning is, not that the bill may be presented any where in London; but it is presumed that the situation of the acceptor's counting-house is too well known to render it necessary that it should be mentioned in the address of the bill. There is a case in Lord Raymond, in which Lord Holt is reported to have held, that, if a bill be accepted without mentioning the house at which it is to be paid, the holder is not obliged to receive it (Mutford v. Walcot, 1 Ld. Raym. 575); that [424] learned judge could not have thought, that mentioning the house, narrowed the holder's right.

In answer to the fourth question, I submit, that if A, on receiving notice from C, that the bill was accepted with a qualification as to the time or place of payment, refuses his assent to such acceptance, C. may treat the bill as not accepted, and proceed on it against A, without delivering up the bill to A. If the drawer will not assent to the acceptance, which the person on whom he draws thinks proper to put to the bill, he cannot complain if proceeded against as the drawer of a bill which the drawee has refused to accept. The bill is necessary to maintain the action against the drawer; and, therefore, the holder must be allowed to retain possession of it. A, having previously given such a bill for a debt due from A. to C. the latter is not obliged to declare on the bill, but may bring his action for the original debt.

I hope that what I have stated as legal answers to the questions proposed, will be found to secure complete justice to all the parties to a bill, and to promote the convenience of those who are engaged in these negotiations. By allowing acceptances to be made payable at their bankers, merchants are relieved from the risk attendant on keeping large sums of money in their own houses. By holding that such an acceptance does not make presentment at the banker's a condition precedent, a just debt cannot be lost through accident or the negligence of clerks in not presenting the bill at the proper time and place: nor is a holder obliged to incur the expense and trouble of a presentment, when he is certain that no provision is made for payment: whilst, on the other hand, by allowing the acceptor to plead his readiness to pay, and bring the money into Court, you prevent, by the penalty of costs, vexatious arrests and unnecessary actions. By allowing holders and drawers of bills to object to acceptances which may prejudice their right, but preventing either from refusing an acceptance, which, though not strictly according to the tenor of the bill, cannot possibly affect their interest, the rights of parties are secure, whilst their caprice is made to give way to the convenience of others.

The counsel, both of the plaintiff and the defendant, have enlarged upon the inconvenience to commercial men which is [425] likely to follow the establishment of what is contended for by the opposite party. There never was a case more free from apprehensions of this kind. Mercantile men only want certain rules upon these subjects. As soon as this House shall have declared what are the proper rules, all Judges will act upon them, and all mercantile men will regulate their transactions according to them. If the rule is established that the acceptor may by his acceptance make his bill payable only at his banker's, but that the words used by this acceptor are not sufficient to express such a qualified acceptance, future acceptors will use terms which express this qualification of their contract more clearly. If drawers apprehend that such an acceptance is likely to occasion a return of their bills as being refused acceptance, they will guard against this by requesting, in the body of their bills, the drawee to accept them payable either at his counting-house or his banker's. Every holder will then know, that he holds their bills subject to their being accepted either generally or specially, and will thus be prevented from returning them for want of a sufficient acceptance.

Richardson, J.*—This is the case of a bill of exchange, drawn by a person at Gosport, upon a person at Torpoint, requiring him, in general terms, to pay, at two months after date, a sum of money to the order of the drawer, which the drawee has accepted, payable at the house of trade of certain bankers in London. The question is, what effect does such an acceptance produce on the holder, as to the conduct to be pursued by him before he sues, and as to the averments to be inserted in his declaration, when he sues upon the bill? It has not been, and, I think, cannot be denied, that the drawee of a bill of exchange is at liberty to qualify his acceptance, as by annexing a condition, or by enlarging or diminishing the time of payment; and, as he may enlarge or diminish the time, so he may, by his acceptance, fix the place of payment; and, in all such cases, I think it follows, that, as he is no otherwise party to the bill than by his acceptance, the holder is bound to sue him according to his acceptance; for the acceptance is the only evidence of contract as to him. The time or place of payment [426] expressed in an acceptance is as much a part of the acceptor's contract, as the like expression of time or place in the body of a promissory note is part of the maker's contract: both, I think, are entitled to equal regard in ascertaining the rights of the parties. What then is the meaning of the terms of this acceptance, "Payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s, bankers, London?" I think the meaning is the same, as if the acceptor had said, "I undertake to pay this bill at the house of Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London." I think that it is not a general acceptance with an additional engagement or direction as to the place of payment superadded, but, that it is to be considered in law as an acceptance to a certain extent qualified: and, that the legal extent of this qualification is the same as it is in other cases, where a man contracts to pay money at a particular place. It is material then to consider, what is the legal effect of a contract to pay money at a particular place? I apprehend it is this: that the debtor shall stand excused of damages and costs, if he is ready to pay the money at that place, according to his contract: but, that the debt is not lost to the creditor by an omission on his part to demand it there, except, perhaps, in cases where it can be shown that such omission has occasioned damage to the debtor. If so, it follows, that it is not necessary, on the part of the creditor suing for the debt, to aver in his declaration, that a demand was made at the place; but, that the defendant, by way of excuse against damages and costs, must show, that he was ready at the place to pay, but that no one was there on the part of the creditor to receive: and, for this purpose, he must plead a special plea in the nature of a plea of tender, and must bring the money into Court. Such, at least is the general rule, namely, that the money must be brought into Court: though I am not prepared to say that an exception might not arise, if the defendant, in any particular case, could show, that the money had since been lost by the neglect of the creditor to receive it at the time and place appointed. This, I apprehend, is the law in the case of covenants, and of bonds, with or without penalty, for payment of money at a particular place: and of rent, where a particular place of payment is expressed in the reservation: or, where it is not so expressed: in which latter case, the law makes it payable upon the land. I will mention some instances. In an [427] action of debt for £28 (Rast. 158. b.), the declaration stated, that the defendant, by his bill obligatory, sealed with his seal, at London, acknowledged himself to owe to the plaintiff £19 16s. of the money of Flanders, (parcel of the £28), which £19 16s. were then and still are of the value of £14 of English money, to be paid to plaintiff in the Cold Mart then next following. Then followed an averment, that the Cold Mart was a certain fair held at London, in the parish and ward aforesaid, from the 10th August, 1501, to the 20th September next following. The declaration then sets out another bill obligatory, for other £19 16s. Flemish, equal to £14 English, to be paid at the Paske Mart, with similar averments: and concludes, "yet the said defendant, although often requested, the said £39 12s. of Flemish money, nor the said £28 of English money, has not paid to the plaintiff, but to pay the same to him has hitherto refused, and still refuses." The defendant pleads, that the Cold Mart was a certain fair held at Bruges in Flanders, in parts beyond the seas, without the realm of England, from a certain day to a certain other day, and that the £19 16s. were worth only 60s. of English money, and makes a similar averment as to the Paske Mart. He then avers, that he was at the said fairs, called the Cold Mart and the Paske Mart, ready to pay to the plaintiff £6 of English money, if he, the plaintiff, had been there, and willing to deliver to the defendant the said bills: and that neither the plaintiff, nor any one for him, was then there to receive the said £6: and that he has always since been ready to pay, and brings the same into court: and concludes with traversing, that the markets were held in London: and also traversing, that the £19 16s. Flemish, were worth £14 English. The replication avers that £19 16s. Flemish were of the value of £14 English: and concludes to the country. Whereupon a jury de medietate lingue is awarded. In an action of debt (Rast. 175. a.), by the abbot of the monastery of Holy Cross of W. the declaration shows a demise of a manor and lands for a year, rendering £40 at W. aforesaid, at the four feasts of the year: that the defendant occupied for the year: and that the £40 is still in arrear to plaintiff, per quod actio accrevit: and concludes, without alleging [428] a demand at W. that defendant has not paid, although often requested. The defendant pleads certain acquittances as to part, and levy by distress for the residue. The plaintiff replies non est factum, as to the acquittances, and denies the levy by distress. In an action of debt (Rast. 322. b.) against executors, the declaration states that the testator, by his bill obligatory, acknowledged to owe to plaintiff £17 10s. to be paid in three half years; that is to say, £6 10s. at Storebrich fair next, and the rest at other fairs, averring when the fairs were held, and concluding, without alleging demands at the fairs, that testator and executor have not paid, although often requested. The defendant pleads ne unques executor. The plaintiff replies. The defendant rejoins. The plaintiff there had a verdict, and judgment. To an action of debt for rent (Thompson's Entries, 159, pl. 167, et seq.), the defendant pleads, that he, on the said day, etc., for the space of half an hour before sunset of the said day, was at the same common dining-hall of Thavies Inn, situate, etc. ready, and offered to pay the plaintiff the said £3 rent, which he was bound to pay on that day, according to the form and effect of the said indenture; and that neither the plaintiff, nor any one authorised by him, was then there to receive; that he has always since been ready to pay, and brings the money into Court. The replication states, that the plaintiff receives the money, and for damages, protesting to the readiness and offer to pay, replies a subsequent demand and refusal (not alleged to be at the place.) The rejoinder denies the demand. To an action of debt for rent (2 Modus Intrandi, Pl. Gen. 234), the defendant pleads (after oyer of the writing) that he, on the day in the condition mentioned, for the space of an hour before sunset, and after, was at the said mansion-house in the said condition specified, ready to pay the said £40, according to the form and effect of the condition; and that neither the plaintiff, nor any one lawfully authorised by him, was then there to receive; semper paratus, and profert in curiam. The plaintiff replies, that he was there to receive, and traverses that the defendant was there ready to pay. The defendant rejoins, whereupon issue is joined. In [429] Marshall v. Wisdale (Freeman, 118), to an action for £10 rent, the defendant pleads a tender of £9, and that he paid the other £1 for taxes. The plea was held bad, because he did not plead the tender at the place where the rent was agreed to be paid. The Court said, it could not properly be paid any where else. In Crouch v. Fastolfe (Sir Tho. Ray, 118), to an action of debt for rent, the defendant pleads, that he was at the place on the day, from before sunrise to sunset, ready to pay, and that the plaintiff, nor any one in her behalf, etc. was there to receive; semper paratus, and profert. It was held a good plea, though no tender was alleged. These precedents and authorities, with many others which may be found in our old books of pleadings, and especially in cases of rent, which the law makes payable upon the land, seem to me to be strong evidence of what the law is in cases of contract to pay money at a particular place; and to establish two propositions which may be considered as general rules, though, like other general rules, subject perhaps to exceptions under special circumstances. First, that a demand at the place is not a condition precedent to the creditor's right to sue for the money, nor, of course, necessary to be averred in his declaration. Secondly, that the defendant may excuse himself by pleading that he was ready to pay the money at the place appointed; but that, in such plea, he must show that he has always since been ready, and must bring the money into Court. The same law appears to me to be applicable to the acceptances of bills of exchange such as this acceptance is, which I consider to be a contract by the acceptor to pay the money at the place by him expressed. I am aware that this opinion is inconsistent, not only with the cases of Callaghan v. Aylett (3 Taunt. 397), and Gummon v. Schmoll (5 Taunt. 314); but also with the opinions expressed by the Court of King's Bench in Saunderson v. Bowes (14 East, 500), and acted upon by the same Court in Dickinson v. Bowes (16 East, 110); and also acted upon by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Bowes v. Howe in error (5 Taunt. 30). The two first mentioned cases, were cases of bills of exchange accepted, payable at a particular place; the three latter were cases of promissory notes, expressed in the body of [430] them to be payable at a particular place; and, in all of them, a demand at that place was considered as a condition precedent to the holder's right to sue upon them. I have felt the weight of these authorities, and it has not been without much consideration that I have felt myself at liberty now to dissent from them. But, considering that the general question, upon which so much difference of opinion has prevailed, is now before this Court of ultimate resort for a final decision, which must operate as a general rule in all future cases, it is very important, that that rule should be founded on true principles, and as far as is consistent with such principles, that it may be practically convenient. For this reason I have ventured to inquire into the grounds of these decisions. In the cases which occurred in the Common Pleas, I do not find that the point on which my opinion is founded, (namely, that where money is to be paid, at a specified place, it is matter of defence, and that it is, therefore, incumbent on the defendant to show that he was ready at the place to pay,) was fully brought before the consideration of the Court: no authorities, at least, appear to have been cited in support of it. In the case of Saunderson v. Bowes, in the King's Bench, which was followed by the cases of Dickinson v. Bowes, and Bowes v. Howe, with deference, I think, that the Court fell into a mistake in supposing, as they seem to have done, that the rule requiring the defendant to show, by way of excuse, that he was ready with his money at the place appointed for payment, (which rule they admitted in the case of bond under penalty,) was confined to such cases where a penalty was to be excused, and where the defendant was called upon to plead the condition, of which he wished to avail himself. I humbly apprehend that there is no such distinction, and that I have shown by the precedents and authorities before cited, that the same rule equally applies to the cases of single bills, without penalty; and indeed, as I conceive, to all cases where the contract is to pay money at a particular place. I may be suggested that, if the doctrine, which I have ventured to express, be applicable to the acceptances of bills of exchange, it is extraordinary that no case has occurred, or, at least, that none has been cited, where such a plea has been pleaded by an acceptor. To this I should answer, that probably no case has occurred, where an acceptor has been sued without a previous demand of the money, or [431] without such circumstances existing as evinced that he was not ready to pay. And this leads me to remark, (though I am aware that convenience alone is not a legitimate ground of decision, unless it be consistent with law) that to require the defendant to aver and prove readiness to pay in the few, if any, cases, where, notwithstanding his readiness, he may be vexatiously sued, rather than to require the plaintiff, in all cases, to aver and prove an unavailing demand, will, as I humbly conceive, be a more convenient as well as a more just rule for both parties, and more merciful to defendants themselves. For if, as the fact is, in almost every case of an action brought against the acceptor of a bill, the defendant has failed to pay from mere inability; to require proof of the previous demand, will only add the expense of one more witness, sometimes brought from a distant part of the kingdom, to the burden, which the defendant was before unable to bear: whereas, on the other hand, if an action, without previous demand, should ever vexatiously be brought against an acceptor, who was really ready with his money at the place appointed according to his contract, he, by pleading his readiness, and bringing his money into Court, may discharge himself from damages and costs, and the plaintiff will justly be punished for his vexation by the payment of costs.

* The statement of the record, and the four questions with which the learned Judge prefaced his observations, are omitted. The two first questions he consolidated.

I have one other observation only to make on this part of the case. It may be said, that unless the holder be bound to demand payment at the place appointed, he may demand it at some other place, where the acceptor is not prepared with funds. I answer, that if such a case should occur, I think the acceptor would be entitled to a reasonable time to draw his funds to that place. For this, the case of Halsted v. Vanleiden (1 Rol. Ab. 443, pl. 5, 20), is an authority, where (the defendant having by deed acknowledged that he owed to the plaintiff £111, and covenanted that the same should be paid by C. at Rotterdam, in Holland, on the first demand that should be made) it was held, on a special verdict, that the plaintiff might make his demand at Dort, which is ten miles from Rotterdam, or in England; but that in such case the defendant ought to have a reasonable time to pay, regard being had to the distance.

[432] In answering the third question proposed by your Lordships, I think it necessary to distinguish between a qualification as to time, and a qualification as to place. Any qualification as to time, whether the time of payment be thereby accelerated or retarded, which the holder permits to be introduced into an acceptance without the concurrence of the drawer, must, I think, have the effect of discharging the drawer. I think it must have such effect, because it necessarily varies, and must be intended to prejudice his situation, as to the time when he may be called upon to pay on the acceptor's default, and as to the time when he must resort to his remedy over against the acceptor. As to place, I think it is not every qualification of place which may be introduced into an acceptance, without the privity of the drawer, that will necessarily discharge the drawer; but to produce that effect, I think the qualification must be such as must vary, and may be intended to prejudice his situation. For instance, if a bill drawn upon a person in the Temple, be by him accepted, payable at the banking-house of Messrs. Child and Co. at Temple-bar, this, I think, would not have the effect of discharging the drawer. But, if such bill were accepted, payable at Dublin or Amsterdam, this, if taken without the privity of the drawer, would, I think, discharge him: because it would necessarily vary, and might reasonably be intended to prejudice his situation, as to the time when he could receive notice of the acceptor's default, and as to his remedy over against the acceptor. It may be difficult to lay down prospectively a precise rule, applicable to all cases, for defining the degree of distance from the residence of the drawer, at which he may be permitted by the holder to appoint, by his acceptance, the place of payment, without discharging the drawer. I should say, that to produce that effect, the distance must be such as would probably delay the drawer in his receipt of notice of the acceptor's default of payment, or throw some increased difficulty upon him in his remedy over against the acceptor.

In answer to the fourth question proposed by your Lordships, I think that in the case put, C. might maintain an action against A. upon the original debt, without first returning to A. the bill drawn by him, C. having first cancelled the qualified acceptance offered by B. to which A. is supposed to have refused [433] his consent. Such an acceptance, so offered by the drawee, but refused by the payee, because the drawer refuses his consent, is to be considered as no acceptance at all: the bill becomes a dishonoured bill, and consequently, the payee has an immediate remedy against the drawer, either upon the bill or upon the original debt.

Garrow, B. observing that it was well known in the mercantile world, that the Governor and Company of the Bank of England had determined to discount no bills which were not accepted, payable at a banker's, concurred with Best J. and Richardson J. in their opinions and reasons: and referred to them as containing his own views of the case.

Burrough, J.—In answer to the first question, I submit, that the usage and custom of merchants does not require that the drawee shall accept a bill of exchange in any given form. He may accept it by parol, or in writing, he may accept it generally: and, if he does so, he is, in the language of some of the cases, generally and universally liable: or, he may accept it specially; and then he is liable according to the tenor of the bill and his acceptance thereof. Whatever the acceptance may be, if an action be brought against the acceptor, the declaration must truly state the acceptance: for, the acceptance contains the terms on which he has agreed to the bill. I am of opinion, that the acceptance is a contract which must be construed, as all other contracts are, according to the intention of the party contracting, to be collected from the nature and words of the contract itself. The acceptance, if special, binds him sub modo, and not generally. There is neither hardship nor illegality in this. In the present case, the intention appears to me to have been to do away with the necessity and trouble of a personal application to the acceptor, upon the bill becoming due, and of his keeping money by him to pay it, and to substitute a much more convenient course in the first instance. No holder of a bill, when he goes to the banker's shop, expects to find the acceptor behind the counter: on the contrary, he knows he shall not find him there. On the face of this count, the bill is alleged to have been accepted according to the usage and custom of merchants: yet the doctrine of the case of Smith v. De la Fontaine, and other subsequent cases, is, that the acceptor, notwithstanding a special acceptance, is generally and universally liable. This is a doctrine [434] to which I cannot subscribe. The effect of such doctrine is, that, notwithstanding a well-known place is pointed out where the money may be obtained, the holder shall be at liberty to arrest the acceptor the moment the bill becomes due, and to turn a special and qualified undertaking into a general one, having very different consequences. It seems, however, to be now conceded, that this doctrine cannot be supported. But, then, it is said, that this special qualified acceptance makes no difference as to the averments in the declaration, except as to the statement of the acceptance. As I understand the acceptance stated in this declaration, I am of opinion, first, that it imports that there is a fund in the hands of the banker to answer the amount of the bill; and, secondly, I say, that this acceptance means to impose and does impose on the holder an act to be done by him, namely, to present the bill at the bankers for payment: if payment is not made on application, the acceptor's contract is broken, and not till then. But the holder must state in his declaration the title to his action, which is, that the bill was presented and not paid, and so his cause of action has arisen against the acceptor.

The case of Bishop v. Chitty (Str. 1195.) in no way assists the case of the defendant in error. The underwriting of the order for the payment of the money in that case amounted to an acceptance, and it was declared on as such: the possession of the bill, with the order for payment of it, were, in my judgment, sufficient to throw on the plaintiff the burden of proof, that he had presented the order, and could not obtain payment of it. It was there holden by Lord Chief Justice Lee, to be the plaintiff's loss: for, he said, it was to all purposes a draft, which is always considered as actual payment when a reasonable time to receive it has elapsed. Smith v. Abbott (Str. 1152.) is an instance of a conditional or contingent acceptance, according to which it was incumbent on the plaintiff to state in his declaration, and to prove at the trial, that the contingency had happened. The acceptance was "to pay when goods consigned to him," (and for which the bill was drawn) "were sold." The Court held, that the acceptance was within the custom of merchants; and said, that the plaintiff might have [435] refused it. The court said also, "it will affect trade, if factors are not allowed to use this caution, when bills are drawn before they have an opportunity to dispose of the goods. A man, who is drawn upon at ten days sight, may accept for thirty, though the other might protest the bill." So, in this case, I say, it will affect trade, if a man is, at all events, contrary to his intention, to be deemed to have accepted generally; or, if his acceptance in this form is to be so constructed, as to make him liable to be held to bail as soon as the bill becomes due. The fallacy, in this case, seems to me to consist in supposing, that the acceptor has engaged for a personal payment at the bankers. This appears to me to be contrary to the intention and the effect of the acceptance, to be collected from the words of it. Suppose the acceptance to have been in this form: "Accepted to be paid by me, if, on application to Messrs. Perring and Co. my bankers, when the bill becomes due, it shall not be paid by them:" there is nothing in the usage and custom of merchants to show that such an acceptance would not have been good. But whether an acceptance be good or bad within the custom, if the party, who leaves the bill for acceptance, receives it back without objection, he must abide by it. If he cannot recover according to the custom, it is his own fault. The acceptor can only be liable to an indorsee on an acceptance within the custom. In my judgment, the acceptance in the case before the House is in effect such as I have supposed; that this was the intention of the party, I think there can be no doubt: the words of the acceptance appear to me to manifest it. In Julian v. Shubrooke (2 Wils. 9.), the defendant had accepted a bill on account of the ship Thetis, when in cash for the ship's cargo. It appears in the report of that case, that the acceptance was so stated in the declaration, and that the plaintiff averred in his declaration (as I think he was obliged to do) that, on the day when the bill became payable, the defendant was in cash for the said ship's cargo. This the plaintiff must have been bound to prove at the trial: because it was part of his case, and it consisted of matter in the affirmative. In the present case, the defendant in error must contend, that if the cause had gone to trial, on proof of the [436] acceptance, he would have established a prima facie case: for he might have urged, on the plea of non assumptis, that the objection (if any) was on the record. As this record is, the question arises on a special demurrer. I am of opinion, however, that the declaration is substantially defective. First, because a material averment is omitted, namely, the presentment of the bill for payment at the bankers, Sir John Perring and Co. which is matter in the affirmative, and, I think, that it lay on the plaintiff to aver it. Secondly, because the cases referred to in support of the assertion, that the answer was to come on the part of the defendant below, do not support that assertion. The cases supposed were covenant to pay money at a certain place on a certain day: (ex gr.) to pay to the plaintiff in an action of covenant £100 on the 1st of August, at or in the common dining-hall of Lincoln's Inn. It is said, that, in a declaration on such a covenant, the plaintiff's breach is good, "that the defendant did not pay the money on the day, at or in the common dining-hall aforesaid, but neglected and refused so to do." I admit that this is so: but it is so, because the defendant covenanted to do the act personally to the plaintiff at that place: and the breach is, that he did not do it at the day and place, but neglected and refused so to do. This is good in a declaration, which is to be certain to a certain intent in general; and it implies, that the plaintiff was there ready to receive, - the parties having agreed to time and place. If this acceptance had amounted to an engagement by the acceptor to pay personally at Sir John Perring and Co.'s, the case alluded to might have had some weight. But this acceptance is not so, nor, from the language of it, can it be taken to be so meant; but, as appears to me, the contrary was intended, viz. that Sir John Perring and Co. the bankers, were, in the first instance, to be looked to for the money; and that the acceptor was to be resorted to in case of non-payment by them.

I will now shortly advert to the cases more immediately applicable to the subject; and the weight of those cases appears to me to be in favour of the plaintiff in error. The first case, to which I have occasion to refer, is Smith v. De la Fontaine (Holt, N. P. C. 366. note). In that case, Lord Mansfield is reported to have [437] held, that the words accompanying an acceptance "payable at a particular place," or the words "payable at, etc." were not words restricting or qualifying the acceptor's liability, but rendering him generally and universally liable; and that it was not necessary to prove a demand at the particular place in an action against such acceptor. If this was meant of an acceptance, by which the acceptor personally engaged to pay at a particular place, I should feel no objection to the observation; but, if it was meant to apply to cases wherein the acceptance has no such import, I do not think it law. The next case was that of Saunderson v. Judge (2 H. Bl. 509.), which does not affect the question in this cause. There the promissory note was in the ordinary form. It was made by one Sharp, and payable to Wilkinson, or order. At the foot of the note there was a memorandum, that he would pay it at the house of Saunderson and Co. The Court held, that this memorandum was no part of the note. If it was no part of the note, the holder, who was indorsee, was not privy to it: it did not bind him, because it was not transferred to him by the indorsement of the note. In Parker v. Gordon (7 East, 385.), the bill of exchange was accepted as in the present case; and there the court of King's Bench, consisting of Lord Ellenborough, Justices Grose, Lawrence, and Le Blanc, (Lord Ellenborough having nonsuited the plaintiff,) on motion to set aside the nonsuit, held, that the plaintiff, the holder, was bound to present it at the bankers within banking hours. They must have considered it as part of the acceptance. If it was no part of the acceptor's contract, the holder could not have been bound so to present it; but, on the contrary, he should have applied to the acceptor himself for the money. The next case in order of time is Lyon v. Sandias and Sheriff (1 Campb. 123.). The acceptance was of a bill of exchange, as here; Lord Ellenborough, in that case, appears to me to use expressions not warranted by law. He says, "how can you make three words, 'at Hankey and Co.'s,' more than a memorandum!" The answer appears to me to be, that they are more, for they are part of the acceptance. His Lordship then says, "the acceptor of a [438] bill of exchange is liable universally;" the observation on this is, that he is so, if he accept generally, but not otherwise; for his obligation and the extent of it must depend on the acceptance itself. His Lordship then proceeds to say, "this very point was brought before the Court some time ago, when the judges were all of opinion, that such words form no part of the contract, and did not require to be set out in the declaration." If I thought this to have been an opinion deliberately formed by that excellent and able man, I should have hesitated before I declared myself persuaded that it is not tenable. It appears to me, that it cannot now be contended, that such words are no part of the contract of the acceptor. When his Lordship says, "this point was brought before the Court some time ago," I presume he means to refer to the case of Smith v. De la Fontaine, in Lord Mansfield's time. That case was probably introductive of the confusion which has existed on this subject. The next case is Ambrose v. Hopwood (2 Taunt. 61.), where the Court of Common Pleas held, that in an action on an acceptance, like that in the present case, the declaration must aver, that it was presented at the place where the person, by whom it was made payable, resided. In a subsequent case (Haffam v. Ellis, 3 Taunt. 115.) in this House, it was holden to be sufficient to allege the bill to have been presented to the persons themselves. Still the case of Ambrose v. Hopwood shows it to have been the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, that the declaration must aver a presentment consonant to the acceptance; and the acceptance throughout is treated as a substantial part of the contract. In Callaghan v. Aylett (3 Taunt. 397.), the acceptance was nearly like the acceptance in this case. The bill was there accepted payable at Messrs. Ramsbottoms, bankers, London. The declaration alleged an acceptance generally. At the trial it was objected, that this was a variance; and that there was no proof of a presentment at the place. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff, and these points were reserved for the opinion of the Court. On argument, the Court of Common Pleas held, that this was a qualified acceptance, to which the holder (he having acquiesced in it) was obliged to conform, and directed [439] a nonsuit. Then follows in order of time the case of Fenton v. Goundry (13 East, 459.). In that case the acceptance was in this form, "payable at C. Sikes, Snaith and Co." And the bill was addressed to the defendant at "No. 54, Lower Shadwell, Wapping." It seems, that, in this case, the idea of the expansion of the promise to pay first arose. One would think, there had been a precedent independent general engagement, and that something expansive was added to it. The acceptance is one act: to call it an expansion of the promise, is, in substance, to make it a general engagement, and pleadable as such. It is the promise itself. It is one entire engagement; and the legal effect of it is, "I accept or agree to this bill, but you must go first to Sikes, Snaith and Co. for the money." This makes it a qualified or conditional engagement. In that case a learned person, who argued for the defendant, says, "where something is to be done by both parties at the same time, the defendant, who is sued for a breach of his part of the engagement, must show, that he did all that lay upon him to do, and that the plaintiff did not perform his part, which prevented the defendant's performance" (13 East, 465). I conceive the facts of that case do not warrant this observation: for the presentment is solely the act of the holder; and the payment is not to be made by the party himself, for no one expects to find the acceptor behind the banker's counter: therefore, there is nothing to be done by both parties at the same time; for the parties, from the nature of the engagement, are not to be present at the same time. This is an argument which probably had much weight; but I conceive that the foundation of it fails. In deciding the case, the Lord Chief Justice appears to have said (13 East, 469)—"It has become a frequent practice, in order to avoid the inconvenience to the holder of not having his bill honoured when he calls for payment at the party's ordinary place of residence, to intimate his other house of residence for the purpose, if I may so express it, which is at his banker's, where he engages, as it were, to be found at the usual hours of business." I am satisfied, that this observation is ill-founded. No one believes it to be the acceptor's place of residence, nor that he will be at all found there. The truth is, it is to avoid the inconvenience [440] of keeping funds in his own house, that he makes the bill, by his acceptance, payable by or at his bankers, which is not his house of residence, nor considered as such, but where he has cash or credit. It cannot but be observed, too, that there was floating in his Lordship's mind, a notion that the obligation to pay by the acceptor was general and universal: this is true of a general acceptance; but if it be argued as applicable to a special, qualified, or conditional acceptance, I cannot agree to it: for though the party who calls for the acceptance may refuse to take it if it be not general, yet, if he do accept it, and assent to its being special, he must pursue his remedy according to the terms of the contract itself: for an acceptance is as much a contract, as is a policy of assurance or a charter-party. Both the other learned Judges, in that case, appear to speak with considerable doubt on the subject: the Court hinted at a further consideration of the question, for judgment nisi only was given; but, as the reporter says, no further notice was taken of it. After this case, in Gammon v. Schmoll (5 Taunt. 344, S. C. 1 Marsh. 80), the Court of Common Pleas gave judgment on a question precisely similar to the present, on a full consideration of Fenton v. Goundry, and all the preceding decisions. That Court held, first, that the acceptance was a contract. Secondly, that the introduction in it of the words "payable at Batson's, London," qualified the contract; and that it was a condition precedent. Thirdly, that the holder must show, in pleading, that he has complied with it. One of the learned Judges (Chambre, J.), who concurred in this opinion, observed, that the reasons given in Fenton v. Goundry show, that the Judges were very doubtful as to this point. The case of Huffam v. Ellis (which I have before alluded to) came before this House on error. The bill was accepted, payable at Kensington, Styan, and Adams'; and it was averred in a declaration by an indorsee against the drawer, that the bill was presented to the persons using the name, style, and firm of Kensington, Styan, and Adams. This House held, that this was a sufficient averment to satisfy the words "payable at Kensington, Styau, and Adams." The case of Bowes v. Howe (5 Taunt. 30), is a case of great weight. It was subsequent to all [441] the cases on this subject, which have been brought before the courts, except Gammou v. Schmoll; and that was in the following year. Bowes v. Howe was an action by one, who held a promissory note by assignment or indorsement, against the makers. The note was made payable at Workington Bank. The declaration averred, that the plaintiffs in error (the makers of the note) became insolvent before the action, and wholly declined and refused to pay it at Workington Bank. The plaintiff below had judgment, which was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber. The Lord Chief Baron, Sir Archibald Macdonald, delivered the judgment of the Court. He held that the question was, whether the allegation in the declaration dispensed with the necessity of presenting the notes (for there were counts on many other notes) at Workington Bank; and that it was clear that a demand was necessary unless dispensed with; and that the allegation was not sufficient to enable the plaintiff below to maintain his action. The words "at Workington Bank," were in the body of the note; the words "payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s" are, in the case before this House, in the body of the acceptance; and I am of opinion, that there is no solid distinction between that which is incorporated in a note, and that which is incorporated in an acceptance. It is proper to advert to the case of Head v. Sewell (Holt, N. P. C. 363), which arose before Lord Chief Justice Gibbs at nisi prius. He held, in the case of such an acceptance as the present, that it was not necessary to prove a presentment at the place mentioned in the acceptance; and, following up the language of some of the cases, said, that the acceptor is generally and universally liable. It seems to me to be most strange, after the cases in his own Court, (one of which was not more than two years before) which were directly contrary to this opinion, that nothing further should have been done in this case of Head v. Sewell; that it should not have been brought before the Court. I am persuaded, that there must have been some circumstance in that case, which the reporter has not noticed. The case of Richards v. Lord Milsington (Id. 364, note), need only be mentioned shortly. That was an action on a promissory note, before the same Chief Justice at nisi prius. His Lordship said, "the words 'payable at Bruce and [442] Co.'s' are not introduced in the body of the note, they are only inserted in the margin." This case, therefore, has nothing to do with the subject. I have adverted to all the cases which appear to be applicable to the case before the House; and the result is, that I am of opinion, that the bill of exchange in the first count of the declaration, being therein alleged to have been accepted according to the usage and custom of merchants, payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s bankers, London, the holder was bound to present it at that house, and to aver in his declaration that the same was presented at that house for payment.

As to the second question I am of opinion, that the acceptance is, in law, to be considered a qualified acceptance, that the bill shall be paid at the house of Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London, and not as a general acceptance to pay the same, with an additional engagement or direction for the payment at that house. The acceptance is an entire contract; the holder, who receives it, must take it as it is, (if he does not dissent from it,) and it must be construed as it was meant, if the intention can be discovered, and the words are sufficient to effectuate it. I feel no doubt as to the intention, and can discover no legal ground to prevent its being carried into effect.

As to the third question proposed by your Lordships, I am of opinion that this must be considered, first, as to the time, secondly, as to the place. And first, as to the time; if B. accept a bill drawn on him at three months, and, by his acceptance, make it payable at four months, and thereby lengthen the time of payment, I think C. could not maintain an action against A. if this be done without his previous authority, or subsequent assent. And if it was accepted payable at a shorter time than three months, without such authority or assent, I think the law is the same; because the drawer might be liable to be called on sooner for the money than by the terms of his bill he had a right to expect. Secondly, as to the place; the question, as it appears to me, is, whether the variation is material? A general acceptance would have an implied relation to the drawee's place of abode. If the drawee accept it payable at his bankers in the same place, I am of opinion, that would not be material, and that a drawee may, within the custom of merchants, well appoint another [443] place of payment, if no material inconvenience to the holder be thereby introduced.

In answer to the fourth question, I am of opinion, that, in the case comprehended in this question, C. the payee, could not maintain an action against A. the drawer, without delivering, or offering to deliver, up the bill to him; for, whilst the bill remains in C.'s hands, the drawer's remedy is suspended; and, when the drawer has the bill returned, it will appear that the drawee has not complied with the requisition in it, and the drawer is restored to his original situation. I do not think, that the debt owing from B. to A. in any way varies the case, as between A. and C., for C. receives the bill from A.; and, until C. has agreed to an acceptance materially different from the terms required by the bill, the transaction rests between A. the drawer, and C. the payee.

HOLROYD, J.—As to the first question, I am of opinion, that, in this case, the bill of exchange mentioned in the first count of the declaration, being therein alleged to have been accepted according to the usage and custom of merchants, payable at Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London, (that is to say, at the house of certain persons using in trade and commerce, the names, style, and firm of Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London,) the holder was not bound to present it at that house for payment, and to aver in the declaration that the same was presented at that house for payment.

As, in my way of considering the subject, the second question appears to me to be involved in the first, I shall state my opinions on the second question, before I give my reasons for either.

On the second question, I am of opinion, that the said bill, having been so accepted as aforesaid, such acceptance is in law to be considered not as a qualified acceptance, to pay the same at the said house of Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London; but as a general acceptance to pay the same, with an additional engagement or direction for the payment thereof at that house. Though the allegation in the declaration has not treated the acceptance simply as a general acceptance, but has stated the place of payment as a part of it; yet, as the allegation is, that the defendant accepted the bill according to the usage and custom of merchants, payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s, [444] bankers, London, the first question appears to me to involve in it that which is proposed to us as the second question, namely, what is the effect of such acceptance according to the usage and custom of merchants? in like manner as if the allegation had been simply that of a general acceptance, and as if the question had arisen at the trial on the proof of an acceptance made payable at the place.

In considering the first question, therefore, which will also dispose of the second, I shall, in the first place, consider what is in law to be now deemed the effect of this acceptance, according to the usage and custom of merchants. If it be in law to be considered not as a qualified, but as a general acceptance, according to the usage and custom of merchants, with an additional engagement or direction for payment at the specified house, it will stand, then, in my opinion, as if a mere general acceptance were stated in the declaration; and in an action against the acceptor upon a mere general acceptance, although he may be ignorant in whose hands the bill is, and, consequently, know not to whom to go to pay it, yet the constant course of proceeding in such action has always been not to allege a presentment to the acceptor for payment, nor to prove it at the trial.

The history of the cases before that of Callaghan v. Ayllett, and the grounds upon which those cases, as well as the case of Fenton v. Goundry, were decided, appear to me decisive upon the two questions. The doubts, which have arisen upon the effect of these acceptances, appear not to have been entertained until after that point had been decided as a point free from doubt, both by judges and jury, for a period of nearly twenty-six years; those decisions taking as their basis the generally received and known usage among merchants, as to the effect of these acceptances, both previous, and up to, and during all that period of time. The case of Smith v. De la Fontaine, according to the note which I have of the case, was decided in the year 1785, first upon a trial by jury before Lord Mansfield (to whom, Lord Ellenborough says, in Fenton v. Goundry, the law of bills of exchange was as familiar as to any judge who ever sat on the bench), and, afterwards, by the whole Court of King's Bench, who were so clearly of opinion, that the making of the acceptance to be payable at Messrs. Bid-[445]-dolph, Cox and Co.'s, was for the convenience of the acceptor, and that there was no colour for the objection, that it was a special acceptance, and that the plaintiff ought to have proved an application at that house for payment in that action, which was an action against the acceptor; that the Court refused even a rule nisi to set aside the verdict for the plaintiff and enter a nonsuit. This continued to be acted upon as the law from thence till the year 1808, when the same point was determined by Lord Ellenborough in Lyon v. Sundius, which was a similar action on a like acceptance; Lord Ellenborough considering the point as settled and without doubt, and that the additional words were nothing more than a mere memorandum, the acceptor being liable universally: and so this continued, with the exception of Callaghan v. Aylett, which I shall notice presently, till Fenton v. Goundry, in Easter term 1811, when, on a demurrer to a count like the present, the Court of King's Bench decided, that the acceptance was to be considered in law as a general acceptance, with a mere intimation for convenience of the place designed for payment. Lord Ellenborough proceeds to decide the case upon the generally received opinion of the commercial world, as a matter quite clear of doubt, and upon what he had always understood to be the practice and doctrine concerning bills of exchange, since he had been familiar with them. The other judges of the Court, with the exception of Mr. Justice Le Blanc, who was absent from indisposition, also coincided with Lord Ellenborough in deciding upon the generally received opinion and practice which had long before prevailed. When the usage and custom of merchants respecting bills of exchange has been inquired into and ascertained, such usage and custom becomes matter of law, to be taken notice of as such by the judges; which is the reason why, though such usage and custom used formerly to be alleged in pleading as a fact, such allegation has for a long time been wholly discontinued.

Two cases, besides that of Callaghan v. Aylett, had indeed intervened, but they were both of them against the drawer, and appear to me to be not material to the present questions. One of them, Parker v. Gordon (7 East, 385), is in the King's Bench; the other, Ambrose v. Hopwood (2 Taunt. 61), is in the Common Pleas. [446] The acceptances were similar to the present: the one was a determination, that, in order to charge the drawer, a presentment at the place out of the usual banking-house hours was insufficient: and the other, that a presentment to the bankers, without saying at that place, was insufficient for that purpose; and, in neither case, did there appear to have been any presentment to the acceptor himself, personally, at all.

The case above referred to, of Callaghan v. Aylett (2 Campb. 519; S. C. 3 Taunt. 397), was a case which was decided by the Court of Common Pleas, (Mansfield, C. J. being absent), in Hilary term 1811, so lately as the very term next before the decision in Fenton v. Goundry; but the cause had been tried before him, and a verdict had been given for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court as to the necessity of proving that the bill had been presented at the bankers for payment. As far as can be collected from both the reports of that case, the Court do not, on that occasion, appear to have had the case of Smith v. De la Fontaine laid before them; or to have considered, whether there was any known, established, declared, or generally received understanding or usage upon the subject among merchants. But they appear to have decided in that case entirely upon the dry construction and effect of the acceptance, as a mere engagement to pay the bill at a particular house named by the acceptor; treating it as a mere naked question of construction, arising from the words, independently of any inquiry as to the usage and custom among merchants respecting it. The case of Gummon v. Schmoll has, indeed, been since decided by the Court of Common Pleas, (Mansfield, C. J. being then also absent), in which that Court appear to have decided again, upon the mere construction of the words alone, that the acceptance contained a condition precedent.

In now considering the question, whether the acceptance in the present case be a general or a qualified acceptance, it appears to me, that, upon a question of this nature, it is an important inquiry and consideration, whether there was any, and what, generally received, declared, or known usage and custom among merchants, more especially, if any such had been ratified and confirmed in judicature by judges and jurors: and that alone appears to me to be in itself decisive of the [447] question, both upon the law and justice of the case. The parties thereto must, I think, be taken, in an instrument of a peculiarly commercial nature, both to have given and received this acceptance, (and consequently to have meant and understood it), according to such generally received, known, and declared understanding, and usage, and custom. After the decision of Smith v. De la Fontaine, both by the jury and the Court, especially when confirmed afterwards by Lyon v. Sandius, in the year 1808, it must, I think, be deemed, that there had been, upon the subject, both before, and up to, and during that period, and until the determination of Callaghan v. Aylett, a generally received and known opinion, and usage, and custom among merchants, by which those acceptances were meant and taken as general acceptances, with a mere intimation of a place for payment; and not as qualified acceptances, which might be refused: an opinion, usage, and custom ratified and confirmed by those judicial determinations; and continually acted upon, both before and during that period, by the constant reception of all such acceptances, without any instance being brought forward of the refusal of any, as being a qualified acceptance. In a question, therefore, as to the effect of such an acceptance, (which is, really, only a question, what the parties meant and understood by the acceptance, which the one had given and the other had received,) it must, as it appears to me, be taken, that the one of them meant, and that the other understood him to mean, by the acceptance so given and received, nothing but what was the generally received understanding upon the subject, of persons most generally giving and receiving such mercantile instruments, namely, merchants; especially when that had been inquired into, ascertained, determined, declared, and confirmed by judicial decisions.

But even if this supposed generally received understanding, usage, and custom, is to be considered as unascertained and uncertain, and that the effect of this acceptance is, for its construction, to be taken from itself alone; still I cannot but think, that it is to be deemed only as a general acceptance to pay, with an additional engagement or direction for the payment at the specified house. In this view of the question, the legal principles and rules of construction, as well as the nature [448] of an acceptance in itself, appear to me to be most material to be attended to.

Let us consider the nature of an acceptance in itself. The bill is brought merely for acceptance, that is to say, for a declared assent, that the acceptor will pay it according to the usage and custom of merchants. A mere declared assent by the drawee to pay, or any thing amounting thereto, is, in law, an acceptance. By the first word, "accepted," which is the thing which the very bringing of the bill requires the drawee to do, and which the drawer has a right to expect that the drawee will do, if he has effects in hand, which his acceptance of the bill implies:—I say, by the very first word, "accepted," the drawee has declared his assent to pay the bill; and, as I think, to pay it in such manner as the drawer has required, unless that which is added so qualifies this assent, as to be inconsistent with an assent to pay it as required. If it be not thus inconsistent upon the face of it, the holder is not to suppose that it was meant to do away or alter the effect of what the acceptor had before written and signified; and, if the acceptor did so mean, he should have so expressed himself, or should have stated, that he would not accept the bill as required, (that is, to pay it according to the usage and custom of merchants,) but that, though he would not so accept it, he would engage to pay it at such a particular place, if the holder would take that engagement.

The words of the acceptance are those of the drawee only, and not of the drawer or of the holder, and are to be taken, although according to the intent, yet where that is not sufficiently ascertained, most strongly against the person using those words. The maxim of law, verbo fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem, and Lord Bacon's observations thereon, appear to me very applicable to this case, supposing this to be considered as a mere question of construction. He says that this rule "is author of much quiet and certainty, and that in two sorts: first, because it favoureth acts and conveyances executed, taking them still beneficially for the grantees and possessors; and, secondly, because it makes an end of many questions and doubts about the construction of words: for, if the labour were only to pick out the intention of the parties, every judge would [449] have a several sense; whereas this rule doth give them a sway to take the law more certainly one way (Reg. 3)." This rule, I think, requires the drawee, especially where it is to defeat in any degree the rightful expectations of the drawer, that the bill shall be unqualifiedly accepted as he has drawn it; and where the drawee has, in the first instance, declared his assent to pay it, if he meant to qualify or do it away, or alter it in the whole, or in part, or to clog that which is yet absolute, with any condition not beneficial either to the drawer or to the bill-holder, this rule, in my opinion, requires the drawee, in such case, to use, in addition, such words as clearly and unequivocally express or show such qualification, alteration, or condition. If the acceptance in question be considered as qualified, it must be by construing it, as if the drawee had inserted, what he has omitted, the word "only;" and what, if he so meant, the rules of construction, I think, require that he should have stated. The words "payable at Sir John Perring and Co's, bankers, London," may mean either that the bill may be paid there, or an intimation that it will be paid there, (that is, if the holder bring it there); or it may be intended as an obligation binding also upon the holder, that it shall be paid there, and there only. But if the writer had meant the last, I think that, in order to bind the holder to consider that he did so mean, he should so have expressed himself.

For these reasons, I am of opinion, that the acceptance in question, so as aforesaid alleged in the declaration, is to be considered, not as a qualified, but as a general acceptance to pay, with an additional engagement or direction for the payment thereof at the specified house; and, consequently, that the holder was not bound to present it at that house for payment, and to aver, in the declaration, that the same was presented at that house for payment.

But supposing that this acceptance be to be considered as a qualified acceptance to pay the bill at the specified house, still the first question proposed to us involves a further question; for it would not, in my opinion, from thence follow, that the holder was bound to present it at that house for payment, and aver in the declaration that it was so presented; for I still [450] think, that the holder would not, even in that case, be by law bound so to present it, or so to aver in the declaration.

The acceptance, even taking it to be a qualified acceptance, is still, I think, an undertaking to pay the bill at a particular time and place, absolutely and at all events, and not subject to any expressed or implied condition, which must previously be performed by the holder. Upon a promise or undertaking, either to pay a bill of exchange or money, or to do any other particular act, whether at a particular time and place or not, the very non-feasance alone is a breach of the contract, and the promisee need do no more in support of his action for such breach than to prove the promise; the non-feasance being a negative, the feasance, or that which in law is an excuse for it, is matter purely of defence, and the onus probandi thereof lies upon the defendant. The person therefore, so promising or undertaking, in order to defend himself, must either establish, that he has done the thing according to his engagement, or he must excuse his non-performance. It is not sufficient for a defendant, in his excuse, to say, that the plaintiff was not present at the time and place to demand and receive the money; but he must, in order to defend himself, allege and prove, that he did all in his power towards the performance, and that his not doing more was owing to the refusal or default of the plaintiff. He must establish either a tender and refusal, or that he, the defendant, was ready at the time and place to pay, but that the plaintiff did not come, nor was present to receive. The circumstances excusing the non-performance, and throwing the fault on the plaintiff, are matters in defence. This appears, I think, by Lord Hobart's opinion in Baker v. Spain (Hob. 8), and by the resolution of the Court of Common Pleas, there cited, in Bushby's case, as to the payment of rent, which is payable on the land. So Littleton says (s. 340), "Also upon such case of feoffment in mortgage, a question hath been demanded, in what place the feoffor is bound to tender the money to the feoffee at the day appointed etc.!" And some have said upon the land so holden in mortgage, because the condition is depending upon the land. And they have said, that if the feoffor be upon the land there ready to pay the money to the feoffee at the day set, and the feoffee be not then there, then the feoffor is quit and [451] excused of the payment of the money; for that no default is in him. But it seemeth to some that the law is contrary, and that default is in him, for he is bound to seek the feoffee if he be then in any other place within the realm of England." The difference of opinion, there, was upon this point; viz. whether the mortgage-money was to be paid at a particular place, viz. upon the land, or not; but, in either case, whether it was to be there paid or not, the feoffor, who was to pay the money, was bound to do all in his power towards his performance, before he could be excused for his non-performance. If no time be fixed for the performance, then indeed the obligor, who is to pay the money at a particular place, is to do more (and this doctrine should be remembered when the case of Sanderson v. Bowes comes to be considered); he must, according to Co. Litt. (211. a.), "give the obligee notice, that, on such a day, at the place limited, he will pay the money, and then the obligee must attend there to receive it; for if the obligor then and there tender the money, he shall save the penalty of the bond for ever." Lord Coke then adds, "The same law it is, if a man make a feoffment in fee upon condition, if the feoffor, at any time during his life, pay to the feoffee £20 at such a place certain, that then, etc. In this case the feoffor must give notice to the feoffee when he will pay it; for without such notice as is aforesaid the tender will not be sufficient." In both these cases, therefore, in order to save the bond or feoffment, the obligor and feoffor must attend and be ready with the money at the place, though the obligee or feoffee be absent; for the tender of which he there speaks is a tender (or rather what he calls a tender), though the obligee or feoffee be absent; for he is speaking of a tender, which would not be an excuse without such notice; which is, therefore, a tender by the one in the absence of the other; and he immediately adds, "but in both these cases, if at any time the obligor or feoffor meet the obligee or feoffee at the place, he may tender the money." The forms of declaring, not only upon awards, but upon other instruments for the non-payment of money at a particular place, are confirmatory of this doctrine. In Rastell's Entries are three precedents; two in debt on bills obligatory for money to be paid at particular marts or fairs (ante, opinion of Richardson, J. pp. 427, 428), and the other for rent, payable at [452] a particular place on particular feasts (175). The declarations did not contain any allegation of presenting the bills for payment or any demand of the money at the marts, fairs, or place; but to one of those declarations, one upon some of the bills obligatory payable at different marts or fairs, the defendant pleaded that he was at the fairs ready to pay the plaintiff, if the plaintiff had been there, and would have delivered to him the bills aforesaid; and that neither the plaintiff, nor any for him, was then there to receive the same, with an allegation that he has been always since ready to pay, and a profert of the money into court. A bill of exchange, in an action against the acceptor, stands, I think, upon the same footing as a bill obligatory, or any other engagement for the payment of money, so far as regards the necessity of alleging in the declaration, or of proving at the trial, a presentment of the bill, or a demand of the money. In an action against the acceptor, where he accepts generally, such allegation is never made, nor such proof required or given; though such a presentment is, no doubt, usually made in fact in such cases, before the action is brought, yet the nature of the instrument itself (viz. a bill of exchange) has not rendered such an allegation or proof necessary, except where the action is brought to charge the drawer or indorser. The nature of the instrument, therefore, cannot, as it seems to me, make such allegation or proof more necessary where the acceptor adds a place for payment, than in other cases where the obligor or promiser adds a place for payment.

In either case, such allegation or proof is, I think, not requisite on the part of the plaintiff; but, if the defendant, or his bankers, or any one for him, had his money ready at the time and place, and would have paid it if the bill had been then and there presented for payment, it is matter of defence, and may be pleaded by him; which removes, I think, the hardship and mischief which, it is supposed, may result from not requiring an allegation and proof of presentment for payment at the specified place to be made and given by the plaintiff. Independently of the question of general or qualified acceptance, Lord Ellenborough and my brother Bayley, in Fenton v. Goundry, both of them acceded to and confirmed this reasoning, as will be seen [453] in 13 East (470 and 472). Their opinions, in that case, upon this point, appear to me to be material in showing, that the case of Sanderson v. Bowes, which was determined by the same judges very shortly afterwards, was determined on grounds not at all inconsistent with their opinions in their decision in Fenton v. Goundry. My brother Bayley, too, upon another occasion, at Nisi Prius, in Hilary term, 1809, in Wild v. Rennards (1 Camp. 425, note), held the same doctrine, that if a promissory note is made payable at a particular place, in an action against the maker, there is no necessity of proving that it was presented there for payment; and, in Michaelmas term 1810, in Nicholls v. Bowes (2 Camp. 498), Lord Ellenborough held the same. But it is said that the decision in Sanderson v. Bowes (11 East, 500), in Michaelmas term 1811, by the Court of King's Bench, and the decision of Bowes v. Howe (5 Taunt. 30), in Trinity term 1813, by the Court of Exchequer chamber, which is founded thereon, are inconsistent with this doctrine. The above precedents in Rastell were not known, or, at least, not brought forward in either of those two cases; and, if those two cases were not distinguishable from the present, but were so much in point as, at first, they may appear, it might be for consideration whether those cases were not still open to a revision, like the decisions which for a time prevailed in favour of actions upon legacies, and of actions against femes covert with separate maintenances. But, when those two cases come to be looked at and considered, they are, it appears to me, very distinguishable from the present, and also from Fenton v. Goundry, on this very point. In the present case, and in Fenton v. Goundry, the instrument declared on, a bill of exchange, was payable at a certain time. In Sanderson v. Bowes, and in Bowes v. Howe, the instrument declared on (a promissory note) was not payable at a particular time, but generally, entirely at the pleasure of the holder of the note, and so Lord Ellenborough observes (14 East, 501), where he distinguishes Sanderson v. Bowes from cases where money was to be paid, or something to be done at a particular time, as well as place. The cases of Sanderson v. Bowes, and Bowes v. Howe, were both cases of promissory notes of the Workington bank, payable on [454] demand to bearer at the workington bank. The notes being made payable to bearer, not at any specific time, but merely on his, the bearer's demand, the promisers could not comply with the above mentioned rule laid down in Co. Litt. (211. a.), of giving notice when they would pay the money at their bank, as they could not know who the bearer was till the money was *demand*ed. Nor was it to be paid but upon demand, which might, therefore, be deemed a condition precedent, quite consistently with my reasoning, and also, with Lord Ellenborough's and my brother Bayley's, as applicable to cases where the money was to be paid at a time and place certain; and, if the demand thus became in those two cases a condition precedent, the place as well as time of the demand must necessarily form a part of that condition, and may require to be averred, as it was in those two cases decided.

For these reasons, therefore, I think, even if the acceptance, as stated in the first count, be to be considered as a qualified acceptance, that the holder was not, in the present case, bound to present it at the house for payment, or aver in the declaration that the same was so presented.

In answer to the third question proposed by your Lordships, I think, that if A. draw a bill upon B. in favour of C. for £100, and C. without the previous authority or subsequent assent of A. take an acceptance for the bill for the whole of the £100, but an acceptance qualified as to the time or place of payment, C. could not maintain an action upon the bill against A.

In the case put by this question, the drawer has a right, I think, or at least may be considered as having reason to expect, either that his bill, if accepted, will be accepted to be paid in such manner as he has required, that is to say, according to the tenor and effect of the bill, and the usage and custom of merchants; or, that due notice will be given by the person taking the bill from him, according to such usage and custom, in case the bill be not so accepted. He may be injured, if the bill be not so accepted as he has required (primâ facie, at least, it is, I think, to be so considered); and, in default of such acceptance, he has a right, I think, to due notice of such default, in order that he may take such steps as he may think proper to [455] avert such possible injury. The holder may either receive or refuse a qualified acceptance. If he refuse, he must give due notice; and, if the bill be a foreign one, he must also protest it, in order to charge the drawer. If he do not refuse, but do receive the qualified acceptance, in that case, by assenting to the qualifications imposed by the acceptor in varying the time and place, he becomes party to a fresh and different contract with the acceptor, to which the drawer was neither party nor privy: the contract is an entirely new one, assuming a new shape; the bill is converted into and becomes a different or new bill, having a different tenor and effect from the old one, viz. such as the qualifications of the acceptance, either as to time or place, have ingrafted into it. C. by taking a different security, viz. this qualified acceptance, instead of having the one which the drawer had a right, or had reason to expect, and which C. was to require should be given him, has, I think, no right to maintain an action against the drawer upon this bill, the nature and effect of which has been altered by his having taken this qualified acceptance of it. In Boehm v. Garcias (1 Campb. 425, note), (sittings after Michaelmas term 1807,) it was held by Lord Ellenborough, that the drawee has no right to vary the acceptance from the terms of the bill, unless they be unequivocally and unambiguously the same: and, therefore, where an action was brought against the drawer on a bill drawn at Lisbon, payable in effectivè, and not in Fals reals, where the drawees offered to accept it, payable in Fals denaros, (another sort of currency, which was refused,) Lord Ellenborough held, that the plaintiff had a right to refuse this acceptance, though the defendant proposed to show, that Fals denaros were sufficient to answer what was meant by effective: and wherever the holder may refuse the acceptance by reason of its being qualified, (as he may, I think, wherever the same is qualified, either as to time or place,) he cannot, I think, if he take the acceptance, sue the drawer upon the bill.

In answer to the fourth question proposed by your Lordships, I think, that if A. was debtor to C. in £100 previous to his so drawing upon B. in favour of C. to the amount of £100, C. could, upon A.'s refusing his assent to an acceptance, qualified as mentioned in the third question, maintain an action upon [456] the original debt against A. without delivering to A. the bill so accepted: in case, at the time the bill was drawn, B. was also indebted to A. in a like sum of £100.

The bill itself, having been dishonoured, has become no satisfaction for the original debt: the right of action upon the original debt, therefore, remains; and though, if A. pay or tender to C. the original debt, with the expenses, etc. incurred upon the dishonoured bill, he will be entitled to have that bill delivered up again to him: yet, until A. has so done, the right to the bill, as it appears to me, which was given by him to C. as a security for, or in order to discharge that debt, remains in C. who may, I think, bring an action, either upon the original debt, or upon the bill; or may bring an action, including both those causes of action, in case they be of such a nature as to be capable of being joined together in one action. The original debt is not extinguished, but the right of action upon it remains, or is revived by reason of the dishonour of the bill; and C. I think, has a right to retain the bill, which was given to him as a security, or for the discharge of his debt, and to use it either as a ground of action in itself, or as a medium of proof for establishing his original debt: and the circumstance of B.'s being also indebted to A. in a like sum of £100 appears to me to make no difference as to C.'s rights of action; for A. only by doing what by law he is bound to do, (namely, by payment of his debt, etc. to C.) may entitle himself to the possession of the bill, and thereby avoid any injury, which he may, otherwise, sustain by the want of it in seeking his remedy against B. for the recovery of that debt.

PARK, J. With respect to the first question, as the bill of exchange is alleged to have been accepted according to the usage and custom of merchants, payable at a particular banker's in London, I am of opinion that the holder was bound to present it at that house for payment: and to aver in his declaration that the same was presented at that house for payment.

To come to that conclusion, it appears to me to be only necessary to consider who the parties to the contract are; and what contract the defendant on this record has entered into. The plaintiff, or the payee, it is true, originally took a bill drawn upon the defendant generally: but when the defendant had that bill presented to him for acceptance, he said by his [457] acceptance, I do not choose to enter into this general engagement, for my avocations may, at the time when the bill shall become due, call upon me to be in some distant part of the kingdom; and, therefore, both for your convenience and mine, I will specially accept it, payable at a particular banker's, or where my strong box or money is; and there you shall go for your money, and not follow and arrest me at a place where I have none: this is the defendant's contract. I admit that the holder might refuse to take such an acceptance; but, having taken it, can he enforce the contract against the contractor, without showing that the contractor has not complied with his own conditional acceptance? May not the acceptor justly say, if the holder should attempt to enforce it contrary to the acceptor's engagement, non habet in foedera veni? I think he may;

for, that the acceptor has a right to make a special acceptance, differing from that which the drawer had wished to impose upon him, as to time, place, or amount, is admitted by those who argue for the defendant in error. This has ever been considered as law from the time of Marius, who wrote in the sixteenth century on bills of exchange (Mar. p. 17, 1th ed.). The law upon these points, both as to the right of the drawee to make a special acceptance, and, as to the right of the holder to refuse it, is well stated, as your Lordships will find it, in Petit v. Benson (Comb. 452). If, then, the drawee may refuse to enter into any other than a special acceptance, when he has made it, and it is received by the holder, surely, it becomes as much the original contract of the acceptor as if he had written a promise to pay on certain conditions; or had promised to pay at a certain banker's, and no where else. The true sense of the case seems to be, and the principle is, that, whenever the place, at which the contractor is to perform it, forms a part of his express contract, and the duty is not merely collateral to it, it is necessary both to aver and prove a failure on that precise point on the part of the defendant. Thus, in 1 Rolle's Abridgment (Tit. Condition, p. 444, l. 7, and p. 445, l. 52), it is said, "If a place of payment is limited by the condition, the party is not bound to pay in any other place." Here, the duty is created by the instrument itself, with certain limits and qualifications. [458] No duty to be perfected by the acceptor arose anterior to the very instrument itself; and the acceptor can only be answerable to the extent of his engagement, by his qualified acceptance.

If we were to speak of the convenience of this or that practice, there can be no question that it would be most convenient that the presentment of the bill at the place where it is made payable should be deemed a condition precedent; for it would be very inconvenient that acceptors, such as the original defendant, should be made liable to answer every where, when it is notorious that they have made provision at a particular place, where alone they engage to pay. There is no antecedent duty as against the defendant, save that arising on the bill; and, therefore, the instrument or bill must be looked at for the purpose of seeing what the duty is.

This case has not been fitly compared to the case of bonds: for there the penalty creates the debt, and the party is liable upon it, but is to discharge himself from the penalty by bringing himself within the terms of the condition: that, therefore, must be matter of defence. But where a suit is in assumpsit upon a contract, the plaintiff must show that he has done every thing which lay upon him to do, in order to bring himself within the contract, and entitle him to sue upon it. Now here, by the terms of this acceptance, a promise is made by the acceptor to pay at Perring and Co.'s: the plaintiff, who sues, then must bring himself within those terms, by showing that he made a demand at the place where the defendant said he would pay; and he cannot be made liable beyond the extent of his contract. Where a defendant contracts generally to pay a sum of money, he is liable to a creditor every where; but, where a person binds himself to pay at a particular place, he is not liable at any other place, till default be made at the particular place. For, otherwise, suppose a bill drawn upon one just before going the circuit (and this case is put by one of the most learned judges who ever adorned the Court of Common Pleas, I mean Mr. Justice Chambre (In Gummon v. Schmoll, 5 Taunt. 350)), which will fall due during the absence of such drawee; such a person living in chambers leaves no servant on his departure, excepting, perhaps, a laundress; what can be done in such a case, except to deposit the money with [459] a banker, and make the bill payable at that banker's? Otherwise such person would be liable to be arrested at any place in the course of his journey, where he might have no money, which, indeed, he would be the less likely to have after making provision at his banker's. I agree with that learned judge, that it is a great convenience to the public to maintain these special acceptances.

But, it is said at the bar, if you can show that you had your money at your banker's, you would have a complete defence. Is it, then, no vexation to be causelessly arrested? Is a lawsuit no vexation? Is it nothing to be £20 or £30 out of pocket, though you gain your cause? And this evil is only met by the trifling inconvenience of an obligation on the plaintiff to call a witness to prove a presentment. Indeed, if we speak of inconvenience, it is all the other way; for, instead of the trifling inconvenience arising to a holder from the necessity of calling one witness, to prove a presentment, every banker must, if the other view of the case be adopted, keep a number of clerks to go daily to all parts of the town, for the purpose of receiving payment of bills. So greatly was this inconvenience felt, that the Bank of England will not discount any bill that is not payable at a banker's.

But we have been told at the bar that the weight of authority is against the plaintiff in error. Let us examine the cases, and see whether the decisions in the Court of King's Bench, and one or two at nisi prius, before Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, carry with them the same weight of reason as those decided by the Court of Common Pleas sitting in bank; or, whether the Court of King's Bench has, in this respect, been consistent with itself.

The first case is Smith v. De la Fontaine, of which there is a short note in my brother Bayley's Treatise on Bills of Exchange (p. 129, note b. 3d ed.); however, a more full account is given of it in a note to Mr. Holt's nisi prius cases (p. 366), which is taken from a manuscript of my brother Holroyd; and there seems no doubt, that in 1785 Lord Mansfield at nisi prius, and the Court of King's Bench afterwards, decided, that words similar to those here used were not words restricting or qualifying the acceptor's [460] liability, but rendering him liable generally; and that it was not necessary to prove a demand at the particular place in an action against the acceptor. But how has this been followed up? Lyon v. Sundius (1 Camp. 422) is a mere nisi prius opinion, before the decisions of either Callaghan v. Aylett, or Fenton v. Goundry. Then came the case of Fenton v. Goundry (13 East), in which the Court undoubtedly held that doctrine which is now under discussion; and which treated an acceptance like the present not as a conditional acceptance, but as a mere expansion of the promise to pay. But how is that consistent with the doctrine laid down in Parker v. Gordon (7 East, 385), by two of the Judges (Lord Ellenborough, C. J. and Grose, J.), who were parties to the decision of Fenton v. Goundry? Parker v. Gordon was an action against the drawer; and I, therefore, do not quote the case as an authority, except to show that such words as these were considered as a special acceptance. "If a party (says Lord Ellenborough in the last mentioned case) choose to take an acceptance at an appointed place, it is to be presumed that he will inform himself of the proper time for receiving payment at such place, and he must apply accordingly." And, in Elford v. Teed (1 M. and S. 28), his Lordship says that the case of Parker v. Gordon was conformable with the doctrine which he had usually held. Lawrence, J. says, in Parker v. Gordon, "The party might have refused to take the special acceptance; but if he choose to take the acceptance in that manner, payable at the banker's, does he not agree to take it payable at the usual banking hours?" And Le Blanc, J. says, in the same case, "If a party will take an acceptance, payable at a banker's, he must present it at a proper time, according to the known method of conducting the banking business; otherwise the greatest inconveniences to trade would ensue."

Two very modern cases have been quoted to your Lordships to show that Lord Chief Justice Gibbs concurred with the decision of the Court of King's Bench in Fenton v. Goundry; namely, the cases of Head v. Sewell, and Richards v. Lord Milsington (Holt, N. P. C. 363). I will speak of Head v. Sewell first. It is sufficient to observe, that it was only a nisi prius case; next, it is so singular a case, that either the note is incorrect, or the [461] opinion of the Lord Chief Justice is not delivered with that very learned person's usual accuracy and precision. For, in the year 1816, he begins his observations by saying, that after thirty-five years experience he had never known the objection to prevail, and therefore could not admit the necessity of the proof. What! had he not known of the case of Callaghan v. Aylett, decided in 1811, five years before, in the Common Pleas, by Mr. Justice Heath, Mr. Justice Lawrence, and Mr. Justice Chambre, as eminent persons as ever sat on that bench; and which case, in consequence of its having been much opposed the following term in Fenton v. Goundry, made them the common talk in Westminster Hall? Had he not heard of the case of Gannon v. Schmoll, then quoted to him, and decided two years before, in the very same Court by his then colleagues, Mr. Justice Heath, Mr. Justice Chambre, and the very learned person who afterwards succeeded him in the Chief Justiceship, in both of which cases the objection prevailed? And then again, though his Lordship is stated to have said, that he never knew the objection prevail, he concludes by saying he knows there are conflicting cases. The other case of Richards v. Lord Milsington he decides that he may preserve his own consistency in a former case of Price v. Mitchell (4 Camp. 200); but, upon looking at that case, it will be found a mere memorandum at the foot of a note, which never was held to be a condition, but a mere memorandum or direction. I, therefore, do not consider these cases as adding much weight to the authority of the King's Bench.

But I find the King's Bench, in Sanderson v. Bowes (11 East, 500), which was confirmed by an unanimous judgment in the Exchequer chamber (Bowes v. Howe, 5 Taunt. 30), deciding diametrically opposite to the case of Fenton v. Goundry; and every word of the judgment of that great and eminent judge Lord Ellenborough is, in my mind, conclusive in favour of the plaintiff in error. Agreeing, as I do, with the learned editor of the Treatise on Bills of Exchange (Bayley on Bills, 185, note 1, 3d ed.), that it is difficult to reconcile in principle with the case of Sanderson v. Bowes, that of Fenton v. Goundry; and Sanderson v. Bowes, being the last in decision, ratified by the decision of the twelve Judges of England, and most agreeable to good sense, reason, and convenience, I think that it ought to prevail. The only [462] difference between Sanderson v. Bowes, and this case is, that Sanderson v. Bowes was an action against the maker of a promissory note; this case is against the acceptor of a bill of exchange; but I need not inform your Lordships, that the Courts in Westminster Hall have long thought the analogy between notes and bills so strong, that the rules established as to one ought also to prevail as to the other; Heglyu v. Adamson (2 Burr. 669), Brown v. Harraden (1 T. R. 118), fully prove this position. Then let us read the case of Sanderson v. Bowes; and if "bill" be read for "note," is not every word of Lord Ellenborough's luminous reasoning decisive of the present question! In that case the Court of King's Bench held presentment at the banking-house necessary. Bowes v. Howe (5 Taunt. 30), contains the affirmation of this proposition, though there was a reversal upon another point in that particular cause. And, in conformity to that opinion, Lord Ellenborough, in a subsequent case of Roche v. Campbell (3 Camp. 247), held, that it was a fatal variance in a declaration not to state that the note was payable at a particular place where the note was so payable. And his Lordship's language is peculiarly emphatical and applicable to this case: for he says, "This declaration represents the promissory note as containing an absolute and unqualified promise to pay the money. But, by the instrument produced, the maker only promises to pay upon the specific condition that the payment is demanded at a particular place. We have lately held (alluding to Sanderson v. Bowes) that where the place of the payment is mentioned in the body of the note it forms a material part of the instrument." So, here, the acceptor only undertakes to pay upon the specific condition that the payment is demanded at a particular place; this, and no other, is the contract of the acceptor.

Having thus shown the inconsistency of these decisions, and that Sanderson v. Bowes has not only had the judgment of the King's Bench in favour of that opinion, which I presume to deliver, but the confirmation, as to this point, of the whole Exchequer Chamber, can I hesitate in saying, that the strong current of authority is in favour of the plaintiff in error, when I add, the authority of Judges Heath, Lawrence, and Chambre, [463] in Callaghan v. Aglett, declaring that, doubtless, there may be a qualified acceptance of a bill which a holder is not bound to receive, but, that if he acquiesce in it, he must conform to the terms of the acceptance; and the further authority of Judges Heath, Chambre, and Dallas, in Gawmon v. Schmoll. Mr. Justice Heath (in Gawmon v. Schmoll, 5 Taunt. 353), treats it as a condition precedent, which must be shown to be performed. The reasoning of Mr. Justice Chambre does not seem to have been sufficiently adverted to; and nobody will deny his ability as a lawyer, and his great skill as a pleader. That learned Judge says, "I think the case is clear, upon rules of plain common sense and understanding, without going into all the cases. A man is not bound to receive a limited and qualified acceptance; he may refuse it, and resort to the drawer; but, if he do receive it, he must conform to the terms of it." "What is the meaning of these words, accepted, payable at? They have a meaning; they impose a condition; and the person receiving such an acceptance must comply with the condition, and in pleading must show his compliance. It would greatly circumscribe the negotiation of bills of exchange if this were not so; for they would, instead of being of general accommodation, be restrained in their use to such persons in trade as have a fixed place of business. I have already endeavoured to show your Lordships that the inconvenience to holders of bills and to bankers would become ruinous by the number of clerks which they must employ, if such an acceptance is to be held to make the acceptor universally liable.

On these authorities, and upon the principles of common sense and understanding, I am of opinion, on the first question, that the holder was bound to present this bill at Sir John Perring's house for payment, and to aver that it was so presented.

As to the second question, viz. whether such an acceptance is to be considered in law as a qualified acceptance, I answer, that the whole of my reasoning, with which I have troubled your Lordships, is founded upon the affirmative of that proposition. All the text writers upon bills of exchange are clear on this point. I take it, that any acceptance varying from [464] the absolute tenor of that which the drawer expected by the language which he used in drawing the bill, either in the sum, the time, the place, or the mode of payment, is a conditional acceptance, which the holder is not bound to receive; but, if he do, the acceptor is liable for no more than he has undertaken. This doctrine of qualified acceptance, as to part of the money, is spoken of in Marius (pp. 17, 21), and in Molloy (b. 2, ch. 10, s. 21). So, in the latter book, a partial acceptance as to time is mentioned (Id. s. 28). This is confirmed in Beawes's Lex Mercatoria (p. 481, 4th ed. fol.), and by Mr. Justice Bayley (Bayley on Bills, pp. 85, 86, 3d ed.). It was treated as a qualified acceptance in Sanderson v. Bowes; and by Mr. Justice Lawrence, in Parker v. Gordon; and again in Callaghan v. Aylett, and Gannon v. Schmoll, in the Common Pleas: I therefore feel no difficulty in stating to your Lordships, that I conceive this to be a conditional acceptance.

The third question, in my view of the case, is not of difficult solution. Marius supposes (p. 17), that if the holder take from the acceptor an acceptance, even for a part only of the money drawn for, he may do so, provided he protests and gives notice to the drawer, and the bill is not thereby void; nor, according to what he says in page 21, does it prevent the holder from having recourse against the drawer. This is stated in the case of so material a change as a defalcation of part of the sum drawn for. But to the case put by your Lordships, I answer, that, if the qualification, either as to time or place, works neither injury nor inconvenience to the drawer, the holder is not prevented (in case of non-payment) from his remedy against the drawer, because he has taken such qualified acceptance. In the case out of which this question arises it neither produces the one nor the other: but it is a custom productive of great convenience to every one concerned in trade, and without which qualification bills of exchange are not discountable.

As to the fourth question, I am of opinion, that C. could not maintain his action for the original debt against A. the drawer, without delivering up to him the bill so accepted. Because, having once accepted such bill in lieu of and in satisfaction of his debt, he cannot recover for the original debt without relin-[465]-quishing the supposed security: which, being an acceptance by B. (whom the question supposes to be indebted to the drawer,) will amount, at all events, to an acknowledgment of the debt. For, although it is not always true that the drawee is a debtor of the drawer, yet perhaps, when the drawee accepts, it is prima facie evidence of a debt. The case of Kearslake v. Morgan (5 T. R. 513), where it was held, that to an action for goods sold and delivered, it was a good plea to say that the defendant had indorsed to the plaintiff a promissory note, payable to him, the defendant, "for and on account of" the said debt, is not inapplicable to this question, to show that C. could not maintain an action for his original debt while he held in his hands a bill given to him by the defendant to that amount. I, therefore, answer to the fourth question, in the negative.

BAYLEY, J. In answer to the first question, I submit that the effect of such an acceptance is this, that to entitle the holder to sue the drawer or indorser, it casts an obligation upon him to present the bill at Sir John Perring and Co.'s for payment, and to aver in his declaration, that the same was so presented; but that, as against the acceptor himself, the holder is not bound so to present it; that he is under no obligation to aver any such presentment in his declaration; and that the only consequence of his neglect to present is this, that the acceptor may set up any loss he has sustained thereby as matter of defence. This question is raised upon a demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration. The point, therefore, is not whether a neglect to present may not, even as against an acceptor, in some cases, constitute a defence, but whether the presentment is or is not an essential part of the plaintiff's title. A presentment is a demand at the place of payment, and to determine this point, the rules which the law has laid down as to cases in which a demand is or is not necessary, must be considered. One of these rules I take to be this, that where a man engages to pay upon demand what is to be considered his own debt, he is liable to be sued upon that engagement, without any previous demand; and that a tender or readiness to pay must come by way of defence from the defendant; but that if he engage to pay upon demand what was not his debt, what he is [466] under no obligation to pay, what but for such engagement he would never be liable to pay to any one, a demand is essential, and part of the plaintiff's title. If a man make a note payable on demand, it is settled by law that a special demand need not be stated in the declaration, nor proved upon the trial. And what is the reason? Because the note is considered as given for what is to be considered the party's own debt. In common actions of assumpsit the promise is always stated to be to pay when thereto afterwards requested; yet a special request is never stated or proved; and the distinction in this respect is correctly taken in Birks v. Trippet (1 Saund. 33, a). That case was assumpsit on a promise to pay £10 upon request, if the defendant did not perform an award between him and the plaintiff: the defendant pleaded a bad plea, to which there was a demurrer: and then Saunders, for the defendant, objected, that the plaintiff had not laid any request of the penalty of £10. "For the declaration is, that the defendant promised to pay upon request, if he did not perform the award; and the request is material, for he took a difference between a mere duty and a collateral sum. For where a mere duty is promised to be paid upon request, as if, in consideration of all monies lent to the defendant, he promised to pay them again upon request, no actual request is necessary, but the bringing of the action is a sufficient request; but otherwise it is upon a promise to pay a collateral sum upon request: for there an actual request ought to be made before the action brought. Now here the promise of payment of £10 upon request is collateral, and is a penalty, and not a precedent duty, and therefore there ought to have been a request before the action brought;" and of that opinion was the whole Court, and judgment was given for the defendant. There are many other cases (see 1 Wms.'s Saund. 33, a, note 2) to the same effect, but the principle is so well established that it is unnecessary to cite them. Another rule upon the subject of demands I take to be this: that the fixing a special time and place for payment will not make an actual demand at that time and place necessary, as part of the plaintiff's title in a case, in which, otherwise, the demand would not be necessary; but that in that case also a tender or readiness to pay at the time and place is matter of defence, and of defence [463] * only. An award directs money to be paid at a given time and place. In an action on such award, does the declaration allege any demand at that time or place? certainly not. Upon an application inde for an attachment, is not the attachment constantly granted, though personal demand was not made at the time or place; and though attendance at the time or place is not stated? In assumpsit on the award the declaration would be, that the defendant promised to perform the award, and that the award directed payment at a given time and place: in substance, therefore, (incorporating the promise and the award together,) it is a promise to pay what is properly a debt of the defendant's at a given time and place; and yet the declaration never states either attendance by the plaintiff at the place, or a demand by the plaintiff at the place: the utmost which it states is, that the defendant did not pay at the time or place, or at any other time or place. To debt on bond, the defendant, after oyer of the condition of the bond, which was the performance of an award, pleaded no award made. The plaintiff replied an award made directing the defendant to pay the plaintiff £66 at his house at Seven Oaks, on the 22d October, between the hours of ten and twelve; but that the defendant did not pay the £66, which he ought to have paid on that day, according to the form and effect of the award (Lutw. 558). There are three precedents to this effect in Mr. Caldwell's book upon Awards (pp. 318, 322, 323), the first in assumpsit, the other two in debt; and there are many similar precedents in other books. The first stated, that an action had been brought to recover a balance of account; that the cause was referred, that each party undertook to the other to perform the award; and that the award was, that the defendants should pay £ , being the balance of account due from the defendants, at the office of L. and M., situated in, etc. between ten and twelve o'clock, etc. Whereof defendants had notice; yet they did not pay the plaintiffs the said sum, or any part thereof, on, etc. at the said office of L. and M., or elsewhere, or at any other time whatever: although defendants afterwards, viz. on, etc. at, etc. were required by plaintiffs so to pay the same. The second stated, that differences had arisen, and were referred; that the arbitrator [464] awarded; that on a balance of all accounts between the parties, there was due and owing from defendant to plaintiff £61 10s. which he directed to be paid on the 10th of June, between eleven and one, at the house of one G. H. plaintiff's attorney, whereof defendant had notice; yet defendant did not pay the same, or any part thereof, at the time and place appointed for the payment thereof as aforesaid; nor hath he since paid the same, but hath wholly failed, and made default, whereby an action hath accrued, etc.—Now, upon what principle do these declarations omit to state attendance at the place, or demand at the place? Clearly upon this, that the money awarded to be paid became a debt from the defendant; that he was under a general obligation to pay, and not confined to time or place; and that, therefore, attendance at time and place was not part of the plaintiff's title: but readiness to pay at time and place was matter only of defence. Mr. Caldwell, (p. 194), lays it down, that where the money is to be paid at a certain time and place, the plaintiff must aver that he attended there at the time appointed, and remained until the period within which payment was to be made: but this position is evidently founded on a mistaken notion of the case of Phillips v. Knightly (Fitzg. 53. 1 Barnard. 84): there, according to Fitzgibbon, the plaintiff was, upon receiving the money, to give the defendant a covenant of indemnity; there were, therefore, to be two concurrent acts: viz. the payment of the money, and giving of the covenant; and the plaintiff could not sue for money without showing a readiness on his part to give the covenant, which he had not done. This case, therefore, is not at variance with the established precedents, and I have only noticed it, that a mistake in a useful book may be corrected. Another class of cases which I will mention, are cases of rents. Rent is reserved in some cases generally, and then the proper place for the payment, the place appointed by law, is the land out of which it issues. In some cases it is expressly made payable at some other place: and yet, in either case, is there a precedent either in debt on the reddendum, or in covenant, of an averment that the plaintiff was at the time and place to demand it? The declaration in such cases is always general, that on such a day so much of the said rent became due and in [465] arrear, and that defendant, although often requested, had not paid. So, in covenant upon a mortgage deed to pay the mortgage-money on a given day, in Lincoln's-Inn Hall, or in any other place: or in debt upon a single bill to pay money for a past consideration, at a given place, the declaration never alleges attendance or demand by the plaintiff, but merely alleges non-payment by the defendant. Now, what can be the principle of all these cases? What but this, that the money to be paid is a debt from the defendant; that it is due generally and universally; that it will continue due, though there be a neglect on the part of the creditor to attend at the time and place to receive: that it is matter of defence on the part of the defendant to show that he was in attendance to pay, but that the plaintiff was not in readiness to receive; and that defence will, generally speaking, be in bar of damages only, not in bar of the debt, and must be accompanied with a bringing of the debt into court. The instances in which this is made matter of defence will throw light upon the point. Most of those instances occur in demands for rent; but no distinction in principle can be drawn between cases of rent, and cases of other debts. I will mention some of these cases.—Lease for years, rendering £10 (22 H. 6. 57. Pl. 7) yearly at Easter, and for performing of covenants, each bound in £20. Non-payment of rent at Easter, and therefore the £20 claimed. Plea, ready to pay at the day on the land, and no one attended to receive; and the plea was held good. In Kidwelly v. Brand (Plowd. 69. Dyer, 68. a.), rent of land at Lomer was reserved, payable at Hlde; and the question was, whether the landlord could re-enter for non-payment of rent without demand: it was adjudged (though there are cases since to the contrary) that he might: the reason given is, that the rent being made payable at a place off the land, it lost its character of rent, and became like a sum in gross, and then it was the tenant's duty to offer it, not the landlord's to demand; "Lessee ought to offer it for his own indemnity, as the obligor ought upon an obligation, or as the grantor of an annuity ought to offer the annuity at the day, to excuse himself of damages." Buskin v. Edwards (Cro. El. 415. 535) corrects that case, by showing, that a [466] payment due from a tenant still remained a rent, though made payable at the Royal Exchange in London. The propriety of what is said in Plowden, in case it had been a sum in gross, is not questioned. The inference, then, to be fairly drawn from the case in Plowden, corrected as it is by the case in Croke Elizabeth, is this, that if a sum in gross be made payable at a certain time and place, and the sum is properly a debt from the person who is to pay it, it is his duty to attend at the time and place, and offer it; but it is not the duty of the person who is to receive it to demand it; and yet the offer is essential to protect him, not against payment of the sum itself, (which, as being due, ought to be paid) but against damages.

In Brooke's Abridgment (Dette, pl. 216) is this position:—"In debt for rent, tender on the land and refusal of plaintiff is no plea, for he shall answer to the debet; but the contrary is avowry; for there is to be a return, and there ought not to have been distress if tender was made." Now what is the meaning of this passage? evidently this, that in debt it is no plea in bar of the action; it is a bar of damages only, not of the debt; and, therefore, he must answer to the debet by bringing the money into the court upon the tender, which in the case of a plea in bar to an avowry he need not do. Brownlow v. Herley (1 Lord Raym. 82) is an authority to show that, upon a plea of tender on the land at the day in an action of debt, the rent must be brought into court; and Horne v. Lewin (Id. 639, Salk. 583) to show, that upon a plea in bar to an avowry it need not be brought into court. In Osburn v. Beversham (1 Vent. 322, 3 Keb. 800, 2 Lev. 209), in debt for rent, the plea was readiness at time and place, and ever since, and prefest of the money. To this plea there was a demurrer, grounded on two objections. 1st, Non obtulit, for when time and place are certain, semper paratus without an obtulit is no plea. 2d, It is pleaded in bar generally; it should have been in bar of damages only; and the Court thought both objections good. Levinz makes a query on the first ground, because the rent is demandable, (i.e. Plaintiff should have demanded it,) "otherwise," says he, "of a sum in gross, which is payable without demand." In Crouch v. Fastolfe (S. T. Raym. 118) cited yesterday, by my brother Richardson, to debt [467] for rent, there was a plea of attendance at the day and place; that the defendant was ready to pay; and that no one came to receive. To this plea there was a demurrer, because tender was not alleged; but it was resolved to be well enough, and adjudged for the defendant. A precedent of such a plea is in Thompson's Entries (Lib. Placit. 150); however, in Horne v. Lewin (Lord Raym. 641) a paratus without an obtulit was held insufficient. It is immaterial to the point which I am considering, whether there ought to be a tender or not, and quite sufficient for my view of the subject, if with a tender it would be a bar of damages. Now what are the legal conclusions which I draw, and the legal positions which I consider as resulting from the authorities with which I have troubled your Lordships? They are these, that, if a man, in respect of any debt which he owes, engage to pay it upon demand, or engage to pay at a given time and place, it is not a necessary part of the plaintiff's title to make such demand, or attend at such time and place; that he is not bound in his declaration to state any such demand or attendance; that a neglect to demand or attend will not bar his right to the debt, and enable the defendant to keep it; but that the defendant may show readiness on his part to exonerate himself from any damages.

I now come to apply these principles to bills of exchange. The acceptor is, by the law and custom of merchants, considered as the principal debtor; the drawer and indorser as sureties only, liable on his default, and not otherwise. His engagement is general, that he will pay; that of the drawer and indorsers is conditional, namely, that if due diligence be used, they will pay, if the acceptor does not. The engagement of the acceptor is, either that he has effects in hand, or that he is secure of having them by the time the bill becomes due. In the language of the Lord Chief Justice Eyre, "The theory of a bill of exchange is, that the bill is an assignment to the payee of a debt due from the acceptor to the drawer, and the acceptance imports that the acceptor is a debtor to the drawer, or at least has effects of the drawer's in his hands." The acceptor, therefore, has, or ought to have, in his hands, or under his control, the fund by which payment ought to be [468] made; and it is his duty so to apply it. The drawer or indorsers have no control over the fund, and consequently no duty with respect to it. This difference of situation and character between the drawer and indorsers and acceptors, has produced a settled distinction in the manner of suing them. The action against drawer and indorser invariably shows that due diligence has been used; the action against the acceptor invariably omits it. In an action against the drawer and indorsers the declaration invariably avers presentment of the bill, its dishonour, and notice thereof to the defendant. In an action against the acceptor no such averments are made. Every bill is to be properly presented for payment; and in an action thereon against the drawer or indorser, a presentment according to the usage and custom of merchant must be averred and proved. In an action thereon against the acceptor, presentment (generally speaking) need not be averred or proved. This is clear, settled, undisputed law. Not that in practice such presentment is likely to be omitted: the risk of losing the responsibility of the drawer and indorsers generally secures it: but if there were to be an omission, that is no reason why the acceptor, who has, or ought to have, funds to discharge it, should keep those funds to himself, or should refuse so to apply them.

If a bill be addressed to A. in Bedford-square, and he accept it generally, in an action against the drawer or indorser presentment must be alleged and proved: in an action against A. presentment need not be alleged or proved. If A. have changed his residence, and accepted it payable at his new abode, does this make any difference?—presentment need not be averred in the one case—need it be averred in the other? If the necessity exist, there must be some reason for it. What is that reason? Though I am putting the case where the bill is still payable at the party's own house, and this is the case where the bill is made payable at a banker's, does this make any difference: does it vary the character or situation of the acceptor, so as to put him in the situation of a surety only instead of a principal, and if due diligence be not used, exonerate him from all liability, and enable him to keep the money to himself? The form of the acceptance in this case is material. The declaration states it thus: "Which bill of ex-[469] change, he the said Joshua accepted, according to the said usage and custom of merchants, payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s, bankers, London: that is to say, at the house of certain persons using in trade and commerce the names, style, and firm of Sir John Perring and Co., bankers, London." By whom the bill is to be paid at Sir John Perring and Co.'s, whether by the defendant, or by Sir John Perring and Co., the acceptance does not state: whether Sir John Perring and Co. were bankers for the defendant is not stated. In the first place, it is not in a form to require Sir John Perring and Co. to pledge their credit for the payment of the bill: it is at most only an authority to them to pay; and, unless Sir John Perring and Co. choose to make themselves responsible, they can never be sued for the money. Why it is to be paid there; whether, because Sir John Perring and Co. were the defendant's bankers, or because he was an inmate or member of that house, is not stated. I will take it, however, for granted, for the sake of argument, that it is made payable there, because Sir John Perring and Co. were the defendant's bankers. Sir John Perring and Co. then, are to be agents for the defendants in this transaction. Will making the bill payable at an agent's change the situation of the acceptor, and make it incumbent on the holder, in an action against the acceptor, to aver and prove presentment at such agent's, when they would not be bound to aver or prove presentment at the acceptors? That such presentment will generally be made there can be no doubt, because, otherwise, the security of the drawer and indorsers will be lost: but though presentment is in fact made, there may be cases in which the party may fail in proving it. The party presenting the bill may remove out of the reach of the holder, or may die. Is it right, or is it law, that because the holder fails in that link of evidence he is to lose his debt? Before the necessity of such averment is established I wish to draw your Lordships attention to the consequence. If the effect of such an acceptance be to make this averment and proof essential, it follows, that the holder has a right to object to this burthen, and reject the acceptance. Right to reject is admitted in Bishop v. Chitty, Callaghan v. Aylett, and in Gammon v. Schmoll (per Chambre and Dallas, Js.). Will this [470] produce no confusion in the course of trade, when this mode of acceptance prevails to such an extent as it does? The bill is generally left for acceptance at the house of the drawee by a clerk, and called for on the next morning. Suppose a party leaves a bill drawn on the drawee generally, at the house of the drawee, and that on calling for it he finds it accepted, payable at a banker's: if this mode of acceptance cast an additional burthen on him, he may take away the bill, strike out the acceptance, treat it as dishonoured, protest it, if it be a foreign bill, and at once commence actions upon it against all the parties. It may be said that this has never yet been done, and that the apprehension is chimerical. But why has it not been done? Because it has been, for a series of years, the rooted understanding in commerce, that an acceptance at a banker's throws no additional burthen upon the holder; but that it is merely an intimation that there the acceptor would be ready to pay it: once establish, that such an acceptance is conditional, and that the burthen of proving presentment at the banker's is thrown on the holder, and from that moment every such acceptance must be rejected. What will the drawer and indorser say! They will say, "If you take such an acceptance you do it at your peril; and we are discharged." The acceptor has no right by the acceptance which he takes to cast a burthen upon them. They are entitled to expect that if any acceptance is taken, it shall be such an acceptance as does not make such additional averment and proof essential. Taking such an acceptance, then, if it has the effect contended for, would discharge them, unless they had immediate notice of such acceptance, and assented thereto. It may be said, that notice then may be given to them; but will your Lordships come to a decision which imposes on the holder the necessity of giving notice to all the parties to the bill? If I were to state, that there are daily in London one hundred such acceptances given, I should speak far within the truth. If these acceptances be conditional, notice ought to be daily sent by the post to the drawer and indorsers of each bill, not that the bill is dishonoured, but that it is accepted payable at a banker's. The fact that no such notice is given, notwithstanding the prevalence of such acceptances, and the perfect acquiescence therein, shows stronger even than positive authorities what [471] has been the understanding, usage, and custom of the mercantile world concerning them; and, bills of exchange being mercantile instruments in daily occurrence, if they have received a mercantile construction, the construction put on them by the mercantile world ought to be their construction in a court of law.

I have troubled your Lordships so much at length on the principles which, in my view, govern this case, that I shall address the house but shortly on the decisions. The point came first before the Court (as far as we can learn from printed reports) in Smith v. De la Fontaine: that case was tried before Lord Mansfield, in 1785, and from that time to the year 1806 the question does not appear to have been agitated. Then came Callaghan v. Ayllett, in 1811, in which the decision was adverse to that of Smith v. De la Fontaine. The case of Callaghan v. Ayllett was in the same year followed by that of Fenton v. Goundry; and I will only excuse the Court of King's Bench for coming to a decision on that case, (adverse as it was to the decision in Callaghan v. Ayllett) at the moment, because Lord Ellenborough (and that learned person, while at the bar, had most extensive experience in cases of bills of exchange) laid the foundation of his judgment in Fenton v. Goundry on the invariable usage, to which he adverted in energetic language: on that ground only the Court of King's Bench did not take time to consider in that case.

The case of Fenton v. Goundry was followed by that of Gannon v. Schmolli, which I will only notice on account of the case of inconvenience there put by Chambre, J., and to the case put by him I will add one or two other supposed cases. A bill is brought to me for acceptance just as I am setting off for the circuit; I tell the holder that I am going to be absent from town, and that I can only accept the bill payable at my bankers; he refuses this acceptance, on the ground that it will give him additional trouble and inconvenience; and the bill is consequently dishonoured. Suppose the case of a bill drawn in the West Indies, on a merchant in England, who accepts it payable at a banker's: the merchant finding the bill not debited to him, supposes there may have been some neglect on the part of the holder, but finds the bill protested for non-acceptance; that the person who presented it for accept-[472]-ance was a notary; that the acceptance has been struck out, and the bill returned to the drawer in the West Indies; and that the holder has recovered 20 per cent., or whatever difference may have been occasioned by the existing rate of exchange beyond the nominal amount of the bill.

Many of the principles now insisted on may seem at variance, I admit, with the decision in Sanderson v. Boves, and the other cases on promissory notes. I could distinguish those cases from Fenton v. Goundry; for in the latter case, the acceptance payable at the place was no part of the original conformation of the bill itself; but, in the former cases, the words restrictive of the payment were incorporated in the original form of the instrument. But I do not wish to answer those cases on these grounds; for I am free to confess that I doubt the propriety of those decisions, although I was myself a party to them; and I think it more manly to say, that I consider my opinions in those cases erroneously formed, than to attempt to distinguish those cases from Fenton v. Goundry, by the use of nice and subtle differences. I hope, therefore, that the case of Sanderson v. Bowes will not be followed as a precedent; for, as far as I can judge, the principles for which I have been contending apply to promissory notes as well as bills of exchange. The case of Bishop v. Chitty (Str. 1195), proceeded partly, and I think, principally, on the ground that there was actual laches on the part of the holder, and laches which prejudiced the acceptor. In that case, the acceptance was, "Messrs. Caswell and Mount, pay this bill when due, for Thomas Chitty;" it was, therefore, in a form entitling the holder to call upon Caswell and Mount to pledge their responsibility for the payment of the bill. In the case before the Court the holder has no right to call upon Sir John Perring and Co. to pledge their responsibility for payment; nor can they be sued if they refuse to pay it; there is no privity between them and the holder: this principle is established in the case of Williams v. Everett (14 East, 582). In Bishop v. Chitty, the bill fell due on the 2d of January, and Caswell and Mount paid till the 19th of that month, and the bill was not presented till the 21st: Lee, C. J. held, that it was the loss of the plaintiff; for this acceptance was in the nature of a draft, [473] which is always considered as actual payment, when a reasonable time to receive it is elapsed. The form, therefore, of the acceptance in that case, which was in the nature of a draft on Caswell and Mount, and the neglect of the holder to call to receive it, distinguish it from the case before the Court. In Sebag v. Abithol (1 M. and S. 464), a bill was accepted, payable three months after date, at a banker's in London: the bill, by reason of its being mislaid, was not presented for payment, but the acceptor was some months afterwards informed of its being mislaid, and it was held he was not discharged; and the drawer was allowed to set it off in an action brought against him by the acceptor, although the banker, at whose house the bill was payable, had failed about four months after such information was given, and though the acceptor had at all times, up to the failure of the bankers, a balance in their hands sufficient to cover the acceptance. For these reasons, considering that the money payable by a bill becomes by the acceptance the debt of the acceptor; that he is looked upon as the immediate debtor; that, by making his acceptance payable at his banker's, without putting it in a form to pledge his banker's liability, he only specifies a place, where he by himself, or his agent, will be ready to pay; considering, that he may have no funds in his banker's hands, or has full power to withdraw them; that much trouble and inconvenience, and confusion, may result from holding that this is a conditional and restrictive acceptance; and, that every inconvenience will be sufficiently obviated by holding, that neglect by the holder will be matter of defence to the extent to which such neglect causes loss, I submit in answer to the first question, that, as against the acceptor, the holder of this bill was not bound to present it at Sir John Perring's for payment, nor to aver such presentment in his declaration.

On the second question proposed for the consideration of the Judges, I shall content myself with saying, that, for the reasons which I have already stated, I am of opinion, that, as against the acceptor, such acceptance is a general acceptance, with an engagement or direction that payment may be obtained at the banking-house, with this addition only, that, if the ac-[474]ceptor should be able to prove, that by any neglect in the holder in not duly presenting, he had sustained any loss, he should be relieved to the extent of such loss.

In answer to the third question, I submit, that a distinction is to be taken between an acceptance qualified as to time, and an acceptance qualified as to place. If C. take from B. an acceptance qualified as to time, giving B. a longer time for payment of the bill than the bill itself specifies, I consider it as quite clear that C. could not sue A. upon the bill. The holder of a bill has no right to give the drawer time. If he do, he does it at his peril. English v. Darley (2 B. and P. 61) establishes, that indulgence to the acceptor after the bill is dishonoured, discharges the drawer and indorsers; and there are many other cases to the same effect: if so, indulgence to him before the bill is due must have the same effect. An acceptance qualified as to place, will, or will not, take away from C. the right to maintain an action against A. upon the bill, according as such acceptance does, or does not, throw upon A. an additional burthen, or cast upon him any prejudice. If the bill be payable at a place where the drawee lives, his house is prima facie the place at which it is to be paid, but the usage of merchants warrants the drawer in naming any other house at the same place for payment. If the drawee has no house at the place where the bill is made payable, the holder has a right to require from him an acceptance specifying some house in particular in that place, for its presentment. This doctrine is laid down by Holt, C. J. in the case cited by my brother Holroyd (Lord Raym. 575). But, if naming a particular house casts upon the drawer any new burthen or prejudice, the holder, by allowing such house to be named, has done, as to him, what he was not warranted in doing, and the drawer is discharged. The question then is, Does the qualification as to place cast on the holder a new burthen or prejudice? and, if it oblige him to prove at his peril, in an action against the acceptor, what upon a general acceptance he would not be bound to prove, it does cast upon him a new burthen.

In answer to the fourth question, I am of opinion, that C. would not be at liberty to maintain an action against A. on his [475] original debt, without delivering to A. the bill so accepted; because A. has, by the bill offered to C. a credit upon B. and C. has consented to that credit; and C. has no right to double payment from A. and B. Kearslake v. Morgan (5 T. R. 513) is an authority in point, to show, that if a debtor pay his creditor by a note or bill, which the creditor takes on account of his debt, such taking of a bill will be an answer to an action brought by the creditor against his debtor for that debt, unless the creditor gives up such bill.

Wood, B. In answer to the first question, I am of opinion, that the bill of exchange mentioned in the first count of the declaration, being therein alleged to have been accepted according to the usage and custom of merchants, "payable at Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London," that is to say, at the house of certain persons using in trade and commerce the name, style, and firm of Sir John Perring and Co. bankers, London, the holder was bound to present it at that house for payment, and to aver in his declaration that the same was presented at that house for payment.

It is clear, that the drawee of a bill of exchange, if he choose to accept it, may do it generally, or may make a special or qualified acceptance. The holder may refuse to take a special or qualified acceptance; but, if he do take it, he is bound by it, as that constitutes the contract between him and the acceptor. There are many cases which might be cited to prove this position, but I will only trouble your Lordships with one. In Petit v. Benson (Comb. 152), a bill was drawn upon the defendant, who accepted it by indorsement, in this manner, "I do accept this bill, to be paid half in money and half in bills;" and the question was, whether there could be a qualification of an acceptance, for it was alleged that his writing upon the bill was sufficient to charge him with the whole sum: so that the question here must have been, whether the words "to be paid half in money and half in bills" would not be rejected, and the acceptance stand as a general acceptance? "But 'twas proved by divers merchants, that the custom among them was quite otherwise; and that there might be a qualification of an acceptance; for he that may refuse the bill totally, may accept it in part. [476] But he to whom the bill is due may refuse such acceptance, and protest it, so as to charge the first drawer; and, though there be an acceptance, yet, after that, he hath the same liberty of charging the first drawer as he before had:" that is, although there be an acceptance written, if he refuses to take it, he may strike it out and charge the first drawer. It is observable that the case says, the custom was proved by several merchants: at that time, it was usual to set out the custom of merchants in the declaration, and to prove it by witnesses, which accounts for the words "'twas proved by divers merchants;" but it was afterwards, in the same reign (W. 3), held, that the court was bound to take judicial notice of the law-merchant; and, therefore, it is not usual now to set out the custom, but to allege that, according to the custom of merchants, such an one drew a bill, and such an one, according to the custom of merchants, accepted, &c.

As there may be a qualified acceptance, is the acceptance in question a qualified acceptance? What makes a qualified acceptance? Why, the words used by the party in his acceptance. Do the words "payable at Sir John Perring and Co's bankers, London," mean nothing? Are they mere surplusage? If so, then this bill ought to have been presented for payment at Torpoint. To make such constructions would, I conceive, be contrary to the usage of merchants, and the plain sense and meaning of words. Acceptance imports a promise; and the acceptance in question is a promise to pay at a particular place, that is to say, at a banker's in London. An acceptance is an actual promise to pay, [per Curiam, in Mitford v. Walcot (12 Mod. 410)]. There are two conflicting decisions of the Courts of King's Bench and Common Bench upon the point in question, viz. the case of Fenton v. Goundry, in K. B. and the case of Gammon v. Schmoll, determined by the Court of C. B. On those cases I will not trouble your Lordships with my comments: but I must observe, that there is a very material case of Sanderson v. Bowes, which, though my brother Bayley does not seem now to think so, I hold to be good law. In that case, a promissory note was made payable at a banking-house, and the Court held presentment at the banking-house [477] a condition precedent to the maintenance of the action. I cannot distinguish the case in question, in principle, from this of Sanderson v. Bowes, where the defendant promised to pay at the banking-house at Workington, to one R. Nelson, or bearer. The Court of King's Bench on demurrer, held, that it was necessary to present the note for payment at the banking-house at Workington, which seems to me to be contrary to the former decision of that court in the case of Fenton v. Goundry, which was the case of a bill of exchange accepted payable at a particular banker's (like the acceptance in this case). The distinction which the Court of K. B. took, was, that the acceptance was no part of the original conformation of the bill itself, but that the words in the note, (in Sanderson v. Bowes) restrictive of payment at the place named, were incorporated in the original form of the instrument which alone created the contract and duty of the party. Try this case by that principle: what alone creates the contract and duty of the acceptor? Why his acceptance. There is no antecedent debt due from the acceptor to the holder. What is incorporated in the original form of the acceptance? The place of payment. It is true, that acceptance is a subsequent act to the first conformation of the bill: it is a subsequent contract between the acceptor and holder; but, it is the only contract which there is between them. It is, in point of law, a promise of the acceptor to pay the bill at a specific place. The declaration states, and incorporates in the acceptance as there stated, the very words "payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s, bankers," and the promise alleged is to pay according to his said acceptance. The plaintiff by his declaration does not reject these words as surplusage, but considers them as forming part of the acceptance. Suppose, instead of a note, a bill had been drawn on Bowes and Co. and they had accepted it payable at their banking-house at Workington, and subscribed the acceptance, can it be contended, that, in one case, the holder is bound to present at the place, and, in the other, not? I say, therefore, as was said in Sanderson v. Bowes, that a demand by the holder of payment of the bill at the specific place was a condition precedent, in order to give himself a title to receive the money.

As to the second branch of the first question, viz. Whether the plaintiff is bound to aver in the declaration, that the bill was [478] presented at the house of Perring and Co. for payment? I take it to be a condition precedent that it should be presented for payment at the appointed place; and, if so, without doubt, the plaintiff cannot maintain his action without averring performance of that condition precedent, and so the court of King's Bench held in Sanderson v. Bowes. It is not necessary, as between the holder and acceptor, that the holder should aver presentment on the day when the bill becomes due; because the acceptor is liable at all times afterwards, whenever it shall be presented at the appointed place. His liability is not confined to any day; his liability is to pay any time after the bill becomes due, if presented at the appointed place. The presentment on a particular day can only be material to charge the drawer. It has been argued, that presentment need not be averred, but, that it is matter of defence. I think, that it may be matter of defence although not averred; and that, at the trial, the plaintiff ought to be called on to prove it; otherwise, after verdict, it might be presumed that it had been proved to be presented according to the acceptance. If a bill directs the payment at a certain place, it ought to be paid there without other demand than at the place, though the acceptor lives at a place remote (Conn. Dig. tit. Merchant, 200).

The place where a bill is to be paid is so important, that, if it be directed to a person generally, and he will not accept it to be paid at a certain place, the holder may protest it. If a bill be accepted at Amsterdam, and no house named where the payment is to be, the party need not to acquiesce in it, but may protest the bill; but, if he will acquiesce, it is well enough (12 Mod. 410. Mitford v. Walcott). Then, according to the doctrine contended for, although the law requires a place of payment to be named, yet, when it is named, you are not obliged to resort to it for payment. The mischief to the commercial world, and to all who have any concern with bills, would be very great, if the holder were not bound to present for payment at the appointed place; but, on the contrary, might, at once, without any presentment, bring an action against the acceptor. The acceptor would have no means of avoiding an action (and, perhaps, an arrest); for his acceptance may have been in circulation, and may be in the hands of persons [483] of whom he knows nothing: so that he cannot tell to whom to send or tender his money, or how he is to get discharged; and the first notice which he has of who the holder is may be by an action. Common sense and common justice, and the convenience of mankind, all concur in telling one, that a man, who has agreed to take an acceptance payable at a specified place, should be bound to have recourse to that place for payment before he can sue the acceptor. It has been argued, that the defendant should not have demurred, but should have pleaded that he was ready to pay at the appointed place, but nobody came to receive payment. That, I conceive, was not necessary: because the first act to be done (which is a condition precedent) is the presentment of the bill for payment at the appointed place; and the plaintiff must show that to maintain his action; and so was the determination in Sanderson v. Bowes. But, considering the presentment and payment to be concurrent acts, the party who brings the action (not he who defends it) must show that he has done what is necessary on his part to maintain that action, namely, that he has been ready with his bill to present, and thereon to receive payment at the appointed place. In answer to the arguments raised from forms of pleading, I say, that the defendant may avail himself of this objection in different shapes: 1st, as in this case, by demurrer; 2dly, he may plead the general issue, and, for want of proof of presentment, apply for a nonsuit; or, 3dly, he may plead specially, that he was ready at the appointed place to pay, and that no presentment was made, or, generally, that the bill was never presented at the appointed place. It has been argued, that presentment for payment need not be averred, and that it never is averred in a declaration against the acceptor; and I agree, that, where the acceptance is general, it is so; and the reason is this, because the acceptor is always liable: his acceptance operates as a promise to pay, not only at the time when the bill is due, but at all times afterwards when requested, or on demand; and the bringing the action is in law a request or demand. But, where place is of the essence of the contract, as in the case in question, though it be not necessary, to aver presentment at the day, it is necessary to aver presentment at the place on some day before bringing the action. One who is indebted promiseth [484] to pay it upon request: in an action upon the case upon that promise, the party needs not to express the assumpsit with the request, it being an old debt; but otherwise it is, where there is such a promise without any duty precedent (4 Leon. 2. Pulmant's case). In debt or detainee, the very bringing of the action and demand of the writ is a demand and request (per Jones, J. Godb. 103. Horn and Stub's case). Acceptance after the time of payment elapsed, and a promise then to pay according to the tenor of the bill, is good, and amounts to a promise to pay the money generally (1 Salk. 129. Mitford v. Walcott). Arguments have been drawn from forms of pleading in actions on bonds or obligations and other actions in debt, and it is contended that it lies on the defendant to plead either a tender, or that he was ready to pay and bring the money into court. These rules are not applicable to this case: this is not an action of debt or indebitatus assumpsit on an antecedent debt. It is well established, that an action of debt will not lie on the acceptance of a bill of exchange; it is an action on the custom of merchants for damages only, without any antecedent debt. As to debt on bonds or obligations, they create an immediate debt, and the defendant must show that he has done all that was necessary on his part to perform the condition, and that it was the fault of the obligee that it was not completed. But, when the plaintiff brings an action for a demand depending on a condition precedent on his part to be performed, there he must aver performance to maintain the action, as in Sanderson v. Bowes.

In answer to the second question, I am of opinion, that this bill having been so accepted as aforesaid, such acceptance is, in law, to be considered as a qualified acceptance to pay the same at the said house of Sir John Perring & Co. bankers, only; and, that it is not a general acceptance to pay the same with an additional engagement or direction for the payment thereof at that house, for the following reasons: It is the custom of merchants and opulent persons to keep their monies at bankers, and to accept bills to be paid at their bankers, that they may not be under the necessity of keeping money at their own houses, or intrusting money to their servants in their absence to take up acceptances, or of carrying money about [485] their persons to answer such acceptances, if demands should be made upon them personally. Such special acceptances are conveniences to both holder and acceptor. But this object, so far as respects the acceptor, would be totally frustrated, if, at the election of the holder, he, the holder, could reject the appointment of the place of payment in the acceptance as mere surplusage, and demand payment wherever he pleased. What authority is there either in law or common sense to say, that a promise (and an acceptance is a promise) to pay at a particular appointed place by name, is to be expanded (for that I think is the phrase) into a promise to pay in every corner of the kingdom where the acceptor may happen to be, as well as at the particular appointed place. The acceptor is under no previous obligation to pay; he owes no debt to the holder prior to his acceptance; his acceptance is the only thing which constitutes the compact between him and the holder. The expression of one particular place, according to a well-known maxim, is the exclusion of any other. There is no law or custom of merchants to justify such an expansion, or rather, I should say, expulsion of men's words and meanings. I remember cases of this sort. A person has given a promissory note payable at a particular time, and has signed it; and, after he has signed it so that he has completed the instrument, he has put upon the side or bottom of the note a memorandum of a particular place where it will be paid. In such a case the particular place is no part of the note, and does not control its general operation: it is no variance in a declaration to omit such a memorandum: it may, perhaps, amount to evidence of an additional engagement that it shall be paid at that place. But, here, the acceptance is only one single continued sentence, at the end of which, probably, stands the signature of the acceptor.

In answer to the third question, I am of opinion, that, if A. draw a bill on B. in favour of C. for £100, and C. without the previous authority or subsequent assent of A. take an acceptance of the bill for the whole of the £100, but an acceptance qualified as to the time or place of payment, C. could, notwithstanding such acceptance, maintain an action upon the bill against A. unless the qualification as to time or place produces a damage or injury to A. for the following reasons: If the [486] holder, without such previous authority or subsequent assent of A. the drawer, enlarge the time of payment by the acceptor, that may injure the drawer and operate to discharge him: or, if he take an acceptance payable at a distant place, so that, if the bill be dishonoured, notice cannot be given to the drawer so soon as it might if the acceptance had been general, that may injure the drawer and discharge him as for want of due notice. But, in the case of a bill drawn on a person in London, and accepted payable at a banker's in London, I should think such special acceptance would not operate to discharge the drawer, if due notice was given to the drawer of the non-payment, because in such a case the special acceptance does the drawer no injury.

In answer to the fourth question proposed by your Lordships, I am of opinion, that if A. were debtor to C. in £100 previous to his so drawing upon B. in favour of C. to the amount of £100, C. could not, upon A.'s refusing his assent to an acceptance, qualified as mentioned in the above question, maintain an action upon the original debt against A. without delivering to A. the bill so accepted: in case, at the time the bill was drawn, B. was also indebted to A. in a like sum of £100. Lest I should have mistaken this question, I will take the liberty of offering some reasons or explanations. If C. take the draft of A. upon B., for a debt due from A. to C., C. is bound to use his endeavour to get it accepted and paid; and, if it be not honoured, is bound to return it to A. in due time, and to deliver it up to A., and, that being done, it is the same, then, as if no bill or draft had been given; and C. may then maintain his action against A. for his original debt. If the bill have been left for acceptance, and B. have written a qualified acceptance upon it, which C. does not choose to take, he should inform B. that he will not take an acceptance so qualified, and require a general acceptance; and if that be refused he should strike out what was written, and return the bill to A. as an unaccepted bill, in which case C. may resort to his original debt against A. If C. without A.'s previous authority or subsequent assent, accepts and assents to B.'s acceptance, so qualified as to time or place as materially to alter the condition of the drawer, in that case he can only resort to B.; the acceptor, according to the terms of his acceptance, and A. will be dis-[487]-charged from his debt to C., for which he gave the bill; and B. will be discharged, as against A. from his original debt, for which he gave his acceptance, and can only be sued on his special acceptance.

GRAHAM, B. The general question is, whether the words of this acceptance form a condition precedent, and constitute a qualified acceptance, or a general acceptance with an additional engagement or direction for payment at the house mentioned. If these words do constitute a condition precedent, it was necessary before action brought to demand payment at the place mentioned, and to aver in the declaration that the plaintiff had so done. When a man accepts a bill, it is the most solemn, because it is the most public recognition of the drawer's right to demand the amount of it from him. The acceptance is an obligation to pay all over the world, and the question is whether, generally speaking, in the intention of the acceptor and the understanding of the holder, the words "payable at Sir J. Perring and Co.'s," contract this general obligation to an engagement that the acceptor will pay the drawer there, and no where else, (as some seem to think), or, at least, not till it be proved that a demand was made there in vain. In my apprehension such an acceptance is no qualification of the general liability of the acceptor. It is a substitution of the banker's for the person and abode of the acceptor, for mutual convenience; and means only to charge the drawer and indorser in transitu, that the holder, instead of calling upon the acceptor, should make his demand at the banker's. No demand is necessary against the acceptor: he is liable without demand; but, to charge the drawer, you must prove a demand on the acceptor, or on the person whom he has identified with himself for that purpose. The question, then, will be, does a man mean to impose a condition, or to suggest, for mutual convenience, a place, where, with least trouble to both, the money may be had? But this question, of daily occurrence, simple as it may seem, and of easy solution to some, is rendered complicated and difficult by great and conflicting authorities.

As to the balance of authority, I think it cannot be doubted, from the case of Smith v. De la Fontaine, in 1785, what Lord Mansfield's opinion was. His great experience and knowledge [488] of mercantile transactions and high character carry with them strong evidence of the prevailing opinion. Saunderson and others v. Judge (2 H. B. 509), in 1795, was an action on a promissory note (and, for the present, I make no distinction between notes and bills) against the indorser. Sharp, the maker, promised to pay to Wilkinson or order; and, at the foot of the note, there was a memorandum, that he would pay it at the house of Saunderson and Co. with whom he had a cash-account. Wilkinson indorsed to Judge, he to Sanders and Co. and they to Saunderson and Co. Sharp, before the note became due, absconded, and Saunderson wrote by the post to Judge, giving him notice of the non-payment. The declaration was in the general form, without stating the memorandum, or any thing tantamount to an application to the plaintiffs. At the trial, the plaintiffs were nonsuited, as they had not proved an actual demand on the maker; and the language of the court, consisting of Eyre, C. J. Heath, Buller, and Rooke, judges, after the argument upon the motion for a new trial, forms the foundation of my opinion. They said, 'It was no part of the contract that the note should be paid at the house of Saunderson and Co.; and therefore that was not necessary to be stated in the declaration: the maker merely appointed the house of his banker as the place where he was to be called upon for payment. It is not necessary that a demand should be personal; it is sufficient if it is made at the house of the maker, and it is the same thing in effect if it be made at the place where he appoints; and as the demand was to be made at the house of the plaintiffs themselves it was sufficient for them to turn to their books." But, it may be said, this was the case of a detached memorandum. I will say a few words on the subject of the supposed difference between such a memorandum at the bottom of a note, and an acceptance of a bill of exchange payable at a particular place. The case of Lyon v. Sandius (1 Campb. 423), was an action by the indorsee of a bill of exchange against the acceptor; the declaration stated only a general acceptance. It was precisely this case, the acceptance being "payable at Messrs. Hankey and Co.'s." The very same objection was taken by Mr. Park; and I am free [489] to say, that the words of Lord Ellenborough carry conviction to my mind, and form the foundation of my opinion. "How can you make the words payable at Hankey and Co.'s more than a mere memorandum? The acceptor of a bill of exchange is liable universally. This very point was brought before the court some time ago," (alluding probably to Sanderson v. Judge, of which Mr. Park said he had some impression on his mind), "when," says Lord Ellenborough, "the judges were all of opinion that such words formed no part of the contract, and did not require to be set out in the declaration." It is difficult to believe, I had almost said impossible, that the case should have rested there, if that had not been the opinion of all the Judges of the King's Bench; and, as proof, in the very next year (1809), at the Hilary term sittings, Mr. Justice Bayley held, in the case of a promissory note (Wild v. Rennards, 1 Campb. 425. n.), that in an action against the maker there was no necessity to prove that it was presented where payable. These authorities are followed by the decision in Fenton v. Goundry, on the fullest consideration of Callaghan v. Aylet, then lately determined in the Common Pleas. I cannot help adding the two decisions at Nisi Prius of Lord Chief Justice Gibbs (Head v. Sewell, Richards v. Milsington, Holt, N. P. C. 363, 364); these, together with the common form of declarations, make a weight of authority which it is difficult to counterpoise.

But it is said, in order to diminish the weight of these authorities, that the Court of King's Bench have not always been consistent. And first, it is said, that in Parker v. Gordon (7 East, 386), they have recognized the propriety of an application at the place of payment. But that was an action against the drawer; and it is universally true, that to charge the drawer you must prove a demand on, and refusal by, the acceptor or his substitute. If, therefore, he says, "I accept, payable at my banker's," he says, "it is there I am to be called upon for payment; that is my house; there it is where I am to be found, and I authorize you to consider me as personally present there for the purpose of payment;" and, if so, the holder may be presumed to know the banking hours. And if the holder were not bound to this, he must have gone, as Lord Ellenborough [490] says (in Parker v. Gordon, 7 East, 386), "a step farther, and proved a demand on the acceptor, for otherwise no demand is made on the acceptor. Secondly, it is said, that they have impaired, if not contradicted, the case of Fenton v. Goundry, by that of Sanderson v. Bowes: this argument or assertion is founded on the supposed perfect analogy between bills of exchange and promissory notes. I perfectly agree, that in some cases place may be essential, and may be rendered so by the terms and occasion of the acceptance. A case may be put of a man, who remitting all his property to England, and taking his departure from India, accepts a bill for £5000 at six months payable in London: he loses his passage: it could never be said in such a case that the acceptor engaged to pay in India, or at the Cape of Good Hope, on his way home. The case of bankers issuing notes payable at their banks, as in Sanderson v. Bowes, may be one of these cases; but I deny the alleged analogy between bills of exchange and promissory notes. The maker of a promissory note may express his own terms. He is, as it were, drawer and acceptor: the note must be taken as he issues it. But in the case of bills of exchange the drawer has a right to an unqualified acceptance, and an indorser in transitu is entitled to the same right. If these acceptances were construed as special, and as qualifying the general liability of the acceptor, who is bound to pay, it would hurt the credit of bills. The acceptor is the person whose credit principally supports the bill: he is considered as always liable; but if an accidental or careless omission to call at the place appointed destroy the acceptance of the bill, the confidence attached to the acceptance is gone, and the credit depends on the punctual observance of the terms of the condition. The proof of a demand and refusal is not easy; and in many cases might fail, or be brought in doubt by contradictory evidence. The case of Fenton v. Goundry, then, can hardly be said to be impugned by that of Saunderson v. Bours. At all events, the latter case may be considered as wanting the weight of the former; but it is sufficient to distinguish them by the difference of the subject-matter of each case. It is, thirdly, said this is an order on the banker; I grant, that it is an authority to the banker to pay, and in [491] effect, an order; but we must not by refinement stagger prevailing notions. If it be an order on the banker, Bishop v. Chitty is a dangerous precedent: no man of business ever thought that such a note or memorandum converted the bill of exchange into an order on the banker; and, that by not calling at the banker's he lost the benefit of his acceptance, and took the credit of the banker in the place of the acceptor. As to the cases in the Common Pleas, I shall not oppose to the case of Ambrose v. Hopwood (2 Taunt. 61), that of Huffam v. Ellis (M. 51 G. 3. K. B. See Bayley on Bills, 98. n. 1. 3d ed.), in the King's Bench, and House of Lords; in the latter, the declaration followed the case in the Common Pleas, and the words, according to the tenor, might include the house. In Callaghan v. Aylett, and Gammon v. Schmoll, is to be found the great counterpoise to the authority of the Court of King's Bench; but, I must say, that the reasons given are not such as belonged to the authority of the judges, who are reported to have given them. In Callaghan v. Aylett, Mr. Justice Heath says, "there can be no difference in this respect between an action against the drawer, and an action against the acceptor." But, there is this difference, when the acceptor accepts "payable at the house," he means to limit his ubiquity, by saying that he is to be found there for the purpose of payment; and if the holder do not seek him there, he makes default in calling on the acceptor. If, without such direction, the holder omit to call at the house of the acceptor, he cannot, on account of that omission, charge the drawer or indorsers: but it is too much to say, that by that omission he discharges the acceptor, who is at all times liable, though no demand of payment was ever made, even at his house. Mr. Justice Heath avoids the authority of Saunderson v. Judge, by saying, that there "it was a memorandum at the foot of the note, not a part of the instrument." That leads to nice, I had almost said, frivolous, distinctions: for, according to that doctrine, if I say, "I accept R. G." and add at the foot of the bill, "payable at Messrs. G. and Co." it is a mere memorandum; but if I say, "I accept, payable at Messrs. G. and Co." it is embodied in my acceptance, and forms a condition precedent. Does it make [492] a difference, that in one case the acceptance is all in one tenor, as "I accept, R. G. payable at my banker's," and that in the other I write, "I accept, R. G.," and underneath, "payable at my bankers?" A man, whether he accepts in the former or latter form, means the same thing; for when he writes the words "payable, etc." he is usually determined in what place to write, by the room or vacancy on the paper. Are the minds of men in business to be harassed with such untenable and insuperable distinctions? In Gammon v. Schmoll, Mr. Justice Chambre puts the case of a bill drawn upon a judge just going the circuit. I dare say it has happened to him, as it has happened to me. But can it be supposed that any man of character, on such or like occasion, would make his bill so payable if he had not cash or credit at his banker's? And who would refuse to call at the banker's? No holder in his senses would forbear to follow the directions of the acceptor, because it is undoubtedly done for his convenience; no man in his senses would refuse an application to the banker of the judge where he would be sure of his money, for the gratification of coming down to Exeter for the sake of arresting him; but if it turn out that an acceptance payable at a particular place is a mere shift, or act of roguery, it would be idle, and, in some instances (as in directions to obscure corners and streets,) almost impossible to attempt to find out a sneaking lodger in a garret to satisfy this indispensable condition. What holder, or what attorney, would arrest a man of credit under such circumstances, or would disgrace a Judge? Such acceptances will always give credit to bills; and the practice will continue, though your Lordships should decide that they do not qualify the general liability of an acceptor; and perhaps the mercantile world will thank your Lordships for not imposing upon them the knowledge of precedent conditions, or a speculation, as to the different positions on a note, by the occupation of which the words "payable at, etc." become either a mere memorandum, or a condition precedent. But cases might be put of various kinds, these may all be met by way of defence. It is said, (1 Rolle's Abridgment, 140) and I take it to be law, "If the condition of an obligation be to pay £10 at a given day at

S., he (the obligor) is not bound to pay in any other place ;" and " so in that case the obligee is not bound to receive it in any other [493] place ;" and so Coke, Littleton, 211 ; " For if the obligor then (that is, when by notice the obligor has fixed the place) and there tenders the money, he shall save the penalty of the bond for ever." But he saves only the penalty and costs ; he must pay the debt. An acceptance is, by the custom of merchants, a debt ; though, independently of that custom, neither debt nor assumpsit would lie for want of consideration. But in all these cases the fulfilment of the condition comes by way of defence. The obligee is not bound in the outset to state his demand at the place ; the defendant must plead his performance of the condition, and, proving it, he is quit of the damages and penalty ; but he must bring the money into court. Place may, undoubtedly, be essential ; and here both obligor and obligee understand each other that so it is to be considered.

In answer to the third question, I am of opinion, that if the holder of a bill for acceptance take an acceptance, varying in time or place of payment, where place creates inconvenience, and obstructs or impedes the circulation of the bill, or, when new terms or conditions are introduced, he makes it his own. This is obvious in the case of enlargement of time. So, if the acceptance be payable at Paris, Dublin, or Edinburgh, where the place is evidently made a condition of the payment ; in such a case, I think that the drawer would be discharged.

In answer to the fourth question, I am of opinion, that if, in the case put, C. take an acceptance, materially qualified as to time or place, and A. dissent, and C. still keep the bill, he makes it his own, and cannot sue A. on his original debt : but if C. give timely notice to A. and immediately offer to return the bill to A. I think his original cause of action would remain.

Once settle the uniformity of practice, and the evil is over. But, according to the law as laid down by the court of King's Bench, you have a plain simple declaration and proof. According to the law laid down by the court of Common Pleas you have a new form of declaration, and a proof which, in many instances, may be difficult, and may lead to controversy and contradiction.

RICHARDS, C. B., as to the first question, was of opinion that the holder of the bill was not bound to present it at Sir John Perring's and Co. for payment, nor to aver presentment there.

[494] As to the second, that the acceptance of the bill in question was not a qualified acceptance, constituting an undertaking to pay the bill at the house of Sir J. P. and Co., but a general acceptance, constituting an undertaking to pay the same every where, with an additional engagement or direction for the payment thereof at that house.

As to the third, that if the payee C. were, without the previous authority or subsequent assent of the drawer A. to take an acceptance qualified as to time or place, by taking such an acceptance he would discharge the drawer A.

As to the fourth, that if A. were to refuse his assent to such a qualified acceptance, C. having received the bill for the debt of £100 due from A. could not sue A. for the debt till he had re-delivered the bill to A.

DALLAS, C. J. With respect to the first question, I am of opinion that the holder was bound to present the bill at the banking house of Sir J. P. and Co., and so to aver in the declaration.

As to the second question, I think that the bill, having been so accepted, is, in law, to be considered as a conditional acceptance, and not as a general acceptance to pay, with an additional engagement or direction for payment at the house mentioned. And as the case which has given occasion to your Lordships questions has arisen from contradictory decisions in the courts below, and as, in the recent cases, all that could be found of former decision has been brought under the consideration of the respective courts, and their disagreement in opinion has still continued, and continues, (as appears from the answers hitherto given,) it is obvious that the present is a case which can very little depend upon mere authorities ; the authorities have, however, been already fully referred to, and my reasons will therefore chiefly and shortly be given upon general grounds. And, first, I admit the presumption of law to be, (though in the present state of commerce the fact is frequently otherwise,) that the drawing a bill of exchange pre-supposes an antecedent debt, and the acceptance is an admission that such a debt is due. And so considered, it is, no doubt, clear, that the debtor may be called upon to pay without reference to time or place. But if, in the bill itself, the drawer were to name a particular place for payment, instead of such place [495] being specified in the acceptance only, such bill would be a bill qualified as to payment both with respect to time and place. And the acceptance being according to the tenor of the bill, the acceptor, as to payment, would be bound accordingly. This, I am aware, would be the act of the drawer himself, and therefore not falling within part of the reasoning, as it applies to the acceptor, a distinction to which I shall hereafter advert more fully. It is, I apprehend, equally clear, that by a bill drawn generally, the drawer transfers his rights against the drawee, as modified by the bill, to the extent of the bill; and that the drawer may enter into any contract with the payee, which the drawer might have done with the drawee before such transfer made, not affecting thereby, in substance, the rights of the drawee. I assume, therefore, for the present, that if the bill had purported to be an order to pay at the house of Perring and Co., and the acceptor had accepted such bill, he would not have been bound to pay elsewhere till application for payment there had been made and failed. I shall endeavour to show hereafter, that what the drawer may do by the bill, as between him and the drawee, may be done by the acceptance, as between the acceptor and the payee. To take, first, the case of the drawer of the bill: he may draw it in any form which he thinks fit, provided the form be such as is warranted by the usage of merchants, without which it will not be a bill of exchange; but it will scarcely be contended, that drawing it restrictive as to place of payment would be a violation of such usage. A bill general and absolute, in the first instance, drawn and accepted generally, operates according to the terms of the bill; and the bill itself need only to be looked to, the acceptance referring to and not varying from the bill. But to a bill so drawn, the drawee may refuse acceptance; and he may propose to accept conditionally, the payee being at liberty to receive or refuse such conditional acceptance; if he refuse, he must go back to the drawer, who will have his remedy against the drawee, and in this, the first and most simple view of the subject, the bill itself is at an end.

Suppose, however, the case of a partial and qualified or conditional acceptance, and that an acceptance may be such in many respects has been admitted by all the learned Judges in succession; indeed the very questions put by your Lordships [496] recognize the distinction, and adapt themselves to it. What, then, is meant by conditional acceptance, or in what respects may an acceptance be conditional? It may be so as to time, as to sum, as to place, as to mode of payment. It will be sufficient to refer to the authorities which have been cited as to each of these shortly, and one will be sufficient under each head; and I mention them, not because the point itself is doubtful, but for what is said in each case. And, first, as to amount. A foreign bill was drawn upon the defendant, and he accepted it to pay £100 part thereof; he was sued on the acceptance, and on demurrer, insisted that a partial acceptance was not good within the custom of merchants; but the Court held otherwise, and judgment was given for the plaintiff (Wegerstoffs v. Keene, Str. 211). Next as to time. A bill was drawn, and no time fixed for its payment; it was presented on the 18th of April, and accepted payable the 8th of September; this being stated in the declaration, the defendant demurred, and insisted, that as no time was prescribed for payment the bill was payable at sight, and that a promise to pay two or three months after sight was not an acceptance within the custom of merchants; but the Court held that it was an acceptance within the custom, and the demurrer was over-ruled (Walker v. Attwood, 11 Mod. 190). Thirdly, as to place. On this point also there are numerous authorities; but as it is in this respect that the present controversy has arisen, I assume only, at present, that this also may be conditional, reserving myself to examine the authorities and doctrine hereafter. Lastly, as to mode of payment. A bill was accepted, to be paid, half in money, and half in bills, and the question was, whether there could be a qualification of an acceptance? And it was proved by divers merchants that there might be, for that he who might refuse the bill totally, might accept it in part; but that the holder was not bound to acquiesce in such acceptance; Petit v. Benson (Comb. 152). If, then, there may be a conditional acceptance as to sum, as to time, and as to mode of payment, such acceptance, as to these, qualifying the liability to pay, it is difficult to conceive why there should be any difference as to place, at least as between the acceptor and the payee so taking the conditional accept-[497]-ance; nor do I conceive, speaking with deference to other opinions, that there is any distinction which, upon principle, can be supported. Losing sight of place, however, for the moment, let the effect of a conditional acceptance be examined in the other respects already mentioned. And first as to amount; he who takes an acceptance for less than the sum expressed in the bill cannot claim from the acceptor more; though, as to the drawer, how it may affect him will form matter of distinct consideration. So, as to time, the holder is likewise bound by the terms under which he has consented to take the acceptance: and why? Because, on the one hand, the payee not being bound to take an acceptance, except according to the tenor of the bill; and, on the other hand, the acceptor being only bound to accept as he may choose to accept, when the acceptance varies from the tenor of the bill, and the payee, notwithstanding, takes such acceptance, he consents to take the bill according to the tenor of the acceptance, and not according to the tenor of the bill.

So, it is as to sum, as to time, as to mode of payment; in each of which cases the acceptance, it is admitted, forms the contract between the immediate parties. Is there, then, any difference in this respect, as to place, and as to place only? In the argument at the bar, (and herein the case seems to me now narrowed to a single point,) it has not been disputed that there may be a conditional acceptance as to place, restrictive of payment, and making presentment necessary at such place, provided it be by words of express and unequivocal import: but it is denied that to make a bill payable at one place is an exclusion of others: and in Fenton v. Goundry, I observe, Mr. Justice Holroyd, who there argued against the restricted liability, seems to have taken the same distinction. "The case has been argued (he said) as if the terms of the acceptance had been payable at Sikes and Co.'s only," not contending, that if so drawn the payment would not have been restricted; and Lord Ellenborough is made immediately to observe, "Is it more than an expansion of the promise?" An observation, which his Lordship could not have made, if by the word only the promise had been, in terms, restricted; and, in the same way, in the case of Gammon v. Schmoll, in the Court of Common Pleas, it was not denied at the bar, that if the acceptance had [498] been at the place named, and not elsewhere, in such case the acceptance would have been clearly qualified, and conditional and restricted as to place. And so, yesterday, it was admitted by my brother Holroyd, and so, to-day, it is admitted by my Lord Chief Baron. The question, therefore, in this view of the subject, comes round to be merely a question of construction, namely, what do the words of acceptance import in the particular instance? and are they conditional as to place of payment or not? There are no technical words, by which, generally speaking, a condition must be created; and, whether it be a condition precedent, a concurrent act, or a mutual promise, must be collected from the intention of the parties, reference being had to the words made use of, and the subject-matter in question. And so again, it has been admitted by both the learned Judges to whom I have last referred. "Intention (said my brother Holroyd, in express terms) is that which ought to govern." Now conditional or qualified, as opposed to absolute, I can only say imports some qualification or restriction of that, which would be otherwise unconditional. This is self-evident, it will be agreed, when the condition is established, but so to state it, it is said, is but begging the question, or leaving it at least where it was before, the question being, whether the words operate by way of condition, and not upon the effect of the condition when established. Still, however, I can only say, the very departure from generality of expression to me, imports some modification of that generality; and, if simple and absolute acceptance have a clear and simple operation, and will bind a party to pay wherever his acceptance may be presented, it seems to me but reasonable to intend, that when he accepts, payable at a particular place, he means to exclude, in the first instance, a liability to demand in any other place. And, looking to intention, and taking as admitted, that it ought to govern, I cannot permit myself to doubt, that the words made use of in this instance are, in fairness of construction, just as clear as if express words of restriction had been introduced. The maxim referred to from Lord Bacon, by my brother Holroyd, (I speak it with deference) appears to me too technical as applied to such an instrument as a bill of exchange; nor would it govern in another view: for in a promissory note it is agreed that express words of restriction are not necessary:

[499] words of appointment and specification being of themselves sufficient. In none of these is the word "only" to be found, nor any words beyond those which belong to this particular case; and yet the rule of construction, as mere construction, must, in each instance, be the same. I think this upon the mere ground of the words themselves, but I think so, still more strongly, on the sense and reason of the thing. I will, first, put the case of a bill accepted payable in a town different from that in which the abode of the acceptor may be, as for instance, and to avoid extreme cases, a bill accepted in Birmingham payable in London; and I will further suppose it to be a bill according to the original simplicity of such transactions, that is, for an antecedent debt from the acceptor to the drawer of the bill. By his acceptance payable in London the acceptor promises to have a fund in London when the bill shall be presented; he may have sufficient to pay the bill, but not beyond it, and yet, according to the argument which would reject the words of specification as words of limitation, he must have that which he may not possess, that is, a double sum or sums, one forthcoming in London, and another in Birmingham, to take his chance as to the place where, in fact, the bill may be presented when due; or be left exposed to an arrest, as the immediate consequence of non-payment. I am aware, it may be said that such would be his situation under the original debt to the drawer, and that such would continue to be his situation under a general acceptance; but it is for the express purpose of guarding against this, and on other grounds of personal and commercial convenience, to which I shall presently advert, that the practice has obtained of partial and qualified acceptance as to place, and to which, as between the immediate parties, I do not see any possible objection. It has been very properly said, in one of the cases cited at the bar, the convenience of the thing is generally in support of such qualification; most persons keep their money at their banker's, and make all their payments there; there, they or their appointed agents for this purpose are to be found, and there, if any where, is the fund out of which the payment is to be made. To this it may be added, that the very prevalence of the practice proves the convenience; and though I will admit, that mere concurrence is not to make the law, yet, in all commercial transactions it is [500] greatly to be regarded, as the footing and foundation on which men deal together; and the course of such dealing, as between merchants, is often that which of itself constitutes the law. It is scarcely necessary to refer to the stronger cases of a bill accepted in London, payable in Dublin or Edinburgh, or a bill accepted in the West Indies, payable in London. And suppose that, in this latter case, the party accepting has remitted to his correspondent in London the produce of his plantation, for the express purpose of meeting the bill, will it be said that notwithstanding he may still be arrested in the West Indies, because for the original debt he was liable to be arrested any where? And yet the argument which treats as of no effect specification of place of payment stops nothing short of this extent. Nor do I see, in any one respect, where the line is to be drawn, or the distinction to be made. If, then, it would be so in the instance of a bill accepted in one town payable in another, or in one country payable in another, let the case be considered of a bill, the parties living in the same place, and accepted payable at a particular banking-house. It is scarcely necessary to say, that to the holder it can be no inconvenience to present it there; but on the other hand, I admit it would be scarcely any inconvenience to the acceptor to have it presented at his counting-house, or place of abode; for, even if it were an absolute acceptance, it would still, according to all probability, be paid by a draft on his banker, the acceptance on the bill only operating as such order; but, even in this view, it weighs something, though possibly not much, that this would be to subject the payment of a bill to a double instead of a single operation, namely, the having two places to apply to instead of one; and, though this would be an inconvenience imposed upon the holder by himself, still that which is not in the natural course of dealing raises a presumption that such departure from it was not meant. And what would be thought of the conduct of a holder, who, having a bill payable at a banker's, instead of going there should go to the house of the acceptor merely to get his draft for the bill, or should further insist on a specific payment in money or bank-notes?

To wind up, therefore, what I have to observe upon this part of the subject, on the reason and fitness of the thing, on principles of justice and mercantile convenience, and from the [501] very nature of such transactions, I think a particular place of payment being part of the acceptance of the bill, imposes upon the holder, because he is the willing holder of such acceptance, the necessity of presenting it, in the first instance, there; and leaves the acceptor only liable to pay, where he has provided and fixed a fund for payment, and has consented to pay, in order that he may not be called upon to pay where he has no such fund, nor given any such consent. Nor can I quit this part of the subject without adding, that I do not see a possible inconvenience which can result from so deciding; for the holder need not take a bill so accepted; and where the remedy is so obvious, and it turns simply on such a point, except that confusion in this respect has crept into the subject by disagreement in the decisions of courts of law, and that it is fit the law should be settled and uniform, the question seems to me hardly worthy of the attention which it has excited, and the consideration which it has undergone.

Deeming, then, presentment at the appointed place to be a condition precedent, I will only further say, that I think it necessary that such presentment should be averred and proved; and, that non-presentment and having funds ought not to come by way of defence, as, in the case of promissory notes, has been decided by all the courts in Westminster-hall, and from which, notwithstanding what I have heard this day, I do not myself feel disposed to dissent. Presentment, according to Lord Ellenborough's opinion in Sanderson v. Bowes, at the appointed place, is a condition precedent; and for want of such an averment the declaration is bad. The argument, therefore, as to this point, resolves itself into the question, whether condition precedent or not? For, admit it to be so, then, in this respect, there is no difference between the two courts, and the cases of promissory notes apply to bills of exchange; while, on the other hand, if it be not a condition precedent, it is of course not necessary to be averred.

Quitting now the general ground, I come next to the analogies which result from other cases mentioned, if not of the same, yet of a similar description. And first as to promissory notes. It is scarcely necessary to advert to what has been said as to the similarity, or the distinction between promissory notes and bills of exchange. In some respects, undoubtedly, they are [502] different, in others it may almost be said they run into each other. A bill has, indeed, generally, three parties, the drawer, the drawee, (if accepting, becoming the acceptor,) and the payee; but there may be only two parties, as where a person draws a bill on another payable to his own order, and this, in legal operation, is rather a promissory note than a bill. It is usual, however, to declare on it as a bill; not admitting the identity of drawer and payee; and, if accepted, the defendant may be charged in one count as the drawer, in another as indorser, and in the third, as the maker of a promissory note. I forbear to allude to the cases which turned upon the distinction in the address of the note between "at" and "to," in one of which it was said by Lord Ellenborough (in Shuttleworth v. Stevens, 1 Campb. 407)—"This is properly declared on as a bill of exchange, though it might have been treated as a promissory note at the option of the holder;" and, in another of which (Richards v. Milsington, Holt, N.P.C. 364. n.), it was observed by Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, "It would be difficult to say, in most cases, that what is law, as regards bills of exchange, is not law as it respects promissory notes;" but paramount in point of application is what was said by Lord Mansfield in Heylyn v. Adamson (Burr. 669), and which has been so often mentioned that I shall content myself with merely referring to it.

Such, then, being the similarity, and, in some instances, the identity, of promissory notes and bills of exchange, let it be seen what has been determined with respect to promissory notes; premising only, that here, at least, there is no clashing of authorities; for though the decisions in the King's Bench, as far as respects promissory notes, are denied to have application to bills of exchange, the decisions in the Common Pleas, as to bills of exchange, of necessity include promissory notes; and so far, then, as concerns promissory notes, there is no difference of opinion whatever. What then has been decided respecting promissory notes? In this, the decisions of the two courts agree: namely, that a promissory note, containing in the body of it a promise to pay at a particular place, requires a demand of payment there, in order to give the holder a cause of action if it be not paid. Now on what grounds of reasoning do such [503] decisions stand? To take one case of the many,—In Sanderson v. Bowes, it is said by Lord Ellenborough, "An action on a note will not lie unless the plaintiff has demanded payment at the appointed place. And I cannot but say that it is very convenient that such a condition should be incorporated in the note itself; for it would be very inconvenient that the makers of notes of this description should be liable to answer them every where, when it is notorious that they have made provision for them at a particular place, where only they engage to pay them;—and, having thus stated the ground of convenience, his Lordship added,—"then if the request at the place be a condition precedent, it should have been averred, and for want of such an averment the declaration is bad." Apply this doctrine to bills of exchange.—If convenience require that the makers of promissory notes should be liable only where they have expressly made provision to pay, how is it possible, in this respect, to distinguish promissory notes from bills of exchange? Is not the convenience precisely the same in the one case as in the other?—and being the same, how is it to depend on the form of the instrument? Call it what you will, or make it what you may, it is in payment, in each instance, that the transaction is to end; and the note or bill is the means, and nothing more, by which payment is to be procured; as far, therefore, as to a particular place of payment being pointed out, or a specific place of deposit being established, the reasoning applicable to each is precisely the same; and it seems to me impossible to distinguish between the two. An expression of Lord Ellenborough's has, however, been much observed upon, namely, "that a specification of place is but an expansion of the promise to pay." It will not be supposed that I mean to follow any of the verbal or critical remarks which have been made in this respect, at the bar, or in the courts below. Whatever peculiarity of expression might, at times, belong to this noble and very eminent person, it was, generally speaking, a peculiarity of force adapted to his peculiar vigour and energy of thought. But to the substance of the expression as authority it will be necessary to advert, in order to see how it has been understood and explained by those who have applied it in support of the doctrine of non-restricted acceptance. In Gammon v. Schmoll, the leading counsel at the bar, who was to support [504] the doctrine of universal liability, explained it in this way: "every general acceptor has a double liability; he is in default, first, if the bill is presented to him personally, wherever he may be, and he does not pay it; secondly, he is in default if it be presented at his place of abode, and not paid; to these, by a qualified acceptance, he adds the obligation to pay it if it be produced at the place," that is, the place specified. He must be prepared "with triple funds to pay the bill, as well where his person is, as where his abode is, and also, at the particular place mentioned: this is what Lord Ellenborough means by an expansion of the promise." This is a complication of expansibility which seems to me a strange departure from simplicity of proceeding; and, for myself, I can only say, I would not so understand it, if I could understand it to any other effect; but it is impossible to deny, whatever might be intended by the mode of expression itself, that in sum and substance it does amount to this. But whether every man who accepts a bill of exchange, by his acceptance at a specific place undertakes to pay at every other place if required, and to have a triple instead of a double or a single fund to the amount of the bill accepted; or whether he makes his own situation worse, by making that of the holder, in one respect at least, better, that is, by pointing out to him a definite place of payment, instead of leaving him to search where he, the acceptor, is to be found, when the bill becomes due, it is not for me to pronounce, but for your Lordships to consider. Or why, again, this should be in the case of a bill of exchange and not of a promissory note, is that which I am not able to understand.

I now come to that, which it is said, however, makes the distinction between bills of exchange and promissory notes, so as to make the reasoning as to the latter inapplicable to the former. And this distinction is said to consist in the form and nature of the respective instruments. First, then, as to the form. In a promissory note, it is said, the words are incorporated in the very body of the instrument, which creates the contract and duty of the party; whereas, in a bill of exchange, they are no part of the bill itself, but distinct as acceptance, and collateral to it. A promissory note is merely the promise of the maker; the acceptance of a bill of exchange is a compliance with the order of the drawer. To a promissory note [505] there are but two parties; to a bill of exchange there are three, and the drawer has rights as well as the acceptor and payee. And to this I agree. But here again, at least, as between the acceptor and the payee, there is no distinction: in each instance a debt must be pre-supposed, and in each it is an undertaking to pay. It is said, that in the case of a promissory note the instrument creates the contract; and, no doubt, it does, that is, the contract to pay in the particular manner, but not the antecedent debt: the obligation to pay existed anterior to the note; and though, in the case of a bill of exchange, the debt had also pre-existence, the precise obligation to pay is created by the acceptance, and, be it promissory note, or be it bill accepted, it is, in each instance, but a promise to pay; and, without such promise the bill itself, as to the acceptor, would be a mere nullity.

To advert, however, to the situation of the drawer, and this brings me to the third question. And, first, with respect to time: in this the learned judges all agree that giving time will discharge the drawer. Extending the time mentioned in the bill would be giving more time than the drawer has said by the bill he chooses to give, which, as against the drawer, the payee can have no right to do; and, taking an acceptance at a shorter date, if, in case of non-payment, it would give an immediate action against the drawer, would thereby make him liable sooner than he undertook to be; he being liable only in case of non-payment by the acceptor, and this at the end of the stipulated time. I need scarcely add, it would be the same as to place, if place, from its nature, should resolve itself into time. It remains, therefore, only to consider place as unconnected with and independent of time. And, so considered, it may, or it may not, be material to the drawer. Suppose all the parties to live in the same town, whether the bill be accepted at the counting-house, or at the banking-house, can make no real difference to the drawer; in other cases, from distance, it might be material; but, at all events, I think, that if it put the drawer under greater difficulties than he otherwise would be under in point of proof of proper presentment, if bringing an action himself, it is a difficulty which I hold the payee has no right to impose upon the drawer, whose rights should remain unaltered, as ascertained by the [506] bill: whether those rights were altered or not would depend on the particular case. Perhaps, however, it would be more reasonable and convenient than making it depend on situation in each particular case, which might generate innumerable questions and give rise to great uncertainty, to hold, at once, the drawer discharged, the payee having taken such acceptance without notice, and thus acting at his own peril; and thus all inconvenience would be guarded against, by making it necessary to give notice to the drawer.

With respect to the last question, I am of opinion, that under the circumstances stated, C. could not maintain an action against A. without delivering up the bill, and this for the reasons given by several of the learned Judges, and which I do not feel it necessary to repeat.

In the above observations, I may appear to have built much on the decisions as to promissory notes; but it has been said these decisions themselves, perhaps, in point of law ought not to have taken place. To this I can only answer—first, that it is impossible for me to doubt of the validity of these decisions, numerous as they are, recognized and confirmed as they have been by every court, and never, in a single instance, having till this day been drawn into doubt by even a single Judge. If the law so settled is now to be considered as unsettled, I know not on what foundation, in point of law, any decision can stand: but, here, disclaiming even those decisions as decisions, and recognizing only the principle on which they proceed, I say, that, if the case of a promissory note were to occur now for the first time, it ought to be decided as those cases have been decided; and further, that without deriving authority from the decisions as such, the principles on which they have proceeded, and ought still to rest, apply equally, in my judgment, to bills of exchange. On the whole, therefore, my opinion is formed, as to bills of exchange, even without reference to the decisions as to promissory notes, and still less have I referred to the cases of promissory notes for the purpose of proving the decisions of the Court of King's Bench inconsistent each with the other, but for the purpose of respectfully adopting the decisions of that Court where they agree with the decisions of the other Courts, and thus affording principles decisive, in point of law, of the same question as to bills of exchange. And here, with-[507]-out repeating what has been said by other Judges in answer to the cases put of actions in debt on bond, or demand of rent,

I will only further say, that these do not appear to me to be cases analogous to bills of exchange, which depend on peculiar and appropriate grounds of commercial law, altogether distinct and different, and which, it must be agreed, the custom and usage of merchants is to decide. And this leads me to the only point on which (independent of the different opinion entertained by several of the learned Judges, and of the very able reasons by which their judgments have been supported) I am bound to say I feel some degree of difficulty; and that is, as to what has been said of the understanding and usage of merchants with respect to the question under consideration. If qualified acceptances as to place have hitherto circulated on a settled and general understanding, that place does not operate by way of limitation as to payment; as far as concerns the first question, which points to the usage of merchants, I am bound to admit, that I ought to have answered differently; and, further, that if so, the greatest part of my observations fall to the ground. Looking, also, to the second question, the consequence would, I apprehend, be the same, that is, as to the legal effect; for a bill of exchange, being altogether the creature of mercantile usage, recognized, however, by the law, such usage would constitute the law as applicable to such an instrument: it is not to be overlooked, that it has been asserted by high authority, that, in circulation and practice, supported by mercantile opinion and understanding, a conditional acceptance does not operate as I conceive it to do. Not meaning to doubt that such information has been given; still, if the decision is to turn on this single ground, I could wish the fact in some way or other to be regularly ascertained. I will take the law from the learned Judges, whose office it is to expound the law: but, if the law is to depend upon fact, and fact on testimony, I desire, if possible, to have testimony through the regular channel. This creates a difficulty with me, subject to which, I will only in conclusion add, that, for the reasons which I have given, I adhere to the answer, which I have humbly presumed to submit.

ABBOTT, C. J.—In answer to the first and second questions, I think the defendant in error was not bound, in order to entitle himself to sue the plaintiff in error, who is the acceptor of the [508] bill in question, to present the bill for payment at the banking-house of Sir John Perring and Co. nor to aver in his declaration that the bill had been so presented; for, I think, the acceptance is not to be considered in law as a qualified acceptance to pay the bill at the house of Sir John Perring and Co.; but, as a general acceptance to pay the same, with an additional direction to the holder to call for payment at that house, instead of calling at the house of the acceptor, as he would otherwise do.

These two questions appear to me to depend entirely upon the meaning and import of the words "payable at Sir John Perring and Co.'s, bankers." There can be no doubt that the drawee may qualify, because he may refuse his acceptance. The question is, whether he is to be considered as having done so by this expression? I conceive that the true meaning and import of all phrases is to be sought in usage, rather than in a strict and literal interpretation of the words of the phrase; and, that in mercantile instruments the usage of trade and commerce is that to which we are to resort. There are many words and phrases in all languages, of which the meaning varies with the subject and occasion to which they are applied. I shall take leave to postpone the delivery of the grounds of my opinion on these two questions until after I have stated my opinion on the third question, and the reasons of that opinion.

I understand the expression "take an acceptance," as used in this third question, to mean consent to such an acceptance; and, so understanding it, I am of opinion that C. could not, in the case proposed, maintain an action upon the bill against A. upon the refusal of payment by the acceptor. There is not, I apprehend, any doubt or difference of opinion upon so much of this question as supposes an acceptance qualified as to time; and, in my humble opinion, a qualification as to the place of payment has the same effect as a qualification as to the time of payment.

I conceive, that in estimation of law all bills are to be considered as drawn for value, if not actually in the hands of the drawee at the time of drawing, (which seems to have been usually the case in the infancy of those instruments) at least intended by the drawer, and expected by the drawee to be placed in the hands of the latter before the maturity of the bill. [509] And a person who draws a bill under such circumstances may be permitted to elect for himself the time and place of payment; because, if the drawee should refuse to pay according to such election, he would be able to sue him for the sum which constitutes the value of the bill, either immediately, if the value has been previously received, or so soon as it shall be received, according to the intention upon which the bill is drawn. By an intention to place value in the hands of the drawer, I mean an intention to place it in the course of some mercantile transaction between the parties, such as the consignment of merchandise in pursuance of orders of the drawee, constituting the relation of seller and buyer; or a consignment for sale on account of the consignor, constituting the relation of principal and factor or agent; and not a mere promise to provide for the bill at maturity, by the transmission of money or other bills for that special purpose. The latter practice has indeed prevailed to a great extent in modern times, and bills of exchange have become rather instruments for raising money, or postponing payment of debts by a fictitious credit, than instruments of real mercantile transactions. But notwithstanding such practice, I apprehend they are to be considered in courts of law as founded upon real and mercantile transactions, according to their primitive object and use; because, if they are to be considered as founded upon other transactions, or to be governed by other principles, they will cease to be according to the usage and custom of merchants, upon which usage and custom alone their validity in the law of England depends: and which is referred to in every declaration in an action upon a bill of exchange; and if the drawer of a bill has a right to elect in this manner the time and place of payment, I think it cannot be competent to any holder of the bill to substitute a new election of his own, and to assent to any variation in these particulars, without the consent of the drawer, either precedent or subsequent. The holder cannot consent to an enlarged time of payment, because, in the interval, the drawee may fail, and he cannot be allowed to enforce the drawer to prolong the credit beyond the period that he himself may have chosen, nor can he consent to abridge the time; because by so doing he will obtain an earlier recourse against the drawer than the drawer intended to give. A bill of exchange is ordinarily addressed to the drawee at his usual place of trade or residence, and it is to such a bill that I understand the question to refer; this address, however, is intended only as a direction to the payee or holder as to the place where the drawee may be found, in order that the bill may be presented to him for acceptance and payment, and not as a designation of a precise or definite house or place of payment. And, consequently, a general acceptance of the bill leaves the bill according to its original tenor, and does not add any designation of the place of payment. Any introduction, therefore, of a definite and precise place of payment, at which alone the presentment is to be made, is a departure from the generality of the bill; and the holder who consents to take such an acceptance, does, by that act, consent to narrow what the drawer had left at large, and to fix a single place for the demand of that money, which, but for such his act, would be demandable by the drawer, or for his use, anywhere and everywhere. To such a limitation, I humbly conceive that the drawer has a right to object: and, consequently, to say to the holder, that by so doing he has taken the drawee for his own special debtor, in exclusion of the drawer, or, in common speech, he has made the bill his own. I am aware, that upon a refusal to pay at the designated place the acceptor of the bill becomes a debtor generally; but then, in order to enforce that general obligation, either the person who seeks to enforce it must prove the refusal, or at least (and which, in my opinion, is the more correct view of such a case) the party against whom the general obligation is sought to be enforced, may, by way of defence, allege and prove that he was ready with the money at the day and place appointed, and has at all times since been ready with it. I am aware also, that in the case supposed by this third question, which is the case of a bill made payable to a person named therein, the drawer cannot sue the acceptor upon the bill, without averring and proving a presentment for payment by the holder to the acceptor, and a refusal of payment by the latter; and I am sensible, that in many instances it may be a matter of entire indifference to the drawer, whether he shall prove a presentment for payment at the place specially designated by the acceptance, or at the place of abode or usual business of the drawee, to whom he has addressed his bill. But though this may be a matter of indifference in many cases, it [511] will not be so in all; if we suppose the drawee to live in some street or square in London or Westminster, and to designate another place of payment in some other street or square, in either of those cities the proof of a presentment at the place designated may be as easy as the proof of a presentment at the place of residence or business: but if we suppose the drawee to live at London, and to designate Salisbury or Exeter as the place of payment, or vice versa, the proof may not be so easy to the drawer, who may have connections in one of those cities, furnishing an opportunity of finding the witness who made the presentment, and no such connections in the other: for there is frequently no sort of connection between the drawer and ultimate holder of a bill: the latter is often a person wholly unknown to the drawer. This difference may be considered generally as varying, and increasing or diminishing, with the distance of the places, though not by that circumstance alone; and if the effect of such a qualified acceptance be made to depend upon the convenience or inconvenience to the drawer in the particular case, a door will be opened to an infinity of questions which cannot be answered but by reference to the distance of the places, accompanied also with an inquiry into the particular circumstances and connections of the drawer in respect of the places. And I apprehend, my Lords, that a rule of law, liable to such questions in practice, ought not to be established without an absolute necessity, especially in mercantile cases, which, above all others, require to be governed by plain, prompt, and easy rules. My opinion, however, upon this question, is founded less upon consideration of particular convenience, than upon the general principle to which I have before alluded: namely, that the drawer has a right to have from the drawee, considered as his debtor in the way that I have mentioned, a general and unqualified acknowledgment of his debt, and promise of payment: and that no assignee of his demand can, without his assent, permit any limit or qualification at the dictation of the drawee, or by consent between those two persons. All that I have thus urged in relation to bills addressed generally to the drawee at his place of abode or business, will, I apprehend, apply with increased force to bills which, by their original form and tenor, require the payment to be made at some particular place designated therein: [512] because, in these cases, an acceptance substituting another and different place of payment will be a manifest departure from the declared intention of the drawer. There is another class or form of bills of exchange not noticed in the questions, but to which I advert, because I conceive the considerations belonging to it deserve attention: I mean, bills made payable to the order of the drawer, or which is the same in effect, to the drawer or his order. If a bill so drawn be indorsed to another without value, the indorsee becomes a mere agent of the drawer, and, of course, can never sue him upon the bill. If indorsed for value, either in the first, or any subsequent instance, the rights of the holder against the drawer do not differ from those arising on a bill drawn in favour of a person therein named. But the remedy of the drawer, to whom such a bill may be returned for nonpayment against the acceptor, is, in some respects, different; the drawer of such a bill may, in this event, sue the acceptor by a special declaration, setting forth the indorsement and return of the bill, and thereby entitle himself to recover, in addition to the principal sum, the expense of exchange and re-exchange paid by him to the indorsee, which is the usual mode in the case of foreign bills: and, if he sue in this form, he must allege and prove a presentment and protest for nonpayment. But the drawer may strike out his indorsement, and treat the bill as having remained continually in his own hands unassigned, which is the usual practice in the case of inland bills: and, in such an action, I apprehend it is not necessary to aver or prove a presentment for payment, the bill being accepted generally. I take this to be law: because, in all the numerous actions which have been brought upon bills of this description I have never known a presentment for payment actually proved at the trial: nor the want of such proof, or of the averment, ever made a ground of objection in any stage of the proceedings. In the case of such a bill, therefore, it is obvious, that if the indorsee take an acceptance, qualified as to the place of payment, so as to render the proof of a presentment at that place necessary to the maintenance of an action by the drawer against the acceptor, he will thereby cast an additional burthen upon the drawer, if the latter can be compelled to take up the bill: and I conceive the law will [513] not allow him to do this. I have expressed my sentiments thus at length upon the third question, because my opinion upon the first and second questions, to which I now revert, depends very mainly upon the opinion which I entertain on the third question.

I consider an acceptance qualified as to the place of payment to be followed by the consequences that I have mentioned, where the holder consents to receive it; and, if I am right in this, then the holder must of necessity have a right to refuse such an acceptance, because he cannot be compelled to take an acceptance which may deprive him of his recourse against the drawer; and this seems to have been the opinion of those learned judges, who, in the decided cases to which your Lordships have been referred, considered an acceptance like the present to be a qualified acceptance. If, then, the holder may refuse such acceptance, or if, consenting to take it, he loses his recourse against the drawer, I must say, I am entirely at a loss to discover how it can have happened, that in no one of the thousands and tens of thousands of bills which have been accepted in this form in England, in the course of the last thirty years, any holder of the bill has ever refused to take such an acceptance, or any drawer contended that he was discharged by the holder's consent to take it. I say, that neither of those things has happened, because I have never heard of them either in or out of a court of justice. Upon this consideration, I am satisfied, that according to the usage and custom of merchants, these words, "payable at, etc." are not understood to furnish a qualification, or to import that the acceptor will cause payment to be made, if the holder will present the bill at the place appointed, but not elsewhere, or otherwise. And I am particularly desirous to seek the meaning of these words in the usage of merchants at the Exchange, rather than in Westminster Hall; because a difference of opinion as to their meaning has for some time prevailed, not only among the judges now present, but also among some of those revered persons who are now no more. I must, however, add, that the words themselves are not apt words of condition or exclusion; and that if their meaning be doubtful, they are to be interpreted most strongly against the person using them, that is, the acceptor; and the most strong interpretation against him is that which excludes, and not that which admits the qualification. Much was argued by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, as to the inconvenience which may ensue from the interpretation which I put upon these words; especially in the case of a gentleman or a lawyer, who should be suddenly called upon for payment at a distant place, after having provided and left funds in the hands of his banker to discharge his acceptance. But this supposed inconvenience appears to me to rest almost wholly in suggestion and imagination. If a bill addressed to a person at his place of abode be accepted generally, I apprehend the holder may, if he will be perverse or foolish enough to do so, take out a writ against the acceptor, as soon as the bill becomes due, without calling at his house for payment, in like manner as any other person may do who is a creditor for goods sold for the ordinary supply of a family; so that the supposed inconvenience is equal in both forms of acceptance, but in practice it can rarely happen in either; because the holder who neglects to present his bill, loses his recourse against the drawer, which no prudent man will choose to do. And, if an acceptance in the form of the present, mentioning a banking-house, is to be deemed a qualified acceptance, I apprehend the same interpretation must be given to the words, if a house of any other description be mentioned, such as the house of any agent or friend, or even the house or place of business of the drawee, if he happen to have two, and the bill be directed to one of them, or if he be about to change his place of trade or residence before the bill will become due; or, if the bill be addressed to him at his only place of residence or business, without the addition of his place of abode, as "to A. B. merchant, London." There is also another ground upon which, it seems to me, as at present advised, that I might answer the first question in the negative; and that is this: Admitting a place of payment to be specially designated by the acceptance, I apprehend that the money is nevertheless due generally from the acceptor; and that in an action against him, his readiness to pay at the place appointed should be advanced by him as matter of defence by a special plea averring that fact, and bringing the money into court for the plaintiff's use, as in the common case of a plea of tender, [515] (unless indeed he can excuse himself by showing that the money has been lost by the intermediate failure of his banker, which is a point of so much doubt that I hope to be excused from giving an opinion upon it at present); and, according to the ordinary rules of pleading, a plaintiff need not allege any matter the want whereof furnishes a ground of special defence only, and not a general answer to his demand, or general defeasance of his right, unless it be the case of a condition precedent, the effect whereof is to postpone the demand until the matter of the condition be performed; and I have already observed that the words "payable at the house of Sir J. P. and Co." do not appear to me to be proper words of condition. But I hope to be excused from expressing myself with confidence upon this point, by reason of the difficulty there may be in drawing an effectual distinction between the designation of a place of payment in the acceptance, and the designation thereof in the body of the bill itself, or in the body of a promissory note payable upon demand to the bearer, as was the case of Sanderson v. Bowes, and one or two others which have been cited; and in which it was decided, that a presentment of the note at the place therein designated was a condition precedent to a right of action for the money. If the like question shall ever arise again, I shall consider it with the utmost deference and respect to the great learning and talents by which those decisions were pronounced, though at present I am not entirely satisfied, that, even in the case of such a note, a readiness to pay at the appointed place is not properly matter of defence alone. It is, I hope, sufficient for me to say at present, that the words of the instrument now in question are not precisely the same, and that they are found in an instrument of a different character, namely, in a bill of exchange; wherein a time certain is appointed for the payment, and of which, as before observed, I think the acceptance must be considered as given in pursuance of an antecedent duty to the drawer, assignable by the custom of merchants, and not as creating a new duty in itself, which, in the case of Sanderson v. Bowes, the promissory note was considered to do.

In answer to the fourth question, I am of opinion that an action could not be maintained under the circumstances therein mentioned; or, rather, that the delivery of the bill by the [516] drawer to the payee, such bill still remaining in his hands, or outstanding, would furnish a defence to the action according to the case of Kearslake v. Morgan (5 T. R. 513); because, if the drawer could be compelled to pay the original debt under circumstances furnishing a right of action against his drawee, and thereby taking his funds out of the hands of the drawee, he might, in the result, be found to pay the amount twice: directly by himself, and indirectly through the medium of his drawee. I shall be understood to speak of a case wherein the holder had consented to take the qualified acceptance. I have clearly intimated that in my opinion he may refuse to do so; and if he does refuse, he may, in my opinion, treat the bill as dishonoured, and sue the drawer upon it.

[517] IN the discussion of the foregoing case three principal questions were made:

1. Whether the modern theory of law is to rest upon the ancient practice as to the acceptance of bills of exchange, according to which the acceptor was antecedently a debtor, or person having in his hands the funds of the drawer; or whether the extensive practice now established in commerce, of drawing bills, to which the acceptor lends his name and credit for the accommodation of the drawer, has altered the theory of law as it is supposed to have existed formerly; and accordingly, whether the acceptor becomes a debtor by and upon the terms of his acceptance only, as a contract then first made by him, without reference to any antecedent debt or debts.

2d. What is the true construction of the contract in this particular case:

3. Whether an action of debt will lie upon such contract or acceptance:

The two first questions have been satisfactorily investigated in the proceedings before the House of Lords in this case.

As to the last question, it was touched slightly, but passed without discussion. It is a question, in an abstract view, seemingly of little importance, but as connected with a consideration of the general principles of commercial jurisprudence, as involving a controversy upon the technical rules of pleading, on which the issue of suits, and the fate of suitors, are made to depend, and peculiarly as exhibiting one among many examples of the progressive change of legal opinions, it is a question well deserving a more studious investigation than the opportunities of the editor will afford.*

* This Note was printed three years ago, (Dec. 1820,) at the end of a pamphlet, containing a short report of the case now reported at length. The editor having in that note invited the aid of persons better qualified to discuss the question, the invitation has been accepted, without reference to the previous labours of the editor, by a [518] To form a satisfactory opinion, it is material, in the first place, to consider accurately the early cases upon bills of exchange and promissory notes, and to examine the grounds and reasons of each decision. Upon such a review, it will appear that it is little more than a century since it was the solemn decision of an English Court of Justice, that no person but an actual merchant (Lutw. Rep. 891, 1585) could draw a bill of exchange. When this notion was removed by more liberal decisions,* it seems to have been doubted whether an action of debt, or indebitatus assumpsit, could lie against any of the parties to, and whether, on the bill or note. Yet in some of the cases it is suggested, that indebitatus assumpsit may be maintained on the bill or note as a contract between the privies to it, or in their names, and that the bill or note may be offered in evidence.† Afterwards it was held in some cases that debt,‡ in others that indeb. assumpsit, would lie against the maker of a note (or drawer of a bill), where it was expressed to be for value received. But still the great technical objections prevailed as between the drawer or maker, and payee, where value received was not expressed upon the face of the bill or note: and as between all other parties for a supposed want of privity of contract.

At last, when the extension of commerce impressed upon the Courts the necessity of weighing the convenience of mankind against technicalities, which grew out of an obsolete state of society, and rested, but with much inconsistency of decision, upon grounds which no longer existed; when the custom of merchants, which is the foundation and substance of the law of commerce, began to be considered as a branch of the law of nations—a part of the law of England, and, as such, to be [519] recognised in our courts of justice||; it was held and decided, without much hesitation, that an action of indebitatus assumpsit for money lent,¶ or for money paid, had, and received, by defendant to the use of plaintiff, might be maintained by the indorsee against the acceptor (Tatlock v. Harris) or the indorser (Kessebower v. Tims), and even by the bearer of a lost cash-note, which he fairly purchased, against the giver (Grant v. Vaughan). And, in the cases of bills and notes, that actions of indebitatus assumpsit were maintainable although the bills or notes were not expressed to be for value received (White v. Ledwick, Bayley on Bills, 16), although not a shilling had passed between plaintiff and defendant (Ward v. Evans, 2 Lord Raym. 930), and no evidence was given that the defendant had received value in the case of a bill (Vere v. Lewis, 3 T. R. 182).

To ascertain what are the circumstances in which an action of debt may be maintained, what is the definition and rule prescribed by the textwriters, is the second object of inquiry.

It is reported in one case to have been held that indebitatus assumpsit will lie in gentleman who has published "An Analysis of the case of Rowe v. Young." At the end of that analysis (sect. 3, p. 64), the author discusses this same question, whether debt will lie upon a bill of exchange. To that discussion the editor refers the Profession, that it may be seen in what manner and degree the original argument is amplified, improved, or varied by a different assortment of the authorities and topics of discussion.

no case but where debt lies.* But the matter is accurately defined in a book of great authority, where (Com. Dig. tit. Debt, A. 8) it is said, that "debt lies upon every express and implied (ibid. A. 9) contract to pay a sum certain." A bill of exchange, within the very terms of this definition and rule, is a request and undertaking (Collis v. Emmet, 11. Black. 321) by the drawer; and when accepted, a contract by the acceptor for the payment of a sum certain [520] absolutely, in money only (Martin v. Chantry, Stra. 1271; Bayley on Bills, p. 4) and in specie (Anon. Bull. N. Pri. 172). It is a mercantile contract entered into by the acceptor, and not as a mere guarantee. On this ground a distinction is made between the original acceptor of a bill, and a second acceptor, to guarantee the credit of the first, which has been held to be a collateral undertaking that the bill shall be paid, and requires a special declaration (Jackson v. Hudson, 2 Camp. N. P. C. 14).

That the acceptance is an express, or at least an implied, contract by the acceptor, to pay a sum certain, is assumed by all the Judges and the Lord Chancellor in their arguments (arguments passim, and opinion of Wood, B. p. 37) upon the case now reported, and may be proved, if requisite, by a multitude of preceding authorities. The question as to privity of contract, or the communication of the rights and benefit of the contract between the original and adopted parties to a bill of exchange, must also depend upon the principles of commercial law, as applicable to instruments of a negotiable nature. It is almost, if not altogether, identical with the question, whether the acceptor incurs an assignable debt by his acceptance, or what is the nature of his contract. In theory, a bill of exchange is an assignment to the payee of a debt due from the acceptor to the drawer. The acceptance imports either that the acceptor is a debtor, or that he holds effects of the drawer.† Acceptance of a bill imports, and is prima facie evidence, that the acceptor has effects of the drawer in his hands (Master v. Miller, 4 T. R. 339); it is an admission of effects. The acceptor by his acceptance gives faith to the bill; and the holder, giving credit to the fact, pays the value on receiving the bill (Burr. Rep. 1675, (qq) per Aston, J.) Giving a bill is an assignment (Grant v. Farghloin, Burr. per Yates, J.), or appropriation (Tatlock v. Harris, 3 T. R. 182.) of so much property, which becomes money had and received to the use of the holder. [521] The act of drawing a bill implies an undertaking to the payee, and every other person to whom the bill may afterwards be transferred, that the drawee will undertake in writing (or bind himself by a promise) to pay, and will pay, when due, the sum, etc. (Bayley on Bills, p. 21). The acceptance is evidence in an action by the holder against the acceptor, that he has received value (Vere v. Lewis) from the drawer.

Such are the doctrines of law as to the obligation of the acceptor, and the relation between him and the holder considered as payee; doctrines promulgated by judges of various learning, and the highest celebrity in municipal as well as commercial jurisprudence. Upon equal authority is founded the doctrine as to the relation of other parties in a bill of exchange. Every indorser is in contemplation of law a new drawer (Smallwood v. Vernon, Stra. Rep. 178; see Bayley on Bills, 47). And as between indorsee and indorser, though neither of them are actual parties to the original contract, and the whole transaction amounts to no more than money or other consideration passing from the one, and the writing a name by the other, yet this constitutes a mercantile privity, which is recognised by municipal courts, and becomes the foundation of the remedies which they administer in favour of the indorsee against the indorser (Kessborough v. Tins, qut supra), as well as the acceptor and drawer of the bill. The action in such cases may be either upon the bill as negotiable by the custom of merchants, or an indebitatus assumpsit (which is in the nature of an action of debt), (vide ante, p. 519, note) for money lent, etc., and the bill, with its acceptance or indorsement, may be given in evidence. But essentially, in both cases, the custom of merchants is the true principle of the remedy and foundation of the action. The distinction sounds more in name than in substance*. For upon what ground but the custom of merchants can the bill be offered in evidence of money paid as between [522] indorsee and indorser, or acceptor. If there is other evidence of a consideration, the proof of the bill is superfluous.

How far the rigid maxims of municipal law have bent to the necessities of human intercourse appears by the doctrine, no longer disputed, that a bill of exchange, although it be a mere chose in action, yet the common mercantile transfer of it by writing a name, or even by simple delivery, is sufficient to vest the legal as well as the equitable interest in the indorsee or deliverer, and entitles him to sue thereon in his own name (see Chitty on Bills, p. 6).

This principle of decision has been extended beyond the cases of negotiable instruments. For where a respondentia bond had been given, on which the obligee had made a special indorsement to facilitate assignment, upon an action by an assignee of the bond, De Grey, C. J. held, that "the defendant had promised to pay any person who should become entitled to the money;" and there was a verdict for the plaintiff.†

Upon the strength of these authorities an opinion might, perhaps, without presumption, be hazarded: that all the parties, original and derivative, to the negotiable mercantile instrument called a bill of exchange, are equally, by creation or by adoption, parties to the contract which is, expressly as to some, and by implication at least as to all, for the payment of a sum certain.

If so, the circumstances here concur, which, according to the definition (Com. Dig. quâ sup.) of Chief Baron Comyns, are requisite to support an action of debt.

It is indeed stated, in a subsequent head of the Digest, that "debt will not (id. ibid. B.) lie against the acceptor of a bill of exchange." But this doctrine seems to be contradicted by the principle of the rule before stated, and is asserted upon the authority of a case (Anon. Hardres, 485), which was decided in the infancy of commerce, at a time when it was supposed, and seriously adjudged, that no person but an actual merchant (Lutw. 891, 1585) could draw a bill of ex-[523]-change—when it was held, that the bill must import to be for value received: that indebitatus assumpsit would not lie against the acceptor, and that the acceptor was liable only as a surety, and not as a principal debtor.

The revolution which has now taken place in judicial opinions, and the liberal doctrines upon this subject, which are now become settled principles of law, and applied daily in practice, seem to confirm the supposition, that there is, according to the law-merchant, which is a part of the law of England, an implied privity of contract between all the parties to a bill, primitive and derivative, or adoptive (see Simmons v. Parminter, 1 Wils. 185; Co. Litt. 172).

In all cases of the transfer of negotiable instruments the question seems to be, whether the instrument itself is not by the law-merchant prima facie or presumptive evidence of a consideration passing from hand to hand as the bill passes, but liable to be rebutted by evidence on the general issue, or special plea, that the holder gave no consideration.

An abstract of some of the principal cases cited in the foregoing note are here subjoined, with observations upon some later authorities which appear to bear upon the question of privity.

In Anon. Hardr. 485, held, that the payee cannot maintain debt against the acceptor, and it was said in that case, that the promises of the acceptor no more create a duty than a promise by a stranger to pay, etc. if the creditor will forbear. Upon the clear distinction between the acceptor of a bill, and a mere guarantee, see Jackson v. Hudson, 2 Camp. 447.

* It was upon a question of this kind that Lord Chief Justice Holt fell into a dispute with the mercantile interest in the City, as to the manner of declaring upon a promissory note before the statute of Anne, as upon a specialty by the custom of merchants, which he said was mere obstinacy, as there was so easy a method by indeb. assumpsit for money lent. See 2 Lord Raym. 758, and Burr. 1525, post. p. 525.

† Fenner v. Mears, Black. Rep. 1272. As to the authority of this case, see the observations of Lord Kenyon, in Johnson v. Collings, 1 East, 98.

In Welch v. Craig, Stra. 680, 8 Mod. 373, held, that debt will not lie upon a note. But it does not appear who was the defendant in the action.

In Morgan's Precedents, 458, is an entry of a declaration in debt by administratrix of payee of note against the maker.

In Rumball v. Ball, 10 Mod. 38, action of debt brought on a note, by payee against maker, and held good.

In Brown v. London, 1 Freeman, 14; 1 Mod. 285; 1 Ventr. 152, held that indeb. assumpsit would not lie against the acceptor of a bill; but Twisden, J. doubted. The ground of this decision is [524] said in Lev. 298, to have been, because the custom was not set out in the count.

In Skinner, 346, it is said that indeb. assumpsit (or debt, qu.) will only lie against the drawer upon a bill importing to have been given for value received.

In Salk, 23, it was held that indeb. assumpsit will lie in no case but where debt lies: That indeb. assumpsit (and therefore, scmb. debt ante, p. 549, note) lies against the drawer, though not against the acceptor, of a bill of exchange. The reason for this decision is given in Skinner, 346, namely, "for the apparent consideration." See Vere v. Lewis, infra.

In Salk, 125, and 12 Mod. 37, it is given as general doctrine, that indeb. ass. will not lie on a bill of exchange, as it is said, "for want of consideration, as it is but evidence of a promise to pay, which is but a nudum pactum." But it is to be observed, that the action was by the indorsee against the drawer, and in the last resolution of the judges, as given both in Salkeld and 12 Mod. it is said, that "the action should have been special on the bill, or a general indeb. ass. for money received to his (the indorsee's) use." See Carter v. Palmer, 12 Mod. 380, a case before the statute of Anne, where, upon a motion in arrest of judgment, a declaration upon a note on the custom, etc. as if it had been a bill, was held bad. But Holt, C. J. said, it might have been taken as evidence of money lent. In Nicholson v. Sadgwick, Ld. Raym. 180, the action (and verdict for plaintiff) being upon a note payable to bearer, the judgment was arrested on the ground of want of privity; but it was said the plaintiff might have maintained the action in the name of the payee, or if it had been payable to order, the (immediate) indorsee might have brought an action against the maker. And it was said to have been resolved in Hodges v. Steward, that the indorsement to the bearer binds the party who immediately indorses to him. In 12 Mod. 345, it is held that the first indorser (payee) striking out the names of all the indorsees of a bill, purporting to have been for value received, may maintain indeb. assumpsit against the drawer. In that action, Holt, C. J. is reported to have said, the action will lie, for the bill was given as a security for money lent, and without [525] doubt it was a debt; and the court, it is said, resolved it was a plain debt, and that one might bring debt, or indeb. ass. upon a bill of exchange, because it is in the nature of a security.

In 12 Mod. 380; and in Burr. Rep. 1525, it is laid down as indisputable, that indeb. ass. for money lent will lie upon a note. See also Smith v. Kendall, 6 T. R. 123. In Clerke v. Martin, Ld. Raym. 758, the action being upon a note payable to plaintiff or order; one count of the declaration was upon indeb. ass. for money lent, and another upon the custom, as on a bill of exchange. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and the jury gave a general verdict for the plaintiff with entire damages. Upon motion in arrest of judgment, Holt, C. J. was "totis viribus against the action." He said, "that such actions were innovations upon the common-law: " That "it was a new sort of specially invented in Lombard-street, which attempted, in these matters of bills of exchange, to give laws to Westminster Hall: That the continuing to declare upon these notes on the custom of merchants proceeded from obstinacy, as he had expressed his opinion against them, and since there was so easy a method, as to declare upon a general indeb. ass. for money lent. But as the damages were given generally, it could not be intended that they were given on the count of indeb. ass." And judgment was accordingly arrested.

So in Grant v. Vaughan, Burr. 1516, it was held that an action for money had and received may be maintained by the bearer against the giver of a cash note upon a banker, made payable "to ship Fortune, or bearer."

In Tatlock v. Harris, 3 T. R. 174, the indorsee of a bill recovered against the acceptor upon counts for money had and received, and money paid.

In Vere v. Lewis, 3 T. R. 182, the indorsee of a bill recovered upon the money-counts against the acceptor, although there was no evidence that he had received value for the bill. The Court said the acceptance was evidence that he had received value from the drawers.

In Kesschouer v. Tims, B. R. Pasch. 22 G. 3, it was held that the indorsee of a note might maintain indeb. ass. for money lent against the indorser.

[526] In Bishop v. Young, 2 B. and P. 78, (a decision by the present Lord Chancellor, when C. J. of the C. P.) an action of debt by the payee against the maker of a promissory note, expressed to be for value received, was upon demurrer held maintainable. What the decision might have been as between other parties, the Chief Justice said he would not express.

The case of Barlow v. Bishop, 1 East, 432, has been supposed (Chitty, 470,) to establish a rule, that the plaintiff can in no case recover under the money-counts, unless money has actually been received by the party sued, and for the use of the plaintiff. But in that case the plaintiff had received the note by indorsement from a married woman, and he had therefore no title or interest in the note; which could be no evidence for him of any thing.

If, (as Lord Kenyon observed in that case,) the indorsement had "been in the name of the husband, it might have been available" as a note indorsed, or as evidence of a consideration to the maker. But the indorsement being in her own name (as the Judge observed) "it was impossible to say that she could pass away the interest of her husband by it;" or, (it might be added,) that the plaintiff could make use of that which belonged to another, as evidence of a demand made by him against the defendant, who might have been sued a second time upon the same demand by the husband, when he had recovered possession of the note. It is indeed observed by the C. J. as reported at the end of the case, "that the plaintiff could not recover on the money counts, as no money passed between the parties." But if the maker of a negotiable note incurs the same responsibility to the holder as the acceptor of a bill, quære, how this extrajudicial dictum is reconcileable with the decision in Vere v. Lewis, ante, p. 525!

In Waynam v. Bend, 1 Camp. 174, the action was by an indorsee against the maker of a promissory note, made payable to T. or bearer. An indorsement being stated in the declaration. Lord Ellenborough said, that though unnecessary, yet as an indorsement was stated in the count, on the note, it must be proved; and that the plaintiff could not recover on the money-counts, as he was not an original party [527] to the bill, and there was no evidence of any value received by the defendant from him; but a witness being afterwards found to prove the indorsement, there was a verdict for the plaintiff on the count on the note. This case, it must be observed, contains no more than a dictum at nisi prius, and that the note was made payable to bearer; in which case the courts, as in actions brought upon bankers cheques and cash-notes, for obvious reasons, and upon the same principle, require proof of a consideration paid by the holder. At the end of the case of Waynam v. Bend, three authorities, on the point in question, are cited in a note subjoined by the reporter: Johnson v. Collings, 1 East, 98; Whitewell v. Bennett, 3 B. and P. 559; Houle v. Barter, 3 East, 177; but without any remarks upon the case, or the application of the authorities.

In Johnson v. Collings the decision was, that a promise to accept a bill before it was drawn was not in law an acceptance. And as it could not support the count on the acceptance of the bill, so being no acceptance it could be no evidence in support of the general counts for money had, etc. Lord Kenyon merely said, as to the other counts, that there was no evidence to support them.

In Whitewell v. Bennett, the bill produced in evidence varied from that stated in the declaration. A banker's check had been given for the amount by the acceptor to the payee post dated, for the purpose of preventing the receipt of the money, until it should be ascertained, whether a bill of the drawer, in the hands of the acceptor, would be paid. The presumption of law in support of the money-counts arising from the acceptance of the bill, was rebutted by the circumstance of post dating the check, by a conversation which took place at the time of the acceptance, and other circumstances; and it was expressly found by the verdict that the defendant, at the time when he accepted the bill, had no effects in his hands.

In Houle v. Barter, 3 East, 177, a bill being made payable to the order of the drawer, and indorsed by him, the plaintiff, in order to give additional credit to the bill, without the privity of the defendant, the acceptor, indorsed it upon the request of the drawer, and re-delivered it to him. The defendant having become bankrupt before the bill became due, and the plaintiff being obliged to pay the amount to the in-[528]-dorsee, the Court held, that he was not a surety, because he incurred no liability at the request of the defendant, and as his demand was upon the bill, which he might have proved under the commission, it was discharged by the certificate. The question turned wholly upon the nature of the collateral contract upon the bill itself, whether considered as a mercantile instrument, or as evidence of money paid and received. If the plaintiff could have been considered as a party to the instrument, according to the custom of the merchants, the demand was barred by the certificate.

Since the decision of this case on appeal, an act has been passed (1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 78), reciting, that the practice and understanding among merchants was contrary to this decision; and enacting, that an acceptance made payable at a banker's, without further expression, shall be deemed a general acceptance; but if it is expressed to be payable at a banker's, or other place only, that it shall be deemed a qualified acceptance, and the acceptor shall not be liable to pay the bill, except in default of payment on demand at the banker's or other place.

SCOTLAND.

AN APPEAL FROM COURT OF SESSION.

CRAIGDALLIE AND OTHERS,—Appellants; AIKMAN AND OTHERS,—Respondents
[21 July 1820].

[3 Scots R.R. 607. See S.C. 1 Dow 1, and 3 Scots R.R. 1, and notes ad loc. cit. Considered in Galbraith v. Smith, 1837, 15 Shaw, 808; *Smith v. In the year 1736, a meeting-house was built by contributions of materials, money and labour, and collections at the church door, of persons professing the principles of those who seceded at that time from the Church of Scotland. The meeting-house, and the ground on which it was built, were vested in certain persons, as trustees for the use of the society, and managers of the house of public worship for the Associate Congregation of Perth.

A schism took place in 1496 among the members of this religious community; and several of the members, including the representatives of some of the trustees, to whom the legal right of property had devolved, separated themselves from the rest of the community, and absolved themselves from the authority of the Associate Synod, which was the constituted authority for the government of the community. This separation took place on grounds of alleged difference of opinion, on a question as to the power of the civil magistrates in religious concerns, which the Court of Session pronounced to be unintelligible.

Held, that in a case where it was difficult to ascertain who were the legal owners, as representatives of the contributors, the use of the meeting house belongs to those who adhere to the religious principles of those by whom it was erected; and those who had separated themselves from the Associate Synod, and declined their jurisdiction, were held to have forfeited their right to the property: although it had been judicially declared that there was no intelligible difference of opinion between them and the adherents of the Synod.

The question in this case arose upon a dispute between the members of a congregation of seceders [530] from the church of Scotland, respecting the right to the use of a meeting-house, built by contribution soon after the time of the secession, (1731.) on a piece of ground which was disposed to certain persons, who declared that they held the ground, and buildings to be erected, in trust for the use of the Society and Managers of the house of public worship, for the Associate Congregation of Perth. This was one of the bodies which seceded from the church of Scotland, in 1731, upon the question of patronage or appointment to vacant churches. The Seceders generally, and this congregation in particular, adhered to the doctrines and discipline of the church of Scotland. These consisted of the confession of faith, the larger and shorter catechisms, certain propositions respecting church government, the ordination of ministers, and the directory of worship, which had been agreed upon by the assembly of divines, at Westminster, soon after the revolution of 1688, approved of by the general assembly of the church of Scotland, and established by the fifth act of the second session of the first parliament of William and Mary. The church government then established was, by Kirk session,* presbyteries, synods, and [531] general assemblies, all which, except the last, were preserved by the Seceders.

In the confession of faith annexed to this act, one of the articles is in the following words: "The civil magistrate may not assume to himself the administration of the word and sacraments, or the power of the keys of the kingdom of heaven; yet he hath authority, and it is his duty to take order, that unity and peace be preserved in the church; that the truth of God be kept pure and entire; that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed; all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented or reformed; and all the ordinances of God duly settled, administered, and observed: for the better effecting whereof, he hath power to call synods, to be present at them, and provide that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the mind of God."

The national covenant of Scotland, and the solemn league and covenant of the three nations, which had been adopted by the first assembly of the church, were adopted also by the Seceders. These, as the standard principles of religious doctrine and discipline in their church, were recognised by the Seceders in their "act, declaration and testimony for the [532] doctrine, worship, discipline and government of the church of Scotland, issued at Perth in the year 1736;" and by a formula or series of interrogatories, which were proposed to persons desirous to become members of the church of the Seceders, and to which their assent was required. By the second question of the formula, the candidate for admission was interrogated, "whether he sincerely owned and believed the whole doctrines contained in the confession of faith?" The fourth question was in these words: "Do you acknowledge the perpetual obligation of the national covenant of Scotland, particularly as explained in 1638, to abjure prelacy, and the five articles of Perth, and of the solemn league and covenant? And do you acknowledge that public covenanting is a moral duty under the New Testament dispensation, to be performed, when God, in his providence, calls for it?"

In the year 1795, upon the petition of a member of the Associate Synod, a com-

* Originally, by stat. 1597. By act 1606 Episcopacy was restored; Presbytery again 1638; Episcopacy again 1662; and, finally, Presbytery by stat. 1689. The Kirk Session is composed of the clergyman of the parish, and of certain persons called elders, selected from the congregation of each parish, and ordained by a clergyman. This is the lowest court in the church, having jurisdiction in spiritual matters only over its own parish.

A Presbytery is composed of the clergymen of a district, together with one elder from each of the Kirk Sessions within that district. This is the court next above the Kirk Session, exercising jurisdiction over the district from which the members are selected.

A Synod is formed by the union of a certain number of Presbyteries, over which its jurisdiction extends.

The General Assembly is composed of representatives from all the different Presbyteries, from the Universities and the Royal Burghs. This is the supreme ecclesiastical court. Its power extends over the whole kingdom in all ecclesiastical subjects, and there is no appeal against its judgments.

mittee was appointed to review the questions in the formula, and to bring in an overture (the heads of an act) for uniting the members in their sentiments, respecting the power ascribed in the confession of faith to the civil magistrate in matters of religion, and respecting the nature of the obligation of the national covenants upon posterity; in the mean time, allowing presbyteries to exercise forbearance as to licence and ordination, with respect to the articles in question. After a report had been made by the committee, proposing an act of forbearance, and various meetings and discussions upon the subject, that measure was abandoned.

[533] At a meeting of the session, on the 13th of April 1797, a petition, on behalf of those who maintained the principles of the appellants, was presented against any alteration in the substance of the formula; but assenting, for the sake of peace, to prefatory explanation, as the following passage in the petition imports.

"At the same time, as certain expressions in the said formula, or in other ecclesiastical standards, and our national covenants, have been understood by some as favouring persecution for conscience sake, and ascribing an exorbitant power of religious interference to the civil magistrate; we are far from wishing the synod to request, from any candidate, his licence or ordination, or approbation of any such principles of which we disapprove; and, as there is a diversity of opinion as to the obligation of our covenants, national and solemn league, we consider them as binding on posterity only, so far as these covenants respect a solemn engagement of adherence unto all the truths and ordinances of the Lord Jesus Christ, as contained in our confession and catechisms. If the prefixing an explication of this nature to the old formula would satisfy our brethren, who object to said formula, we will agree thereto."

At a meeting of the synod, in April 1797, a resolution passed by a majority of voices, adopting the following preamble (as an explanation) to the formula: "Whereas some parts of the standard books of this synod have been interpreted as favouring compulsory measures in religion, the synod hereby declare, that they do not require an approbation of any such principle, from any candidate for [534] licence or ordination: And whereas a controversy has arisen among us respecting the nature and kind of the obligation of our solemn covenants on posterity, whether it be entirely of the same kind upon us as upon our ancestors, who swore them; the synod hereby declare, that while they hold the obligation of our covenants upon posterity, they do not interfere with that controversy which hath arisen respecting the nature and kind of it, and recommend to all the members to suppress that controversy, as tending to gender strife rather than godly edifying."

Against the adoption of this preamble various petitions were presented to the synod, which, having been considered and rejected, the measure was finally approved, and the preamble retained, by a resolution of the synod in 1799.

This resolution was followed by a protest and declinature on the part of several ministers. In one of these, after reciting the points in dispute, his opinions upon the subject, and the measures adopted by the majority of the synod, the minister, "in his own name, and in the name of all the members of the congregation who should adhere to him, protests against the proceedings of the synod, relative to, etc. and, until the preamble should be removed, declines the authority and jurisdiction of the associated burgher synod, and of all presbyteries subordinate to it," etc.

In consequence of this protest and declinature, the synod declared the minister, protesting, to be no longer a member of their body, and excluded him from the pulpit of their meeting-house, where he [535] had been accustomed to preach. Here upon a complaint was preferred to the sheriff, and afterwards an action was brought in the court of session by the appellants, "to have it declared, that the meeting-house, etc. belonged to them, etc. as adhering to the original principles of the secession, and whose ancestors contributed to the purchase," etc. A counter action was raised by the respondents, to have it declared that the parties (protesting and declining the jurisdiction of the synod) had lost all interest in the subjects. These actions being conjoined, the court, by an interlocutor, dated the 1st of February 1801, found, "that the property of the subjects in question is held in trust for a society of persons who contributed their money, either by specific subscriptions, or by contribution at the church doors, for purchasing the ground, and building, repairing, and upholding the house or houses thereon, or of paying off the debt contracted for these purposes, such persons always by themselves, or along with others, joining with them, forming a congregation of Christians continuing in communion with and subject to the ecclesiastical discipline of a body of dissenting protestants, calling themselves 'the Associate Presbytery and Synod of Burgher Seceders,' and remit to the lord ordinary to proceed accordingly."
